LACEBY (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Great Grimsby; containing 755 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road between Caistor and Grimsby, and comprises 2037*a.* 2*r.* 31*p.*, of which about 1300 acres are arable, 700 pasture, and 30 woodland; the surface of the country is undulated, and very beautiful, and the soil is a rich loam, well watered, and fenced, and capable of producing every kind of grain. The village is on the banks of the Laceby beck, which intersects the parish, and abounds in fine trout; a new bridge was built over it in 1841. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 0. 10.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. John Birkett: the tithes have been commuted for £535, and the glebe comprises 19 acres, with an excellent parsonage-house, erected near the church, at the expense of the Rev. J. Birkett, in 1834. The church is an ancient structure, with a handsome tower, and a very neat interior, containing about 240 sittings. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Sarah Stamford, in 1720, built a school-house, and endowed it with 70 acres of land, under the will of Philip Stamford, dated 1712; the income is £92, partly applied to apprenticing boys.

LACEY-GREEN, a chapelry, in the parish of PRINCE'S-RISBOROUGH, hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Great Missenden; containing 926 inhabitants.—See RISBOROUGH, PRINCE'S.

LACK-DENNIS, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Northwich; containing 33 inhabitants.

LACKFORD (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union and hundred of THINGOE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 193 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the river Lark. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 10. 5.; net income, £271; patron, Sir Charles Kent, Bart. Here is a national school.

VOL. III.—1

LACKINGTON, WHITE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of CHARD, hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, W. division of SOMERSET, 1½ mile (E. N. E.) from Ilminster; containing 283 inhabitants. It comprises 1465*a.* 3*r.* 11*p.*; the soil is generally productive, and there are quarries of stone, which is raised for building and for burning into lime. The Chard canal passes through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 10.; patron and appropriator, Prebendary of White Lackington in the Cathedral of Wells. The prebendal tithes have been commuted for £288, and the vicarial for £220; the prebendal glebe contains 38 acres, and the vicar's glebe comprises 1 acre. The church is an ancient structure, in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, but has been much defaced by injudicious alterations and enlargements. There is a parochial school, supported by subscription. A daughter of the Rev. Mr. Gyllet recently bequeathed £100 to the vicar, the interest to be distributed annually among the poor.

LACOCK, county of WILTS.—See LAYCOCK.

LACON, a township, in the parish and union of WEM, Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 84 inhabitants.

LADBROKE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SOUTHAM, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 1¼ mile (S.) from Southam; containing 252 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Oxford to Coventry, comprises 1928*a.* 3*r.* 27*p.*; limestone is plentiful, and is quarried for burning into lime, and for building and road-making. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 10.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Arthur Turner: the tithes have been commuted for £438. 5., and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, surmounted by a lofty and elegant spire, and contains several monuments, chiefly to the Palmer family. A school is supported by the rector.

LADOCK (St. LADOCK), a parish, in the union of TRURO, E. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 7 miles (N. E.) from Truro; containing 857 inhabitants. This parish, which derived its name from the saint to whom its ancient church is dedicated, is situated on the road to Falmouth, and comprises 4842 acres, whereof 2121 are common or waste. Iron-ore is found of very superior quality, and the produce of a mine discovered within the last few years is sent to Swansea to be smelted, and is found to make the best steel. At Trevilian, about three miles from the village, is an arm of the sea, navigable to Falmouth, by which coal, timber, and every requisite supply are easily obtained; the high road passes through the village, which is neatly built and pleasantly situated; and the small hamlet of Pessick is remarkable for the beauty of the scenery by which it is surrounded. A fair is held on the 10th of May. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Henry Ware: the tithes have been commuted for £700, and the glebe comprises 52 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the decorated English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Rev. John Elliot, in 1763, left £5 a year for teaching children; and two schoolrooms have been erected on the glebe land by the present incumbent, for the education of all the children of the parish at the expense of their parents.

LAGNESS, a hamlet, in the parish of PAGHAM, union of WEST HAMFNETT, hundred of ALDWICK, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX; containing 103 inhabitants.

LAINDON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of BILLERICAY, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Billericay; containing, with the chapelry of Basildon, 568 inhabitants. This parish, which obtained, from the clayey nature of the soil, the appellation of "Laindon-Clay," comprises 2372 acres, whereof 26 are waste; it forms a tract of flat marshy land, which has been rendered arable, producing abundant crops. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £35. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Bishop of London: the tithes of Laindon and Basildon have been commuted for £800; the glebe of Laindon comprises 30 acres, and that of Basildon 23 acres. The church, situated on rising ground, is an ancient edifice, with a tower of wood and a small spire, and consists of a nave, with a south aisle and chancel. About two miles distant is the chapel of Basildon, a handsome edifice with an embattled tower surmounted by a spire, and serving as a chapel of ease to the mother church. A national school is endowed with £20 per annum.

LAINSTON, an extra-parochial district, formerly a parish, in the hundred of MANSBRIDGE, union of NEW WINCHESTER, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. W.) from Winchester; containing 96 inhabitants. This place comprises by computation 155 acres of freehold land, of which about 110 are arable, 40 pasture, and the remainder wood. Lainston House, built in the reign of Charles II., and in a style corresponding to the palace which that monarch had partly erected at Winchester, is now occupied by Dr. Twynam, as a private asylum for insane persons; the house, which is replete with every accommodation, is situated in an ample demesne of 40 acres, richly wooded, and is approached by three lofty avenues of trees, of which the central is about half a mile, and the lateral about a quarter of a mile each in length. Near the house are the remains of the ancient church, now a ruin, and in which the original piscina is still preserved; the inhabitants attend divine service in the church of Sparsholt. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 13. 4.; net income, £34; patron, Sir F. H. Bathurst.

LAITH-KIRK, a chapelry, in the township of LUNEDALE, parish of ROMALD-KIRK, union of TEESDALE, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 9 miles (N. W.) from Barnard-Castle. The hamlet is situated to the west of the Lune, and near the confluence of that river with the Tees, which passes on the north. The chapel is an ancient edifice.

LAKE, a tything, in the parish of KINGSBURY-EPISCOPI, union of LANGPORT, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 30 inhabitants.

LAKE, a tything, in the parish of WILSFORD, union of AMESBURY, hundred of UNDERDITCH, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Amesbury; containing 74 inhabitants.

LAKENHAM, county NORFOLK.—See NORWICH.

LAKENHEATH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of MILDENHALL, hundred of LACKFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Mildenhall; containing 1579 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the Little Ouse, which is navigable; and comprises 10,918a. 37p. The soil is in some parts tolerably fertile, but a very considerable portion is marsh and fen land. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Undley, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £136; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Ely. There are places of worship for Huntingdonians and Wesleyans. George Goward, in 1744, founded a school, and endowed it with land producing £20 per annum. An allotment of 154 acres of fen has been set apart for the poor; and a sum exceeding £50, arising from benefactions, is annually distributed among them.

LALEHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of STAINES, hundred of SPELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Staines; containing 612 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Thames, and intersected by a branch of the Coln, comprises by computation 1290 acres, of which by far the greater portion is arable; the soil is rich and fertile; the surface is generally flat, and, in those parts near the river, subject to occasional inundation. The surrounding scenery is enlivened by the seat of the Earl of Lucan, in which are two rare and beautiful pillars of verde antique, brought from Italy by the present peer. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Staines; impropiator, G. Hartwell, Esq. The church is a small ancient structure, in the Norman style, with a low brick tower. Mrs. Reeves, in 1679, bequeathed some land, the income to be distributed to the poor.

LAMARSH (HOLY INNOCENTS), a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Halstead; containing 404 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the east by the river Stour, is about twenty miles in circumference; the surface is very unequal, rising considerably in some parts, and in others greatly depressed;

the soil is various, but generally fertile, a large portion being a rich sandy loam, producing abundant crops. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 0. 2½., and in the gift of John Sperling and William Downes, Esqrs. : the tithes have been commuted for £385, and the glebe comprises 94 acres. The church is a small low edifice of great antiquity, with a circular tower, the walls of which are of unusual thickness.

LAMAS, county of NORFOLK.—See LAMMAS.

LAMBCROFT, a hamlet, in the parish of KELSEY, union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 40 inhabitants.

LAMBERHURST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TICEHURST, partly in the hundred of BRENCHELY and HORSEMONDEN, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, but chiefly in the hundred of LOXFELD CAMDEN, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 15 miles (S. W. by S.) from Maidstone; containing 1572 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from London to Hastings, and comprises 5426a. 3r. 3p., of which a considerable portion is wood; the soil is generally a sandy clay; the surface is hilly, and the low lands are watered by a copious brook. There were formerly extensive iron-works in the parish, at which the balustrades for the cathedral of St. Paul were manufactured, from ore found in the neighbourhood; but they have been discontinued. A fair for cattle is held on the 6th of April, and is numerously attended. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 10. 5.; net income, £401; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Rochester. The church is in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, surmounted by a low spire, and contains some ancient monuments to the Scotney family, whose sepulchral chapel adjoins the south aisle: on the repair of the church in 1840, a beautiful arch was discovered between this chapel and the chancel, evidently of greater antiquity than the present church. Here is a place of worship for Baptists. Dame Elizabeth Hanby, in 1712, bequeathed a rent-charge of £6 for instruction; and there is a national school. At Scotney Castle is a mineral spring of the same quality as the celebrated springs of Tonbridge-Wells.

LAMBETH (St. Mary), a parish, and newly-enfranchised borough, in the E. division of the hundred of BRIXTON and of the county of SURREY; separated from Westminster by the river Thames, and containing, 115,888 inhabitants, of whom 41,377 are in Lambeth Church district. The name of this place, in the earliest records Lambethith, and in Domesday book Lanchei, is variously written by the ancient historians, and, according to Camden, implies a muddy station, or harbour; by other antiquaries it is supposed to have been originally Lambs Hithe, and to have denoted a haven belonging to some ancient proprietor of that name. Canute, on his invasion of London, in 1026, is said to have cut a trench through the parish, in order to convey his fleet to the west of London-bridge, of which Maitland, in his History of London, affirms that he discovered evident traces; but the origin of these trenches is by others attributed, with greater probability, to a temporary diversion of the course of the river, for the erection of London-bridge. The manor was given by Goda, sister of Edward the Confessor, to the see of Rochester, one of whose bishops, Gilbert de Glanville, finding the buildings of his see greatly dilapidated, erected at Lambeth, in 1197, a mansion for himself and his successors, which, being afterwards exchanged for other lands with Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, became the archiepiscopal residence. Archbishop Boniface having obtained from Pope Urban IV. the grant of a fourth part of the offerings at Becket's shrine, and permission to rebuild his house at Lambeth, laid the foundation of the present PALACE, which has been at various times enlarged and improved by his successors. Many of the metropolitan councils were held in the chapel of the palace while it belonged to the see of Rochester; in 1100, Archbishop Anselm convened an assembly to take into consideration the propriety of the marriage of Henry I. with Maud, daughter of the King of Scotland, who had taken the veil, though not the vows, as a nun. After the exchange, a council was held here by Archbishop Peckham, at which a subsidy of one-fifteenth was granted by the clergy for three years; and in 1282, the same prelate convoked a synod, at which all the bishops of the realm assisted, to deliberate upon the state of the Church of England, of which complaints had been made at Rome by the Bishop of Hereford. In 1381, the followers of Wat Tyler, after having barbarously put Archbishop Sudbury to death, attacked the palace, burnt the furniture and books, and destroyed all the registers and public papers. Henry VII. was, for some days previous to his coronation, sumptuously entertained in the palace by Archbishop Bourchier; and Catherine of Arragon, on her first arrival in England, remained there with her attendants for some days prior to her marriage. The palace was completely furnished by Queen Mary, for the reception of Cardinal Pole, whom she occasionally visited during his primacy; and Queen Elizabeth, during the time of Archbishops Parker and Whitgift, was a frequent guest at Lambeth, where she sometimes remained for several days. Prior to the Reformation, the archbishops had a prison in the palace, for the confinement of offenders against the ecclesiastical laws. To this prison Elizabeth committed the Catholic bishops Tunstall and Thirlby; the Earl of Essex, previously to his being sent to the Tower; the Earl of Southampton, Lord Stourton, Henry Howard, brother of the Duke of Norfolk, and various other persons.

In 1641 Archbishop Laud was attacked by a puritanical mob of 500 persons, who assailed the palace at midnight; but having received intimation of their design, he had so fortified it as to preclude their doing further injury than breaking the windows. After the impeachment of Laud, an ordinance was issued by the house of commons, for removing the arms from Lambeth palace, which was carried into effect by Captain Roydon at the head of 200 infantry and a troop of horse; and in November following, Captain Brown entered to take possession of the palace for the parliament. It was subsequently converted into a prison by the house of commons, and among the prisoners confined there were the Earls of Chesterfield and Derby; Sir Thomas Armstrong, who was eventually executed at Kennington for having taken part in Monmouth's rebellion; Sir George Bunkley, and some others. The palace, being afterwards put up for sale, was purchased by Thomas Scott and Matthew Hardy, the former of whom, secretary to Cromwell, sate in judgment at the trial of Charles I., and was hanged as a regicide at Charing-Cross. Upon the Restoration, Lambeth palace reverted to its rightful owners, and became the residence of the archbishops. It has at various times afforded an asylum to learned foreigners, whom the intolerant spirit of their own countrymen compelled to abandon their native land; among these were the early reformers, Martyr and Bucer, the learned Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalatro, and numerous others.

This venerable pile of building, which has lately undergone a very extensive repair, and to which considerable additions have been made by the present archbishop, Dr. Howley, is situated on the south bank of the river Thames, and exhibits in its architecture the styles of various ages. The principal entrance, through an arched gateway, flanked by two square embattled towers of brick, leads into the outer court, on the right hand of which is the great hall, rebuilt after the civil war by Archbishop Juxon, and now converted into a library by the present archbishop. It is a lofty structure of brick, strengthened with buttresses, and ornamented with cornices and quoins of stone; the interior is lighted by ranges of lofty windows, and by a double lantern turret rising from the roof, which is finely arched, and richly ornamented with carved oak; in one of the windows are some heraldic devices in stained glass, and over the fire-places, at each end, are the arms, richly emblazoned, of Archbishop Bancroft, the founder of the library, and of Archbishop Secker, by whom it was augmented. Beyond the library is the chapel, which is by far the most ancient part of the building; it is in the earliest style of English architecture, lighted on the sides by triple lancet-shaped windows, and by an east window of five lights. The ancient painted glass, containing a series of subjects from the Old and the New Testament, the repairing of which was, on his trial, imputed as a crime to Archbishop Laud, was afterwards destroyed by the Parliamentary Commissioners; the roof, which is flat and divided into compartments, is embellished with the arms of that prelate. A massive oak screen, richly carved, separates a portion of the western extremity from that part of the chapel which is fitted up for divine service. Underneath the chapel is a spacious crypt, the roof of which is finely groined; and to the west of it is the Lollard's tower, a lofty square embattled structure of stone, similar to that of the chapel, and formerly used as a prison. The guard-room has been taken down, and rebuilt for a banquet hall; it is of Bath stone, and in the later English style; the original oak roof, of similar character to that of the library, has been carefully preserved; the hall is lighted by a range of four lofty windows, and parallel with it is a picture gallery of equal length, the whole forming a prominent and interesting feature in the new edifice. From the first court a handsome archway on the right leads into the area in which the additional buildings have been erected. These form a fine range, also in the later English style, consisting of an elegant arched entrance between two lofty octagonal embattled turrets, and surmounted by an oriel window, to the right of which is another richly canopied; the front towards the garden is also decorated with embattled turrets and several oriel windows, one of which is of very large dimensions and elegant design; this portion of the building contains the state apartments, lodging-rooms, and the various offices requisite for the household establishment. The gardens and park, comprising thirteen acres, are tastefully laid out, and through the latter is a pleasant carriage road to the palace. Carlisle House, formerly the residence of the bishops of Rochester, and at that time called La Place, was given by Henry VIII. to Aldridge, Bishop of Carlisle, and, after having been for many years occupied as a private academy, has almost disappeared in the recent improvements of the parish, and only some portions of the outer walls are remaining.

LAMBETH, originally a detached village, is now in fact united with Southwark, and forms a suburb of the metropolis. The great road from London to Portsmouth passes through the parish, by Vauxhall; a new road, leading from Waterloo-bridge to Newington, is connected with the preceding, and with other roads diverging into the counties of Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire; and the Southampton railway has its terminus at Nine-Elms, near Vauxhall-bridge, where a station has been erected on the bank of the Thames, communicating with the various steam-boats on the river. There are two establishments for supplying Thames water to the district, namely, the Lambeth water-works, situated in Belvidere-road, and the South London water-works at Vauxhall-bridge; and a very extensive reservoir has been constructed on Brixton-hill, for supplying that neighbourhood. The place was formerly celebrated for its medicinal well, of which the memorial is preserved in the name of a public-house called the Fountain; and for its numerous places of public resort, the principal of which were Cupar's-gardens, and Spring-gardens, now Vauxhall, the latter of which continued to be a place of fashionable amusement until Sept. 1841, when it was sold by auction for £20,200: a portion of the ground will be laid out in building, but the principal part is still reserved for public gardens, and was re-opened on 7th July, 1842. In the parish are also Astley's amphitheatre, near Westminster-bridge, and the Royal Victoria theatre, in the Waterloo-road. Lambeth, extending for a considerable way on the bank of the river, and connected with the opposite shore by Waterloo, Westminster, and Vauxhall bridges, is admirably situated for the carrying on of extensive works of every kind; and, in addition to what may be considered as the general trade of the place, there are, on the largest scale, lime, coal, and timber wharfs; iron and other foundries; saw-mills; manufactories for axle-trees, carriages, patent buoys, floor-cloth, Morocco and Spanish leather, pins, varnish, saltpetre, soap, starch, whitening, and patent-shot (of which the lofty towers form conspicuous objects on the bank of the river); potteries of stone and earthenware, glass-works, distilleries, ale and beer breweries, vitriol and other chemical-works, and vinegar-works. There is also a very extensive establishment for making steam-engines, and almost every other kind of machinery; besides artificial stone works, and numerous other establishments of various kinds. The parish is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests held in the borough of Southwark, for the recovery of debts under £5, and is likewise within the limits of the New Police act. By the act of the 2nd of William IV. cap. 45, a district of 5708 acres was constituted a borough, with the privilege of sending two representatives to parliament; the right of election is vested in the £10 householders, and the returning officer is annually appointed by the sheriff for the county.

The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £32. 15. 7½.; net income, £2277; patron, Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, adjoining the palace, and rebuilt in the latter part of the fourteenth century, is a spacious structure, in the early and decorated English styles, with some later insertions, and having a square embattled tower of freestone, with an octagonal turret at one of the angles. The interior comprises the chapels of the Howard and Leigh families, subsequently erected, and contains numerous ancient and interesting records. In one of the windows of the nave is the figure of a pedler with his dog, painted in glass, supposed to be the rebus of a person named Chapman, who is thought to have given a piece of land to the parish, which is called Pedler's Acre, formerly producing two shillings and sixpence per annum, but now more than £200. Among the interments are those of Archbishops Bancroft, Secker, Tenison, Hutton, and Cornwallis; of Tunstall, Bishop of Durham; Thirlby, Bishop of Ely; and other distinguished prelates; also several of the Howards, and other illustrious families. There is a curious monument of Colonel Robert Scot, and one of Elias Ashmole, who presented to the University of Oxford the museum which is distinguished by his name; and of the numerous tombs in the churchyard are those of William Faden, the original printer of the Public Ledger; and John Tradescant, the primary collector of the Ashmolean Museum. The burial-ground in High-street was consecrated in 1705. Four district churches were erected in the parish in 1824, by aid of the Parliamentary Commissioners, who granted one moiety of the cost, and a loan of the other moiety, to be repaid by a rate on the inhabitants. St. John's, in the Waterloo-road, built at an expense of £15,911, is a handsome structure, in the Grecian style, with a tower of two stages, of which the upper is surmounted by a neat spire, terminating in a ball and cross; it has a fine portico of six columns of the Doric order, supporting an entablature and triangular pediment. St. Mark's at Kennington, St. Matthew's at Brixton-Causeway, and St. Luke's at Norwood, are described in the accounts of those places. The four livings are all district incumbencies, in the patronage of the Rector of Lambeth; net income of St. John's, £483. St. Mary's district church, at Lambeth-Butts, erected in 1828, also by a grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £7634, is a neat edifice, in the later English style, with a campanile turret surmounted by a spire: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £170; patron, Rector of Lambeth. An additional church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, to which a district has also been assigned, was erected in 1839, on a site given by the Archbishop, by grants from the Diocesan Society and the Metropolitan Churches' Fund, aided by subscriptions; it is a neat edifice of brick, in the early Norman style, with a tower, and contains 1200 sittings, of which 200 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector. Another church was erected in Carlisle-street, and consecrated in 1839, containing 1000 sittings, whereof 500 are free; and at Park-road, a church, in the later English style, with a tower and spire, was completed in 1841, at an expense of £4819, by the Church Commissioners; it contains 1230 sittings, of which 572 are free. There is a chapel of ease to the rectory, at Stockwell; and Carlisle chapel in Kennington-lane, St. Matthew's at Denmark Hill, and the chapel at South Lambeth, are proprietary Episcopal chapels. Her Majesty's Commissioners lately made a conditional grant for a new church in the Waterloo district; and there are places of worship for Baptists, Wesleyans, Welsh Methodists, Swedenborgians, Independents, and others.

A parochial school for boys is supported by subscription and a fund of nearly £1200 in the three per cents., and is held in a schoolroom neatly rebuilt, on ground belonging to the see of Canterbury; a parochial school for girls, established in 1780, is maintained by subscription and a fund of £400 in the three per cents. Archbishop Tenison, in 1715, founded a girls' school, of which the endowment, augmented with subsequent benefactions, produces about £350 per annum. Richard Lawrence, in 1661, gave two houses, with ground attached, for which foundation a neat and commodious building was erected in 1808, in the York-road, in which children are instructed. St. John's school, in the Waterloo-road, was rebuilt by subscription, at an expense of £2200, to which George IV. gave £100, and the National Society a similar sum. The Eldon School, on the road to Wandsworth, was instituted in 1830, for the instruction of children, and the training of young men to act as teachers, on the national system; the building, which is in the later English style, was erected in commemoration of Lord Chancellor Eldon, at the expense of Charles Francis, Esq. The Licensed Victuallers' school, for children of deceased and indigent members of that society, is a spacious modern edifice, with a lofty portico of four Corinthian columns. The asylum for female orphans, and for the reception of deserted females, the settlement of whose parents cannot be found, was instituted in 1758, and incorporated in 1800, and is under the patronage of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge: the buildings occupy three sides of a quadrangle, in the central range of which is a handsome chapel; and there are 140 children in the school. The General Lying-in Hospital, for the reception of patients from any part of the kingdom, and for the delivery of out-patients at their own habitations in the metropolis and its environs, was instituted in 1765, and incorporated in 1830. The Royal Universal Infirmary for children, in the Waterloo-road, is supported by subscription, and is under the patronage of Her Majesty. The Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, which has a fund of £25,000, and is also maintained by donations, was instituted in 1784, for the relief of distressed Irish families in London and its environs, and for the education of their children; and a handsome and capacious building was erected in Upper Stamford-street, in 1820, at an expense of £8000, comprising two schoolrooms, with a house for the master and the mistress, committee-rooms, and other offices. Sir Noel Caron, in 1623, gave a rent-charge of £28 for the maintenance of an almshouse, for the support of seven aged widows, which has been augmented by an appropriation of a part of large sums of money bequeathed by Thomas, Earl of Thanet. Almshouses have also been erected in Coldharbour-lane, for eight widows; and there are numerous and extensive charitable bequests for distribution among the necessitous. In the arrangements under the Poor Law Amendment act, the parish is not united to any other.

LAMBLEY, a parish, in the union of HALTWHISTLE, W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Haltwhistle; containing 249 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and in the reign of John, a Benedictine nunnery, dedicated to God, St. Mary, and St. Patrick, was founded here, either by that monarch or by Adam de Tindale, which, in 1296, was burnt by the Scots, who plundered and laid waste the neighbourhood; the establishment was subsequently restored, and continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was valued at £5. 15. 8. The parish is situated on the South Tyne, and comprises 2854a. 2r. 10p., of which 368 acres are arable, 221 meadow, 175 woodland, and 1089 pasture, with a tract of common containing 1000 acres by computation. The surface is rugged, and the scenery wild, but the banks of the river are well wooded, and in some parts beautifully picturesque; the prevailing timber is oak, ash, elm, and sycamore; the soil is generally light, and the chief produce oats, barley, and potatoes. The Allgood family are the possessors of the estate that belonged to the ancient monastery. The living is a donative, in the patronage of R. L. Allgood, Esq. The church, repaired a few years since, by subscription, is an humble edifice, standing at the south end of the village of Harperton, and about a quarter of a mile from the site of the monastery, which occupied a charming seclusion, on a haugh, upon the left bank of the Tyne. On Castle Hill, the site of an old fortress, are vestiges of a deep moat, and lower down the river have been discovered some large coffins of oak, black as jet.

LAMBLEY (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of BASFORD, S. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Nottingham; containing 983 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2092 acres; the soil in some parts is a reddish marl, resting on clay, and in others of lighter quality; the surface is hilly, and the surrounding scenery boldly varied. The village, which is extensive, is situated in a deep vale, sheltered by ranges of hills rising in the form of an amphitheatre. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 16. 3.; net income, £476; patron and incumbent, Rev. A. D. Flamsteed, of Lambley House.

LAMBOURN (St. MICHAEL), a market-town and parish, in the union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of LAMBOURN, county of BERKS; containing, with the tythings of Blagrave, Bockhampton, Eastbury, Hadley, and Upper Lambourn, 2595 inhabitants, of whom 398 are in Upper Lambourn, and 1333 in the town of Chipping-Lambourn, 5 miles (N.) from Hungerford, and 68 (W.) from London. This place formed part of the dower of Ealswitha, queen of Alfred the Great, and continued in royal demesne under Edward the Confessor; after the Conquest it was given to the baronial family of Fitzwarren, at whose instance a market and three fairs were granted to it by Henry III. The town is pleasantly situated in a hilly district; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells, and in the centre of the town is an ancient cross, consisting of a tall pillar, approached by a circular ascent of steps, and surmounted by an ornamented capital, supposed to have been originally the figure of a sphynx, but now nearly obliterated. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on May 12th, October 14th, and December 4th, chiefly for cattle. The parish comprises 14,425a. 3r. 4p.; the soil is partly good corn land, and partly down land, which, since the inclosure, has been under tillage; the low grounds are watered by a river which takes its name from the town, and which, during the summer, affords an abundant supply, but during the winter months is nearly dry. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £154; patron, Dean of St. Paul's: the impropriation belongs to Mrs. Clark. The church is an ancient and handsome cruciform structure, in the early English style, with a square embattled tower; in the interior are two chantry chapels, in one of which the inmates of some adjoining almshouses assemble every morning for prayers. A church was built and endowed at Lambourn-Woodlands, in 1837, by the Misses Seymour, of Speen: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the founders, who presented, as first incumbent, the Rev. John Bacon, grandson of the celebrated sculptor of that name. A national school has also been established, and is chiefly supported by the Misses Seymour. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school was erected in 1735, by Organ Hipsley, Esq., and endowed with a small rent-charge; and another was founded in 1792, by John Serjent, and endowed with a messuage and rent-charge of £11. On the north side of the church is an hospital, established in 1502, for ten men; and some ancient almshouses, now called Place Almshouses, were rebuilt in 1827, by the Rev. Henry Hipsley.

LAMBOURN, or LAMBOURNE (St. MARY AND ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Romford; containing 904 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the river Roding, and comprises by measurement 2437 acres, of which 737 are arable, 1296 pasture, 118 wood, 229 forest, and 24 common; the soil is heavy, but the substratum light, and rather inclining to chalk. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £600, and the glebe comprises 34 acres. The church, a neat rustic building, consists of a nave and chancel, with a leaden spire; in the chancel are three windows of stained glass, and a fourth contains five pieces of curious and valuable old painting; near the altar is a tablet to the memory of Wynniffe, who, nearly two centuries since, was rector of Lambourn and Bishop of Lincoln. A chapel of ease was built in 1833, in the village of Abridge, where are also a place of worship for Wesleyans, and a national school. Two schools are partly supported by subscription. Spencer, who was a soldier in the army of Pope Adrian, in his wars against the Duke of Milan, and who, in 1370, was made Bishop of Norwich, lived in the parish.

LAMBRIGG, a township, in the parish, union, and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Kendal; containing 143 inhabitants. A vein of copper-ore was formerly worked.

LAMBROOK, EAST (St. JAMES), a chapelry, in the parish of KINGSBURY-EPISCOPI, union of LANGPORT, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Langport; containing, with the hamlet of Middle Lambrook, 374 inhabitants. This place is bounded on the east by the river Parret. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 8.; net income, £157; patron, Vicar of Kingsbury-Episcopi. A neat parsonage-house has lately been erected. There is a place of worship for Independents.

LAMBROOK, WEST, a tything, in the parish of KINGSBURY-EPISCOPI, union of LANGPORT, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Langport; containing 192 inhabitants.

LAMBTON, a township in the parish and union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Chester-le-Street; containing 120 inhabitants. The township, which is situated to the north of Little Lumley, and skirted by the road from Chester-le-Street, over the river Wear, to Houghton-le-Spring, comprises 634 acres of productive grass land. Lambton Hall formerly stood here, and was the residence of the Lambton family until the death of William Lambton, Esq., at the close of the eighteenth century; a considerable portion of the beautiful park, five miles in circumference, which surrounds the modern edifice of Lambton Castle, at Har-raton, extends into this township. Just within the entrance to the park is the site of an ancient chapel; and near it Worm Hill, of which tradition says that it was once occupied by a formidable serpent, which was cut to pieces by some hero of the Lambton family, cased in armour set with razors for the purpose. The Durham Junction railway passes to the south-east of the place. A girls' school is supported by the Earl of Durham. Two brine springs, from which salt is made, issue from the bottom of two coal-pits in the township.

LAMERTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Tavistock and S. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Tavistock; containing 1288 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Tavistock to Launceston, and comprises 5488 acres, of which 1147 are common or waste. Manganese is wrought extensively; slate is quarried for exportation, and good building-stone is found in abundance. Collacombe, an old mansion built in the reign of Elizabeth, and since converted into a farm-house, has a large transom window, containing 3200 panes of glass. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 2. 1., and in the gift of J. H. Tremayne, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £397, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church, which formerly belonged to Tavistock Abbey, is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, and contains an interesting monument to Thomas Tremayne and his wife, with their eight sons and eight daughters. Divine service is also performed in a licensed schoolroom, four miles from the church, by a curate appointed by the vicar. There are places of worship for Bible Christians; and national schools are supported by subscription. £20 per annum were bequeathed to the poor by the late Arthur Tremayne, Esq., of Sydenham. Rowe, the poet, was a native of the place.

LAMESLEY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, Middle division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.)

from Gateshead; containing 2262 inhabitants, of whom 1846 are in Lamesley township. This chapelry includes the townships of Lamesley, Ravensworth, Kibblesworth, and Hedley, and comprises by computation 6648 acres, of which two-thirds are arable land; the surface is undulated, the soil principally clay, and suited to the growth of wheat, and the scenery pleasing and diversified. Ravensworth Vale, in which the castle of that name stands, is greatly admired for its beauty, being well wooded, and having the river Team flowing through it. There are extensive coal-mines, and several quarries for grindstones and for building; and iron-stone is found in some parts contiguous to the coal. The Team, or Eighton-Moor colliery, of which Baron Ravensworth, as lord of the manor, is sole proprietor, is now held under lease by William Wharton Burdon, Esq., and has been leased by his family since 1795, previously to which time it was wrought by Lord Ravensworth: the original site was on the west side of the Team rivulet, where several of the old pits are yet to be seen, but the present "winning" is on the east of the stream; about 230 workmen are employed. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £138, which includes £20 per annum, being a commutation for petty tithes and Easter-offerings; patron and impropiator, Lord Ravensworth. In 1843, a glebe-house was erected in the Elizabethan style, on a site given by his Lordship. The chapel existed before 1286, when the collegiate church of Chester was founded, which possessed the patronage till the Dissolution, and in which Lamesley formed the second prebend: the edifice was rebuilt in 1759; a tower was added in 1821, and a vestry a few years since. At Eighton-Banks are two small places of worship for Wesleyans. A girls' school on the national plan near Ravensworth Castle, has an endowment of £21 per annum by Lady Ravensworth; and there is a school in the village of Lamesley, endowed by Lord Ravensworth with £30 per annum. A boys' school at Eighton-Banks is maintained by subscription, aided by £10 annually from the same noble lord; and a girls' school at this place is aided by £10 from Lady Ravensworth. An almshouse was erected near Lamesley, in 1838, at the expense of her ladyship, for eight aged persons, who are supported by her bounty.

LAMMAS (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of AYLHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Coltishall; containing, with the parish of Little Hautbois, 299 inhabitants, of whom 257 are in Lammas. These united parishes comprise by estimation 829 acres, of which 647 are arable, 150 pasture, and the remainder woodland. The village and church are picturesquely situated on the east bank of the navigable river Bure, which bounds the parish on the north and west. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Little Hautbois united, in the gift of the Rev. W. H. Marsh: the tithes of the two parishes have been commuted for £240, and the glebe consists of 36 acres. The church of Lammas is an ancient structure, in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower; the font is handsomely sculptured, and in the chancel are neat monuments to the Marsh and Chandler families. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends; also a school, supported by subscription. The church of Hautbois has been entirely destroyed for many years.

LAMONBY, a township, in the parish of SKELTON, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Penrith; containing 246 inhabitants. Here is a quarry of freestone.

LAMORRAN (St. MORAN), a parish, in the union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Tregony; containing 99 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the navigable river Fal, and indented by a creek of that river, to which it gives name. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the gift of the Earl of Falmouth: the tithes have been commuted for £153, and the glebe comprises 42 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient edifice, situated on the border of Lamorran Creek, with a detached tower mantled with ivy and concealed by foliage; it is supposed to be part of a monastery or cell which once existed here.

LAMPLUGH (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 9 miles (E. N. E.) from Whitehaven; containing, with the townships of Kelton, Murton, and Winder, 645 inhabitants, of whom 190 are in the township of Lamplugh. The parish is bounded on the east by Loweswater and Crummockwater, and comprises 4876a. 2r. 39p., of inclosed land, and 1475 acres of common. Two branches of the river Marron have their sources here. There are extensive quarries of limestone, and some of freestone. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 4. 7., and in the gift of John Lamplugh L. Raper, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £300, and the glebe comprises 2 acres. Richard Briscoe, Esq., in 1747, gave a rent-charge of £12, partly to the poor, and partly for instruction. Near the ancient hall is a mineral spring, the water of which is powerfully astrigent.

LAMPOR, a hamlet, in the parish of STOWE, union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM; containing 76 inhabitants.

LAMPOR (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BRIKWORTH, hundred of ORLINGBURY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Northampton; containing, with the hamlet of Hanging-Houghton and the chapelry of Faxton, 342 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 2646 acres, and, with Faxton, 4421, of which by far the greater portion is rich pasture; about 50 acres are strong wheat land and about 400 red turnip soil. The surface is varied; the village is situated on a hill, commanding some pleasing views, but the greater part of the parish is seated in a valley. There are some quarries of stone for building and for road-making. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £48. 2. 6.; net income, £1085; patron, Sir J. Isham, Bart. The tithes were commuted for corn-rents, under an act of inclosure, in 1794; the glebe comprises 53 acres. The church is an ancient structure. At Faxton is a chapel of ease. A school was endowed by Sir Edmund Isham, who, in the year 1762, gave £1500 for this purpose, and for the benefit of the poor; and there is a fund of £66 per annum, arising from 41 acres of land, assigned on the inclosure in lieu of other land purchased by a bequest of Sir Justinian Isham, in 1670, for apprenticing boys.

LAMYATT (St. MARY AND St. JOHN), a parish, in the union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of WHITE-

STONE, E. division of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Bruton; containing 255 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1000 acres: there are quarries of stone for building, and for the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 4. 2.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. G. Copleston: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 43 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in good repair. A school is supported by the rector.

LANCASHIRE, a maritime county, situated on the western coast, and bounded on the north by Cumberland and Westmorland, on the east by Yorkshire, on the south by Cheshire, and on the west by the Irish Sea: it extends from $53^{\circ} 20'$ to $54^{\circ} 25'$ (N. Lat.) and from $2^{\circ} 3'$ to $3^{\circ} 13'$ (W. Lon.), and contains 1831 square miles, or 1,171,840 statute acres. Within the limits of the county are 289,184 houses inhabited, 23,639 uninhabited, and 3680 in the progress of erection; and the population amounts to 1,667,054, of which number 814,847 are males, and 852,207 females. The name of this county is a contraction of Lancastershire. Its early British inhabitants were the Setantii, a tribe of the Brigantes; under the Roman dominion it was included in the province called Maxima Cæsariensis, and on the conquest by the Saxons it formed part of the kingdom of Deira. It is in the province of York; and under the ecclesiastical arrangements, pursuant to the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 77, the deanery of Furness and Cartmel is to be placed in the diocese of Carlisle, and the remainder of the county will be in the new diocese of Manchester: the total number of parishes is 66. For civil purposes it is divided into the hundreds of Amounderness, Blackburn (Higher and Lower), Leyland, Lonsdale (north and south of the Sands), Salford, and West Derby. It contains the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Lancaster and Liverpool; the borough and market towns of Ashton-under-Line, Blackburn, Bolton, Bury, Clitheroe, Manchester, Oldham, Preston, Rochdale, Salford, Warrington, and Wigan; the market and sea-port towns of Poulton-in-the-Fylde and Ulverstone; and the market-towns of Burnley, Cartmel, Chorley, Colne, Dalton, Garstang, Haslingden, Hawkshead, Hornby, Kirkham, Middleton, Ormskirk, Prescott, and Todmorden. Under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the county was divided into two portions, called the Northern and Southern Divisions, each sending two representatives to parliament; and each of the boroughs returns two members, except Ashton, Bury, Clitheroe, Rochdale, Salford, and Warrington. The county is included in the northern circuit: the assizes for the southern division are held at Liverpool, and those for the northern at Lancaster, where are also held the quarter-sessions for the hundred of Lonsdale, on the Tuesdays in the first whole week after Epiphany, Easter-Sunday, the festival of St. Thomas à Becket, and October 11th. The quarter-sessions for the hundreds of Amounderness, Blackburn, and Leyland, are held at Preston, on the Thursdays following the days above-named; for the hundred of Salford, at Salford, on the Mondays following; and for the hundred of West Derby, at Kirkdale, near Liverpool, on the Monday fortnight after they commence at Salford. The court of Annual General Sessions is holden at Preston, on the Thursday next after the feast of St. John the Baptist, and afterwards by various adjournments until the multifarious causes within the peculiar cognizance of the court are determined. The county gaol is at Lancaster; and there are county houses of correction at Manchester, Kirkdale, and Preston.

Prior to and under the Norman dynasty, Lancashire was probably distinguished as an HONOUR, and was of the superior order of seigniories. It was given by William the Conqueror to Roger de Poitou, who in turn bestowed various parts of it upon his followers; but in the Norman survey the lands between the Ribble and the Mersey are described as the property of the king, having been forfeited by the defection of that nobleman. The Honour of Lancaster was, however, restored to him by William Rufus, in whose reign he again forfeited it by rebellion; and this princely inheritance was transferred to Stephen, Count of Blois, who, on ascending the throne, bestowed it upon his son, William de Blois, Earl of Montaigne and Boulogne; and, on the death of this nobleman, Richard I. assigned it to his brother John, afterwards King of England. Henry III. first gave the honour and estates to Ranulph, Earl of Chester, from whom they descended to William de Ferrers, who married Agnes, one of the earl's daughters: they were forfeited to the crown by Robert de Ferrers, grandson of William, who had taken part with Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester. Henry then presented them to his son Edmund, and from him they descended to Thomas, second Earl of Lancaster, who was beheaded at Pontefract for rebellion in the reign of Edward II. In the 1st of Edward III., the estates were granted to Henry, brother of Thomas, and his son Henry was created Duke of Lancaster in the 25th of this monarch's reign. John of Gaunt, Edward's son, having married Blanche, daughter of Henry, Duke of Lancaster, the title was revived in his favour. Edward III., in the year 1363, advanced the county to the dignity of a PALATINATE, with all the powers and privileges appertaining thereto, under the authority of the duke; and the duchy has now for ages been annexed to the crown. The county palatine and the duchy of Lancaster, with regard to extent, are quite distinct, as there are various estates forming part of the duchy in twenty-five other counties in England: a considerable share of ecclesiastical patronage is attached to the duchy, as is also the appointment of sheriffs for the county palatine. The peculiar jurisdiction and proceedings of the courts of law in the county palatine are the result of those privileges granted to its former dukes, who had, in fact, sovereign authority within the limits of their dominion. But by the 27th of Henry VIII. the privileges of counties palatine were abridged, and it was enacted that all writs and processes should be made in the name of the king, but should be tested or witnessed in the name of the owner of the franchise. All writs, therefore, must be under the seal of the respective franchises; and the judges who preside in this county palatine have a special commission from the duchy of Lancaster, and not the ordinary commission under the great seal of England. The court of chancery of the duchy has cognizance of matters of an equitable nature, relating either to the county palatine or the duchy, and of all questions of revenue and council affecting the ducal possessions; it is also a court of appeal from the chancery of the county palatine. The court of chancery of the county palatine is an original and independent court, as ancient as the 50th of Edward III. The court of common pleas is an original superior court of record at common law, having jurisdiction over all real actions for lands, and in all actions against corporations within the county, as well as over all personal actions where the defendant resides in Lancashire, although the cause of action may have arisen elsewhere; its returns are on the first Wednesday in every month.

The SURFACE of the county is very irregular in form, owing to the deviousness of its boundaries on the land side, and the indentation of its coast by numerous bays and estuaries. It is naturally divided into two grand districts,—the high, mountainous, heathy tract of the northern and eastern parts, and the low level country which spreads out to the south and west; and for greater clearness may be subdivided into the following districts, viz., the hilly and high heathy division, comprising different mountainous ridges which rise in succession on the south-eastern border of the county, throughout the whole of which the land is almost invariably of the high moory freestone kind, and generally produces a coarse black heath, except only where the vales intervene; the steep fell, or High Furness division, situated north of the Sands, the latter being the extensive flat tracts of the bay of Morecambe, which are always dry at low water; the elevated craggy limestone division, of which the greater portion lies chiefly in the north-western part of the county, with small tracts in the Furness districts, and at the two Kellets, also at Chipping and Clitheroe towards its eastern border; the valley land division, including the various valleys formed by the hills that constitute the two first divisions, in which the land is mostly of an excellent quality; the Mersey, or southern, division, a fertile and level tract lying between that river and the Ribble, and stretching from the sea-coast eastward to some distance above the town of Oldham; the Ribble and Fylde division; the Lune and flat limestone division; the Low Furness division; and the moss or peaty division, including the different tracts called mosses, which are found in both of the grand natural divisions of the county, but are by far the more extensive in the flat district. Besides these districts there are divers tracts of sandy marsh land, bordering on the sea-coast, chiefly towards the northern extremity of the county, which are exposed to occasional inundations of the tide.

The principal SOILS are loams of various kinds, clay, sand, and peat earth, chiefly resting on substrata of freestone, whin-stone, or limestone rocks, fossil coal, marl, gravel, and sand. It has been computed that a little more than one-fourth of the surface is under tillage: the principal tracts of arable land lie towards the western border of the county, including those of the Fylde, the banks of the Lune, and Low Furness, most of which are excellent wheat lands: on the eastern side of the county the grain chiefly cultivated is oats, of which great quantities are also grown in all the corn districts. The most common Crops are wheat, barley, oats, beans, and potatoes; but a greater proportion of oats than of any other grain is grown, much oaten bread being consumed by the population of the northern and eastern parts of the county. Great attention is bestowed on the cultivation of potatoes, which are extensively grown in all parts: onions are grown to a considerable extent in the neighbourhood of Middleton, Stretford, and other places near Warrington. Very fine crops of clover are cultivated, the seed being generally sown with wheat. By far the greater part of the county is under Grass, a vast quantity of hay being requisite for the consumption of the horses and cattle belonging to the inhabitants of the towns; and a considerable extent of grass land is occupied as bleaching-grounds. In the greater part of the county, and more especially in the eastern and northern parts, are large tracts of pasture land of inferior and unimproved condition, on which young stock are reared and kept. The most extensive dairy pastures are on the strong soil north of the Ribble, the produce of which is principally cheese, and in different parts of the Fylde: there are many small dairy-farms in the eastern part of the county, and in the vicinity of all the large towns are kept numerous and extensive dairies for supplying the inhabitants with milk. In the northern and eastern parts are many extensive, mountainous, and moory tracts of land, provincially called "fells," which support vast numbers of sheep throughout the greater part of the year: on Furness fells it is reckoned that not less than 50,000 sheep are kept during the summer months. Near all the large towns are plots of considerable extent applied to the growth of vegetables and fruit, more especially in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, where the horticultural fields are very extensive, affording not only an ample supply for that town, but a great quantity of vegetables for the shipping: considerable quantities of dried herbs are shipped for the coast of Africa, and onions also are exported.

The quantity of waste mountain land is computed at about 62,000 acres; and that of the mosses and marshes at about 36,000, of which 20,000 are contained in the mosses, and the remainder in the marshes, the latter being mostly on the western coast. The woodlands are chiefly in the more central part of the county, in the vicinity of Garstang, on the banks of the Wyre, the Ribble, the Lune, and some other rivers, and in the parks of several of the nobility and gentry. The principal coppice woods are in the northern part, the land on which they grow being generally steep and rocky, and unfit for any other purpose; their chief produce is hoop-wood, charcoal, props for the coal-mines, and oak-bark. Various modern plantations have been made in different parts; the alder-tree is in great request in the manufacturing districts, on which to hang cotton-yarn to dry, the wood acquiring a fine polish by use, and not splintering from exposure to the weather; the bark is used in dyeing. The chief MINERAL productions are coal, copper, lead, and iron. The strata of coal for the most part seem to lie in three distinct parallel ranges, extending across the county from south-west to north-east: in some places they are at a very great depth, while in others they approach close to the surface, and they also vary greatly in thickness and quality, even in the different shafts of the same colliery: coal of a black, compact, and marbly appearance, called "cannel coal," is found chiefly at Haigh, near Wigan. The principal tract in which copper is found to any great extent is among the rugged barren mountains in the northernmost part of High Furness, approaching the border of Cumberland, where the ore obtained is of the yellow sort, and yields comparatively but little metal. Lead-ore is chiefly found in the north and east parts of the county, but it is nowhere obtained in great quantities; and there are also some veins of black-lead. The only part where iron-ore is found in sufficient quantities to be worked is in the liberty of Furness. The county produces an abundance of slate, flag-stones, limestone, and freestone. The blue slate quarries are very numerous, but are chiefly in the rocky mountainous tracts of the northern part of High Furness: slate of a lighter colour and very inferior quality is raised at different places, south of the Sands, where flag-stones are obtained. Quarries of freestone are wrought in most parts south of the Sands: the best sort of stones for sharpening scythes are found and prepared at Rainford. Small tracts of limestone exist in different parts, and numerous quarries are worked.

The pre-eminence of the Lancashire MANUFACTURES over those of the other districts in England where the inhabitants are similarly engaged, has long been known and acknowledged. These manufactures are various; but that of cotton in its different branches is by far the most important, and is one of the most extensive in the world. Manchester is its grand centre, and from that town it has spread over the adjoining and more northern parts of the county, as well as into the adjacent counties on the east and south. The steam-looms are chiefly employed in the production of printing-cloth and shirting; but they also weave thicksets, fancy cords, dimities, cambrics, and quiltings, besides silks, worsted, and woollen broad-cloths. Inkles, tapes, and checks, with woollens, flannels, baizes, and linens, all rank among the manufactures of this county, and have each their proper seat. The silk trade, which had formerly flourished to a considerable extent, but fell into decay in consequence of the rapid growth of the cotton business, has of late been revived, and is now carried on with increased activity. The spinning and manufacture of cotton prevail at Manchester, Oldham, Colne, Burnley, Haslingden, Preston, Accrington, Bury, Middleton, Ashton, Bolton, Chorley, Blackburn, Heap, Stayley, Wigan, Eccles, Bacup, Chowbent, Rochdale, &c.; calico-printing and bleaching at Manchester, Blackburn, Bolton, Bury, Accrington, and Chorley; muslins are made at Manchester, Bolton, Chorley, and Preston; and fustians at Manchester, Oldham, Bury, Bolton, Warrington, and Heap. The manufacture of woollen goods is extensively pursued at Manchester, Bury, Bacup, Newchurch, Rochdale, and Heap; flannels are made at Manchester, Rochdale, and Haslingden. There are several hat-manufactories at Manchester, Oldham, Rochdale, Denton, Bolton, Audenshaw, Howley Hill, Colne, and Wigan. Paper is made at Manchester, Bolton, Blackburn, Farnworth, Ashton, and Warrington. Lancaster, the county town, possesses comparatively but little of the above manufactures, its chief trade being in the manufacture and exportation of mahogany furniture and upholstery. At Warrington are large manufactories for pins, glass, and other articles; but the principal branch of business is the making of sail-cloth. At Ulverstone and Caton are establishments for the working of flax; and at the former town some checks are manufactured. There are many iron-works and nail-manufactories in different parts; the principal works of this kind are those for smelting iron-ore, in that portion of the county which lies north of Lancaster Sands; where also, on the banks of the Leven, are powder-mills. Glass and earthenware establishments are very numerous, the largest being at St. Helen's and Warrington; and in the south-western part of the county, watches, watch-movements, and watchmakers' tools are made to a considerable extent and in great perfection. The commerce of Lancashire, like its manufactures and in conjunction with them, has risen with unexampled rapidity, and attained an importance unequalled by that of any other county, Middlesex alone excepted. A great part of its foreign commerce, of which Liverpool is the grand medium, consists in the exportation of its manufactures, together with the woollens and cutlery of Yorkshire, the produce of the salt-mines of Cheshire, the earthenware of Staffordshire, and the hardware of Warwickshire, which are poured into this great western emporium, and thence forwarded to America and the West Indies, Africa, and the East Indies, and to the Continent of Europe, exclusively of the vast trade with Ireland.

The RIVERS and streams are very numerous: the Mersey, the Ribble, and the Lune or Loyne, are the largest; and next in magnitude are the Irwell, the Douglas, the Wyre, the Leven, the Crake, and the Dodden, all of which to some extent are navigable. Pursuant to an act of parliament, obtained in 1720, the Mersey was made navigable for barges of from 60 to 70 tons' burthen, by the aid of an artificial cut from the south of Warrington to some distance above that town, as far as the mouth of the Irwell, which latter river in like manner is rendered navigable up to Manchester: the tide flows up the Mersey as far as the vicinity of Warrington, where it is stopped by a weir. The Ribble is navigable for vessels of small burthen nearly as high as Preston, up to which the tide flows: in 1838 an act was passed for its improvement. The Lune is navigable for small vessels to Lancaster, but ships of great burthen cannot pass higher than Glasson Point. The Douglas, in 1727, was made navigable from the Ribble as high as Wigan, under the provisions of an act obtained in 1719; and the navigation was improved at a later date by the substitution, in a part of its course, of an artificial cut for the natural channel of the river. The Wyre is navigable for small vessels up to Poulton. In the northern part of the county are several sheets of water, of which Coniston Lake is the largest; and there are also others of smaller size, commonly called "tarns." The system of artificial INLAND NAVIGATION had its origin in this county, in which it is very extensive: the first attempts were in rendering navigable the rivers above-mentioned, after which an act was procured, in 1755, for making Sankey brook navigable, and in 1761 another act was obtained, which provided for the extension of the same line. The present navigation is called the Sankey canal, and runs entirely separate from the brook, except at one spot about two miles below Sankey bridge, where it crosses it on a level; at the distance of about $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles from its termination in the Mersey it divides into three branches, to the extremity of the longest of which the distance from the Mersey is $11\frac{3}{4}$ miles. In 1758 and 1759 the magnificent plans which have rendered the name of the Duke of Bridgewater so celebrated in the history of canal navigation, began to unfold themselves, an act having been passed in the former year empowering that nobleman to construct a canal from Worsley to Salford, and also to Hollin ferry on the Irwell; and another in the latter year, permitting him to deviate from that line, and carry the canal from Worsley across the river Irwell to Manchester. The formation of this canal was the work of that eminent self-taught engineer, James Brindley. The duke also procured an act for the formation of a branch canal, which extends from Longford bridge, in the township of Stretford, to the river Mersey at Runcorn Gap, a distance of more than 29 miles, passing through part of Cheshire, in a line parallel with the course of that river; and another branch has been cut, from the main line at Worsley to Leigh, pursuant to an act passed in 1795. The Leeds and Liverpool canal, upwards of 127 miles in length, and one of the greatest works of the kind in the kingdom, was commenced in 1770: there is a branch from it to Wigan, which, when first completed, afforded to Liverpool a new and plentiful supply of coal, and caused a considerable exportation of that article from the port. Different alterations and improvements have been made in the canal, under the authority of various acts of parliament, one of which, passed in 1794, gave the company the power of navigating a part of the Lancaster canal, then newly formed; and pursuant to an act obtained in 1819, a navigable cut was made from the canal near Wigan to the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Leigh. In 1791, an act was passed for the formation of a canal to connect the towns of Manchester, Bolton, and Bury, which, passing through a district abounding with coal and other mineral productions, and the inhabitants of which are extensively engaged in manufactures, has become a great medium of traffic with Manchester: the branches to Bolton and Bury commence at Little Lever, and there is a cut, called the Haslingden Extension canal, made under an act obtained in 1793, which unites it with the Leeds and Liverpool canal. The canal from Manchester to Ashton-under-Line, for which an act was procured in 1792, has a branch from Fairfield to the New Mill, near Oldham, from which there is a cut to Park colliery; and there is also a branch from this canal to Stockport, in Cheshire. The Rochdale canal was constructed with some short collateral cuts, under an act passed in 1794, and connects the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Manchester with the Calder navigation at Sowerby Bridge, near Halifax. In the same year also was obtained an act for constructing the Huddersfield canal, which has its western extremity at the Ashton-under-Line canal, and its eastern at Sir John Ramsden's canal to the Calder. The Kendal and Lancaster canal, for the formation of which an act was procured in 1792, enters this county near Burton, and after a very circuitous course crosses the Lune, a little above Lancaster, by a magnificent aqueduct, whence it proceeds to Garstang and Preston, where is a railroad about two miles in length, across the Ribble, and soon afterwards communicates with the Leeds and Liverpool canal. The Ulverstone canal is a short cut, about a mile and a half in length, from that town to the navigable channel of the Leven.

The RAILWAYS also hold an important place among the facilities of communication. The principal of these is the Liverpool and Manchester railway, constructed under an act of parliament obtained in 1826, empowering the company to raise a capital of £637,500, which has been since increased to £1,832,375; the whole, from the station at Liverpool to its terminus at Manchester, is 31 miles in length. It has branches to several collieries along the line of its progress, and others, connecting it with the Kenyon and Leigh Junction, the Warrington and Newton, the Wigan branch, and the St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap railways. It was opened for the conveyance of goods and passengers in Sept. 1830, and in 1839 an act was passed, enabling the company to raise £208,000 for its further extension, by connecting it with the Manchester and Leeds and the Manchester and Bolton railways. The Bolton and Leigh railway, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, was begun with a capital of £44,000, subsequently increased to £170,500, and was opened for the conveyance of minerals, merchandise, and passengers, in June, 1831. The Warrington and Newton railway was constructed under an act empowering the company to raise a capital of £73,000, afterwards augmented to £93,000; the line is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length; it was opened in 1833, and in 1835 was united with the Grand Junction railway. The Wigan branch railway, diverging from the Liverpool and Manchester railway at Parkside, and extending to the town of Wigan, is 7 miles in length, with a branch of 3 miles, and was completed at an expense of £87,500, in 1832. The St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap railway, chiefly for the conveyance of coal, is 12 miles in length; the original capital, £120,000, was afterwards increased to £150,000, and the line was completed at a cost of £220,000. The Manchester and Bolton railway is 10 miles in length, worked by locomotive engines; it was commenced with a capital of £204,000, since augmented to £650,000, and was opened for passengers and general traffic in May, 1838. The North Union, or Preston and Wigan, railway, $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, which was begun with a capital of £250,000, increased since its union with the Wigan Branch Company, to £730,000, was opened in October, 1838. The Manchester and Birmingham railway, $38\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, commenced with a capital of £2,100,000, subsequently augmented to £2,800,000, was partly opened in 1840. The Lancaster and Preston Junction railway is 20 miles in length; the original capital, £250,000, was afterwards increased to £458,000; it was opened for passengers and general traffic in June, 1840, and it is in contemplation to extend it to Carlisle, and thence to Glasgow. The Preston and Wyre railway, $19\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, was commenced with a capital of £100,000, subsequently augmented to £400,000, and was opened to the public in July, 1840. The Manchester and Leeds railway, $50\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, was begun with a capital of £1,300,000, afterwards increased to £2,599,000, and was opened in October, 1840. The Bolton and Preston railway, commenced with a capital of £506,000, will be $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length. The Sheffield, Ashton-under-Line, and Manchester railway, 40 miles in length, and the Kenyon and Leigh Junction railway, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, both of which are now in progress, pass through the county.

Eight Roman Stations, according to Whitaker, were established within the limits of the county during the administration of Julius Agricola in Britain, viz., Ad Alaunam and Bremetonacæ, in the north, which are conjectured to have been at Lancaster and Overborough respectively; Portus Sistuntiorum, in the west; Rerigonium and Coccium, about the centre, the latter supposed to have been at Blackrod, or Ribchester; Colonea in the east, supposed to have been at Colne; and Vera-tinum and Mancunium in the south, the latter having been at Manchester, from which place several ancient roads diverged to the different stations in its vicinity. The number of Religious houses prior to the Reformation was twenty-one, including three hospitals and the college of Manchester: the principal remains of conventual buildings are those of the abbeys of Whalley, Cockersand, and Furness, the last of which ranks among the most interesting monastic remains in the kingdom. Of ancient castles, the chief remains are those at Clitheroe, Dalton, Gleaston, Greenhalgh, Hornby, and Lancaster, of which the last is the most remarkable and entire, being now used as the county gaol. Of ancient domestic architecture there are numerous remains, of which Hulme Hall, on the bank of the Irwell, near Manchester, and Speake Hall, on the Mersey, near Liverpool, are the most curious and perfect specimens, though now fast falling to decay; among the more distinguished modern seats are Knowsley Hall, Ashton Hall, and Heaton House. The most remarkable ancient earth-works are at Aldingham, Overborough, and Brierscliffe.

LANCASTER (St. Mary), a parish, comprising the borough, port, and market-town of Lancaster, having separate jurisdiction, partly in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, and partly in that of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; the whole containing 24,149 inhabitants, of whom 14,089 are in the borough, 240 miles (N. N. W.) from London. This place is supposed to have been the Ad Alaunam of the Romans; and the discovery of coins, urns, fragments of earthenware, calcined bones, votive altars, sepulchral lamps, and other Roman antiquities, confirms the probability of its having been occupied as a station by that people. After the departure of the Romans from Britain, it was destroyed by an incursion of the Picts and Scots, and continued in a state of desolation till the time of the Saxons, by whom it was restored, and, from its situation as a fortress near the river Lune, called Lun-ceastre, from which its present name is deduced. In the seventh century, according to the same author, it had risen to such importance as to be made the capital of the county, an honour, which it still retains; but it suffered so much injury during the Danish incursions, that in the Norman survey, it is noticed only as a vill, or berewic, included in the manor of Halton. At the time of the Conquest it was given by William to Roger de Poitou, who is supposed to have enlarged and adapted for his baronial residence the ancient castle, of which the western tower is erroneously said to have been built by Adrian, in 124, and that facing the town by the father of Constantine the Great in 305: the beautiful gateway tower was erected by John, Earl of Morton and Lancaster, who, after his accession to the throne, gave audience to the French ambassadors, and received the homage of Alexander, King of Scotland (whom he had subdued), in this castle. John of Gaunt, the fourth son of Edward III., having succeeded to the title of his father-in-law, Henry Plantaganet, Duke of Lancaster, erected that tower in the castle which has obtained the name of John of Gaunt's chair. On the accession of this prince to the dukedom, in the year 1376, the county was constituted a palatinate. Separate courts for this independent jurisdiction are still opened at Lancaster, but they adjourn to Preston, and business is chiefly transacted there and in the duchy court at Westminster. In 1322 and 1389, the town was burnt and plundered by the Scots; and in the wars of the houses of York and Lancaster it was nearly depopulated, in consequence of the resolute adherence of the inhabitants to the cause of the Lancasterians. During the parliamentary war it suffered severely; and, in 1698, an accidental fire destroyed a considerable portion of the town, which also, in the rebellion of 1745, participated in the agitations that then disturbed the peace of the kingdom.

The town is pleasantly situated on the acclivities of an eminence crowned with the stately towers of the castle, and on the southern bank of the river Lune, over which a handsome stone bridge of five elliptical arches has been erected, at an expense of £12,000, connecting the town with the township of Skerton, about half a mile to the east of an ancient bridge now in ruins, which had been built over the narrower part of the river, near St. George's quay. With the exception of a few which are spacious, the streets are usually narrow; but considerable improvement has been made in the appearance of the town, and the houses, built of freestone found in the neighbourhood, and covered with slate, are in general handsome; in various parts of the town are some noble mansions, and in the environs, which abound with varied and interesting scenery, are several elegant villas. The public baths are conveniently arranged and provided with every requisite accommodation; and assemblies are held in a suite of rooms well adapted to the purpose. A book society, called the Amicable, which was instituted in 1769, has accumulated a library of 4000 volumes; and a mechanics' library was opened in 1824. A society for promoting the fine arts, by the purchase of paintings by the most eminent living artists, was established in 1820; and in 1835 a Literary, Scientific, and Natural History Society was founded, to which a museum is attached. The theatre is now used as a Temperance Hall. The port is subject to much inconvenience from the difficulty of the navigation of the Lune, arising from the accumulation of sand in its channel, and an elevation in its bed, called Scaleford, probably the remains of a Roman ford across the river, which renders it inaccessible to vessels of large burthen. A dock, however, was constructed, in 1787, at Glasson, nearly five miles down the river, capable of sheltering 25 merchantmen, which discharge their cargoes by lighters at St. George's quay, on which a custom-house, a neat edifice with an Ionic portico, was erected in 1764. The foreign trade is chiefly with America and the West Indies; and it has also a very considerable coasting trade. The number of vessels of above 50 tons, registered at this port, is 54, and their aggregate burthen 5309 tons. There is a good salmon fishery on the river Lune, which also abounds with trout: the fishery extends from a place called Denny Beck to Scaleford, a little below St. George's quay, in this town, and prior to the Reformation belonged time immemorially to the abbot and convent of Furness, subject to a claim to a third draught, in part of it, and to an alternate draught in all the other parts, by the prior of the church of St. Mary in Lancaster. The principal manufactures are mahogany furniture and upholstery (for exportation), cordage, sail-cloth, and cotton goods, for which last there are three factories in the town, in two of which 200 power-looms are employed: cotton, worsted, and silk yarn are also spun to a considerable extent in Lancaster, and its vicinity. The Lancaster canal opens a communication with the mining district, and supplies the neighbourhood with coal and other necessities: about a mile to the north-east it is carried over the river Lune by an aqueduct of stone, consisting of five semicircular arches, each 70 feet in the span, erected at an expense of £48,000, under the direction of Mr. Rennie. The Lancaster and Preston railway commences near the south entrance of the town, where the principal station has been erected, a handsome structure inclosing six acres, containing the requisite arrangements. The line proceeds hence by Scotforth and Gulgate, at which latter place is a viaduct 265 feet in length, supported on six semicircular arches, and then advances east of Garstang, and west of Cloughton Hall, and, crossing the Preston road, near Barton Lodge, joins the North-Union railway at Dock-street, Preston, its terminus. The line is 20 miles in length, forming an important link in connecting the metropolis with Scotland; it was commenced with a capital of £250,000 joint-stock, and £208,000 loan, and opened to the public in June, 1840. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday; the fairs, which are chiefly for cattle, cloth, cheese, and pedlery, and continue for three days each, are on May 1st, July 5th, and October 10th.

Corporation Seal.

The first CHARTER granted to the borough was in the 4th of Richard II., by John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King John, who bestowed on the burgesses similar liberties to those enjoyed at Bristol. In the year 1199, also, King John conferred upon the town "all the liberties which the burgesses of Northampton had the day that King Henry died," instead of those of Bristol; and this charter was confirmed by several subsequent sovereigns, one of whom, Edward III., allowed the mayor and bailiffs the privilege of having the pleas and sessions held here to the exclusion of every other place in the county. Other charters were granted by James I. in 1604, and by Charles II. in 1665 and 1684, but were suspended by that obtained in the year 1819, under which the corporation consisted of a mayor, recorder, seven aldermen, twelve capital burgesses, twelve common-councillors, two bailiffs, a town-clerk and clerk of the peace, and others. By the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, the government is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, and the borough is divided into three wards, being co-extensive with the township of Lancaster, with the exception of the precincts of the castle. Ten justices have been appointed by the crown, who hold a petty-session several times in the week. The freedom is obtained by birth and apprenticeship to a freeman. Among the privileges may be reckoned an interest in the tract of ground called

Lancaster Marsh, consisting of 210 acres, inclosed in 1795, the rents of which are divided amongst eighty of the oldest resident freemen, or their widows. The borough, of which the ancient limits comprise 1862 acres, first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., and continued to make returns till the 1st of Edward II.: it afterwards intermitted till the reign of Edward VI., since which time it has regularly sent two members to parliament. The boundary of the borough has been extended under the Reform act; the mayor is returning officer. The quarter-sessions for the county are held at the castle. There is a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount; and a court for the hundred of Lonsdale is held on the first Wednesday in every month, for debts under 40s. The court of pleas and county assizes for the whole of the county palatine were formerly held here, twice in the year, before the judges on the northern circuit, but the business of the assizes has been divided, and that for the northern division only is now transacted in Lancaster. The general quarter-sessions for the hundred of Lonsdale are held in the town, which is also the place of election for the northern division of the shire. The town-hall is a neat building, erected in 1781, at an expense of £1300, and embellished with full-length portraits of William Pitt and Admiral Lord Nelson, painted by Mr. Lonsdale, a native of the town, and presented by him to the corporation. The borough prison is a small edifice, for the temporary confinement of prisoners, who are subsequently sent to Lancaster Castle. The remains of the ancient castle are used as the county gaol, and additional buildings have been erected upon a very extensive scale, at an expense exceeding £140,000. The entrance, through a gateway of beautiful design, over which is a statue of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, is flanked by octagonal towers, and leads into a spacious court-yard inclosed with embattled walls and strengthened with towers; opposite to the entrance is the ancient square keep, a building of prodigious strength, to the north of which are the shire-hall and courts, with the room for the grand jury, and other apartments. The hall is of a semicircular form, and elegantly and commodiously arranged for the business of the assizes: the nisi prius court, in which are full-length portraits of Colonel Stanley and Mr. Blackburn, presented by the late Sir Robert Peel, Bart., exhibits some architectural beauty; and in the crown court is an equestrian portrait of King George III., painted by Northcote, and presented to the county by James Ackers, Esq., when high sheriff. The Castle hill and terrace afford a fine promenade, commanding extensive views of the surrounding scenery, which is most richly diversified.

The parish comprises by measurement and computation 54,120 acres, of which about 11,000 are arable, 18,000 pasture, 7000 meadow, 1120 woodland, and the remainder uninclosed common. It includes the chapels of Bleasdale, Gressingham, Overton with Sunderland, Stalmine with Staynal, and Over Wyersdale; also the townships of Aldcliffe, Ashton with Stodday, Bulk, Caton with Littledale, Fulwood, Heaton with Oxcliffe, Middleton, Myerscough, Preesall with Hackensall, Quernmoore, Scotforth, Skerton, and part of Thurnham; and the hamlets of Bare, Poulton-le-Sand, and Torrisholme. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £41; net income, £1709; patron, Oliver Marton, Esq.; impropiators, Duke of Hamilton, the Vicar, and others. The church, to which the privilege of sanctuary was anciently attached, was originally erected by Roger de Poitou, who founded a Benedictine priory here, as a cell to the abbey of St. Martin de Sees, in Normandy, which, on the suppression of alien priories, was by Henry V. annexed to the abbey of Sion, in Middlesex: the present edifice is in the later English style, and contains some fine specimens of screen-work and carvings in oak, which are thought to have been brought from Cockersand Abbey, on its dissolution. St. John's district church was built by subscription, in 1755: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £203; patron, Vicar of Lancaster. St. Ann's district church was erected in 1796, at the expense of the Rev. Robert Housman: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar, with a net income of £155. A church has been recently erected, and dedicated to St. Thomas; and there are chapels in the several townships. Places of worship have been built for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school existed prior to 1615, at which time Randall Carter, of London, bequeathed £10 per annum for an usher. The Blue-coat charity school, established in 1770, has been incorporated with a national school for boys, for which a spacious stone building was erected in 1817, by subscription, at an expense of £1100, and which in that year was endowed by Mr. Matthew Pyper, one of the Society of Friends, with £2000 Navy five per cent. annuities. A national school for girls was built in 1820, by subscription; a Lancasterian school, and a charity school for girls, established in 1772, are supported by similar means; and a school, opened in 1820, is maintained by Roman Catholics. Gardyner's almshouses, founded in 1485, are appropriated to four aged men. Penny's almshouses were founded by a bequest from William Penny, Esq., in 1715, and endowed with land yielding a rent of about £340, for twelve aged men or women; and eight houses were founded in 1781, by Mrs. Anne Gillison, who endowed them with land and money producing about £40 per annum, for unmarried women. There are numerous charitable bequests for distribution, of which the most considerable is that of William Heysham, M.P., who, in 1725, left an estate producing £256 per annum, for the benefit of eight poor men; and there are also several for the relief of prisoners for debt confined in the castle. The county lunatic asylum, on Lancaster Moor, was established in 1816, and is a spacious quadrangular structure of stone, with a handsome portico of the Doric order, and, with the gardens and grounds, occupies five acres of land; it was erected at an expense of £75,000, including the furniture, and the magistrates of the county lately resolved to expend £9000 in additional buildings. A dispensary was instituted in 1781; and a house has been fitted up as an infirmary. The reigning sovereign enjoys the title of Duke of Lancaster.

LANCAUT (St. James), a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, hundred of WESTBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N.) from Chepstow; containing 16 inhabitants. This place, which is a distinct parish, but within the manor of Tidenham, is romantically situated on the left bank of the Wye, by which it is formed into a beautiful peninsula, opposite the grounds of Piercefield, commanding a delightful view of the various windings of the river between Tintern Abbey and Chepstow, and of the highly picturesque scenery on its banks. The living has generally been held with the rectory of Wollaston. The church is an ancient structure, and contains a curiously-sculptured leaden font, supposed to be of the 10th century.

LANCHESTER (ALL SAINTS), a parish, and the head of a union, chiefly in the W. division of CHESTER ward, N. division, but partly in the N. W. division, of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM; comprising the townships of Benfieldside, Billing-side, Burnop with Hamsteels, Buttsfield, Collierly, Conside with Knitsley, Cornsay, Ebchester, Esh, Greencroft, Healyfield, Holmside, Ivestone, Kyo, Lanchester, Langley, Medomsley, and Satley; and containing 7783 inhabitants, of whom 579 are in the township of Lanchester, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Durham. This place, which occupies the site of a principal Roman station, is supposed by Camden, Gale, and Hunter, to have been Longovicum, and by Horsley, Glambanta or Glanoventa, considered the most perfect Roman station in the kingdom; more modern writers regard it as Epiacum. The period of its origin is uncertain, but its restoration is ascribed to the Emperor Gordian; it stood on the line of the Watling-street, and was successively garrisoned by a portion of the twentieth legion, the Varduli, and the Ligones. The station occupied an eminence half a mile eastward from the village: the rampart, inclosing a cultivated area of eight acres, is in most parts quite perfect; and numerous coins, altars, monuments, and other relics, especially a plate of solid gold with an inscription to the god Mars, have been discovered at different periods, several of which are preserved in the library at Durham. The parish comprises by computation 41,890 acres, of which upwards of 16,000 acres of common land were divided in 1773; the chief portion is held under the see of Durham. The village, though now but small and straggling, was once of considerable magnitude and importance; it lies in a warm sheltered vale, watered by the Smalhope burn, and the road from Durham to Shotley-Bridge passes through it. Petty-sessions are held once a fortnight, and a court for the recovery of debts under 40s. twice a year. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £123; patron, Bishop of Durham; improPRIATORS, T. Cookson, Esq., and others. The tithes were commuted for land in 1773. The church is a venerable structure, in the early English style, and consists of a nave, aisles, chancel, south porch, and tower at the west end, surmounted by an embattled parapet, with crocketed pinnacles at the angles: the chancel, of which the arch is a fine specimen of the transition from the Norman to the early English style, is 44 feet in length, by 15 in breadth, and has on the east side three tall lancet windows, the centre one with a portion of stained glass; on the south side are two windows of double lights, and a third of three lights; and on the north a window of two lights: the interior contains five ancient stalls, an elegant piscina, several sculptured decorations, and some interesting monuments. It was made collegiate, for a dean and seven prebendaries, by Bishop Anthony Beke, about 1283, and valued at the Dissolution at £49. 3. 4., and in the Lincoln Taxation at £90. 13. 4., per annum; the dean's house occupied a plot of ground surrounded by a fosse, a little northward from the church, but there are no vestiges, excepting the carved oak seats, under an arch in the northern wall of the chancel, and the piscina on the south side of the altar. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and at Brooms is a Roman Catholic chapel. A national schoolroom was erected in 1824. William Russell, Esq., of Brancepeth Castle, in 1811, founded almshouses at Cornsay, for 12 men and women, and a school for 20 children of the township, and endowed them with property now producing £180 per annum. The poor law union of Lanchester comprises 18 chapelries or townships, and a population of 9969 persons.

LANCING, a parish, in the hundred of BRIGHTFORD, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (W.) from Shoreham; containing 781 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the east by the river Adur and Shoreham harbour, and on the south by the English Channel, comprises by measurement 2524 acres, whereof 1476 are arable, 566 meadow and pasture, 424 sea and fresh-water beach, and 14 plantations. Its soil is chiefly a rich loam intermixed with sand, but in that portion forming the downs generally chalk; the scenery, which is enriched with wood, is finely varied, and Lancing House, the seat of Sir James Martin Lloyd, Bart., is a handsome residence seated in a demesne tastefully laid out. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 9. 4.; patron, Bishop of Lincoln; improPRIATOR, Sir J. M. Lloyd. The great tithes have been commuted for £767. 14., and the vicarial for £176, and the glebe comprises 6 acres. There is also a rent-charge of £61. 8. 6., payable to the rector of West Grinstead. The church is an ancient structure, partly Norman, and partly in the early and decorated English styles; the interior is neatly arranged, and has been repewed, by which 114 additional sittings have been obtained. A school-house has been erected on a site given by Sir J. M. Lloyd, who also contributed largely towards its erection. Vestiges of a Roman pavement, with some small altars, lavatories, and a great number of coins, have lately been discovered on Lancing Down.

LANDBEACH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CHESTERTON, hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Cambridge; containing 468 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Cambridge to Ely, and comprises 2207a. 1r. 27p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 1. 3., and in the gift of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge: the tithes were commuted for land in 1807; the value of the glebe is £633 per annum. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, surmounted by an elegant spire; on the tower are some sculptured devices, of which the emblems of the Crucifixion, and a shield with two keys in saltier, are discernible. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Robert Masters, B.D., author of the History of Corpus Christi College, of which he was a fellow, was rector of this parish.

LANDCROSS (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of BIDEFORD, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Bideford; containing 120 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Torridge, and intersected by the road from Bideford to Torrington, and comprises by measurement 331 acres. There are quarries of stone, which is used for building and also for the roads. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 4. 0½, and in the gift of Lord Rolle: the tithes have been commuted for £63, and the glebe comprises 8 acres. General Monk, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, was baptized here in 1608.

LANDEWEDNACK (St. LANTY), a parish, in the union of HELSTON, W. division of the hundred of KERRIER and of the county of CORNWALL, 10½ miles (S. S. E.) from Helston; containing 431 inhabitants. The parish contains within its limits the Lizard Point, the most southerly point in Great Britain, from which ships leaving the Channel date their departure, and near which are two lighthouses. The number of acres is about 1000, nearly one-half of which quantity is profitable land, and the remainder of very inferior quality, being chiefly poor and unproductive downs; the surface is flat, with some gentle undulations, and the surrounding scenery is of bold and rugged aspect. A pilchard fishery is carried on to a considerable extent at Landewednack cove, in which several boats and seans are employed during the season. Slabs and mantel-pieces are made from the rocks, and are susceptible of a high polish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 16. 10½, and in the gift of P. Vyvyan Robinson, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £253. 11., and the glebe comprises 14 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with a fine Norman doorway on the south side, and contains a curious font. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school.

LANDFORD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ALDERBURY, hundred of FRUSTFIELD, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 7 miles (E. by S.) from Downton; containing 255 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Salisbury to Southampton, and comprises 1689a. 2r. 16p., of which 773 acres are uninclosed common, and the remainder good arable, pasture, and meadow land. A stream which has its rise within the parish, flows into the Southampton water. The substratum contains iron-ore, but no mines have been opened. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 3. 9., and in the gift of the Countess Nelson: the tithes have been commuted for £220, and the glebe comprises 58a. 2r. 39p. The church is a very ancient structure, with a tower surmounted by a campanile turret of wood; the northern entrance is under a fine Norman arch. A parochial school is supported by subscription. Bishop Davenant, who purchased the manor-house, is supposed to have resided here occasionally.

LANDGUARD-FORT, in the parish of FELIXSTOW, union of WOODBIDGE, hundred of COLNEIS, E. division of SUFFOLK, 12 miles (S. E. by S.) from Ipswich, and 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Harwich, which see. Here is a chapel for the garrison.

LANDICAN, a township, in the parish of WOODCHURCH, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (N.) from Great Neston; containing 67 inhabitants.

LANDKEY (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 2¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Barnstaple; containing 774 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Barnstaple to South Molton, comprises by computation 2400 acres: limestone of good quality is abundant, and there are two quarries of considerable extent. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Swimbridge annexed; net income, £179; patron and appropriator, Dean of Exeter. The church contains a handsome monument to one of the Acland family. At Herford, in the parish, was anciently a chapel. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a small school supported by charity.

LANDMOTH, with CATTO, a township, in the parish of LEAK, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from North-Allerton; containing 56 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 600 acres, including Cotliffe, a long precipitous cliff and boldly rising acclivity on the east of the Codbeck rivulet. The land is set out in farms.

LANDRAKE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of ST. GERMANS, S. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Saltash; containing, with the chapelry of St. Erney, 893 inhabitants, of whom 812 are in Landrake. The parish is bounded on the east by the Lynher river, which is crossed by a bridge. Here are fairs for cattle on February 4th and June 29th, and minor fairs on the first Wednesday in February, and the first Wednesday in September. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 12. 4.; net income, £282; patron and impropiator, Viscount Valletort. The church is remarkable for the loftiness of its tower, which is a picturesque object for several miles round. There is a chapel of ease at St. Erney. A charity school was founded in 1703, by Sir Robert Jeffrey, Knt., who endowed it with lands now producing about £72 per annum; and there are five almshouses, with a small endowment.

LANDULPH (St. DILPE), a parish, in the union of ST. GERMANS, S. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 5 miles (N.) from Saltash; containing 550 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south and east by the navigable river Tamar, comprises by survey 2086 acres; a considerable portion of marsh land has been reclaimed by an embankment constructed by Mr. Arnold. The substratum contains much mineral wealth, and the lead and silver mines of Beer-Alston extend into the parish. Packet-boats sail three times in the week from Cargreen, the principal village, to Devonport. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 3. 6½, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £328, and the glebe comprises 42 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the early and decorated English styles; there is much curious carved work on the seats, which are of the time of Henry VII., and the edifice also contains a monument with an inscription, giving an account of the pedigree of Theodore Paleologus, a lineal descendant of the last Christian emperors of Greece, who died in 1636, and was interred here. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school-house has been erected in union with the National Society. Here is a mineral spring, formerly in much repute.

LANDWADE (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of NEWMARKET, hundred of STAPLOE, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Newmarket; containing 29 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £20. The church is in the shape of a cross, and contains six beautiful marble monuments to the Cotton family. The remains of the ancient manor-house, now tenanted, exhibit a specimen of the domestic architecture of the sixteenth century, and are surrounded by a wide and deep moat.

LANEAST (St. GALWELL), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, partly in the N. division of the hundred of EAST, and partly in the hundred of LESNEWTH, E. division of CORNWALL, 7 miles (W.) from Launceston; containing 320 inhabitants. It comprises 2262 acres, of which 600 are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £55; patrons, J. K. Lethbridge, Esq., and the family of Cock. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £113. A small school is supported by subscription.

LANE-END, a district parish, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 4 miles (N.) from Great Marlow; containing about 1400 inhabitants. The district, until recently, formed part of the parishes of Great Marlow, West Wycombe, Fingest, and Hambleden, and was assigned to the church of Lane-End by the ordinary, the Bishop of Lincoln, who made it for ecclesiastical purposes a parish. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was built in 1832, at an expense of nearly £3000, 'de-frayed by J. Meggatt Elwes, Esq., and was endowed with a glebe-house and garden, and a revenue of £100 per annum, by the late Rev. H. C. Ridley, rector of Hambleden, and his friends; patron, the Rector of Hambleden.

LANE-END, with LONGTON, a chapelry and market-town, in the parish and union of STOKE-UPON-TRENT, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Newcastle-under-Lyme; containing, exclusively of Longton, 1952 inhabitants. This place, which is situated at the southern extremity of the district called "The Potteries," and on the road between Newcastle and Uttoxeter, has risen to opulence and importance, in consequence of the flourishing state of the earthenware and china manufacture established here within the last few years. It consists of spacious and well-built streets, and contains many neat houses and public buildings, supplied with water from several springs on an eminence about a mile to the south-east, where a large reservoir has been formed by the Duke of Sutherland, the proprietor of the works. Here is a subscription library, established in 1807; and a newsroom was opened in 1833. An indurated clay, or soft stone, found between a hard marl and iron-stone rock, and containing siliceous and argillaceous earth, with magnesia and lime, has the property of burning white, and has been used by Mr. Turner in the manufacture of china similar to that of India. Of this clay the first table service called "stone china" was manufactured by that gentleman, who obtained a patent for using it for that purpose. Brown limestone, coal, and iron-stone, are found in abundance, with manganese, and coloured marl and clay; and there are extensive collieries in both Lane-End and Longton, and in the vicinity. The Trent and Mersey canal passes about two miles westward from the town, from which there is a railway communication. The market is held on Saturday for provisions, of which the supply is very good; and there are fairs for woollen-cloth, hardware, and pedlery, on February 14th, May 29th, July 22nd, and November 1st. There were formerly two market-houses, one at the upper, and the other at the lower, extremity of the town; the former is disused, and the latter, which has been enlarged, and over which a public room has been erected, is now exclusively appropriated to the use of the market, and is called the Union Market.

The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £154; patrons, certain Trustees appointed under an act obtained in 1792; appropriator, the Rector of Stoke. The chapel, a neat brick edifice with a tower, built about 1760, by Mr. John Bourne, has been enlarged, and is now capable of accommodating 1200 persons, including 450 free sittings, for which the Incorporated Society granted £800. By an act of parliament, relating to the rectory of Stoke, passed in 1827, provision is made for the further endowment of the chapel, on its separation from the parish and conversion into a district rectory; also for endowing a new church at Longton with not less than £10,000, nor more than £15,000, at the option of the patron of Stoke rectory, from the proceeds of tithes to be sold and invested in land. Dr. Woodhouse, the late rector, likewise gave £1000 (with its accumulations until appropriated) towards providing a parsonage-house for the minister of the new church, besides allotting to national schools at Lane-End and Longton a portion of the yearly income arising from his munificent donation of £3000 to national schools in the parish of Stoke. The church at Longton, dedicated to St. James, in the later English style, with a tower, was erected in 1834, at an expense of £9633. 16.; it will accommodate more than 1900 persons, and has been endowed and converted into a district rectory, prior to which it was a chapel of ease to the mother church. There are places of worship for Baptists, Wesleyans, Independents, Calvinistic Methodists, Methodists of the New Connexion, and Roman Catholics. A charity school was founded in 1760, and endowed by Mr. Bourne with property producing £66 per annum, which sum is applied towards the support of a national school.

LANEHAM (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, and within the liberty of SOUTHWELL and SCROOBY, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Tuxford; containing 385 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the east by the river Trent, comprises by measurement 1704 acres; the soil is clay, with considerable portions of marsh; the surface is generally flat, and the lands are in good cultivation. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 3. 4.; net income, £56; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of York. The tithes, with some trifling exceptions, were commuted for land and a money payment, under an act of inclosure, in 1772; and the remainder have been commuted under the recent Tithe act, the appropriate tithes for a rent-charge of £36, and the vicarial for £5. The church is a small ancient structure.

LANE-HEAD, a hamlet, in the parish of HUTTON-MAGNUM, union of TEESDALE, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Richmond; containing 36 inhabitants. The hamlet is situated nearly a mile south of the village of Hutton. Here is a large quarry of limestone, which is burned into lime, and esteemed of superior quality for tillage; it is on the property of Sir Clifford Constable, Bart., who is lord of the manor.

LANERCOST-ABBEY (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of BRAMPTON, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Brampton; containing, with the townships of Askerton, Burtholme, Kingwater, and Waterhead, 1582 inhabitants. This place is identified as the site of the Roman station Am-boglana, where was posted the Cohors Prima Ælia Dacorum, and of which considerable vestiges remain. The area, which occupies an extensive plain, from which is a precipitous descent to the river Irthing, is 120 yards from north to south, and 80 from east to west; and several votive altars have been found, dedicated to Jupiter Optimus Maximus, and other Roman deities. A fragment of the Roman wall is yet standing at Harehill, about five yards in length, and ten feet high; and there are numerous indications of Roman occupation. The abbey of Lanercost was founded in 1169, by Robert de Vallibus, Lord of Gillesland, for a prior and monks of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. It was frequently visited by Edward I., and was partly destroyed by fire in 1296, but was restored and continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £79. 19., and the site was granted to Thomas, Lord Dacre, a descendant of the original founder. In 1716 the priory estate reverted to the crown, under which it is now held on lease by the Earl of Carlisle. The remains, which are beautifully situated on the north bank of the river, consist chiefly of the conventual church, of which the nave has been appropriated as the church of the parish, part of the cloisters, refectory, and other buildings. In 1311, Robert Bruce lay with his army encamped here for three days.

The parish is bounded on the east and south by the Irthing, and intersected by the Kingwater and several smaller streams; it comprises by computation 30,000 acres, of which about two-thirds are pasture, and the remainder arable and woodland. Its surface is pleasingly varied, and in many parts highly picturesque; the soil in the lower lands is a rich loam, alternated with sand, and the steep banks that inclose the vales of Kingwater and Irthing produce fine crops of grain; the substratum abounds with limestone. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £107; patron and impropiator, Earl of Carlisle. The tithes were commuted for land in 1802. The church is principally in the early English style, with Norman portions, of which the western doorway is a highly-enriched specimen: in the transepts, which are roofless, and covered with a profusion of ivy, and other plants, are several tombs of the Howards and Dacres, much disfigured by exposure to the air; and in part of the ancient cemetery, which has been converted into gardens, are numerous monuments, and stone coffins scattered among the trees. Within the parish, and about seven miles from Lanercost, is Gilsland Spa, of which a description is given under GILSLAND.

LANGAR (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union, and N. division of the wapentake, of BINGHAM, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Nottingham; containing 309 inhabitants. This parish, including the chapelry of Barnstone, comprises 3825a. 3r. 5p.; the soil is fertile, and the surface highly picturesque. Langar Hall, once the seat of Admiral Howe, is a handsome residence, finely situated. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 7. 11.; net income, £208; patron, J. Wright, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land, on the inclosure of the parish; the glebe comprises 345 acres. The church, which is near the Hall, is a large cruciform edifice, with a richly-ornamented tower, and has several monuments of the Lords Scroope, one of which, in memory of Lord Scroope, who died in 1609, and his lady, is remarkably elegant; it also contains a handsome monument to the memory of the distinguished officer, Admiral Earl Howe, who died August 5th, 1799, and was buried here. There is a chapel of ease at Barnstone.

LANGBAR, with NESFIELD, a township, in the parish of ILKLEY, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Skipton; containing 210 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1730 acres of land, chiefly the property of the Duke of Devonshire. The hamlet is situated on the northern acclivities of Wharfedale. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LANGCLIFFE, a township, in the parish of GIGLESWICK, union of SETTLE, W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE, W. riding of the county of YORK, 1 mile (N.) from Settle; containing 664 inhabitants. The township lies in a beautiful and fertile valley, bounded by Stackhouse and Langcliffe Scours, and comprises by computation 1890 acres, including part of Winskill hamlet. The lands are divided among several proprietors, and the population is chiefly employed in the cotton and paper manufacture; two large cotton-mills are situated on the banks of the Ribble, in the neighbourhood, and a paper-mill likewise stands on that river. This place was formerly parcel of the possessions of Sawley Abbey, and for a century and a half the property of the Dawsons, a family highly distinguished in point of alliances and personal desert. Whitaker gives a copy of verses, printed in 1690, by William Dawson, containing an account of a village which was destroyed by the Scots in the reign of Edward II., and supposed to be the parent of the present village; and in confirmation of this, foundations of houses under Winskill have been met with, when draining some lands there. The township, with the other possessions of Sawley Abbey, was found by inquisition of the 1st and 3rd of Elizabeth, to belong to Henry, son and heir of Sir Arthur Darcy, Knt., from whose descendants the manor was purchased by the inhabitants. Langcliffe Place, the seat of William Clayton, Esq., and Langcliffe Hall, that of Mrs. Swale, are handsome mansions. In the village is a school-house, licensed by the Bishop of Ripon for divine service. Roman coins have occasionally been discovered.

LANGDALE, GREAT and LITTLE, a chapelry, in the parish of GRASMERE, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, 5 miles (W.) from Ambleside; containing 442 inhabitants. Fine blue slate, much of which is sent to London and other parts, is obtained in the mountains on each side of the river Brathay; the loftiest of these pikes, called Harrison Stickle, rises 2400 feet above the level of the sea. Within the chapelry is Elter-water, near which is a gunpowder-mill; and there are several smaller lakes, and the two beautiful waterfalls of Colwith Force and Skelwith Force. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £71; patron, Rector of Grasmere. The chapel is situated at Great Langdale, and another once stood at a place now called Chapel-Mire, in Little Langdale. The tithes have been commuted for £46. 10. A school was erected in 1824, by the Gunpowder Company, in consideration of ground granted to them for the establishment of their manufactory. On a hill called Wreynose are three shire-stones, marking the point at which the counties of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancaster meet and terminate. Henry Bickersteth, Esq., was raised to the peerage, January 23rd, 1836, by the title of Baron Langdale: his lordship is Master of the Rolls.

LANGDALE, a township, in the parish of ORTON, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Orton; containing 123 inhabitants. The township is situated between those of Tebay and Raisbeck, and comprises 7702 acres, of which about 5000 are common or waste. It is a mountainous district extending to the borders of Yorkshire, and anciently belonged to the priory of Walton, in that county, to which it was granted by Henry II., and on the dissolution of which the manor was sold to the Wharton family; it is now the property of the Earl of Lonsdale. Bishop Barlow, a learned divine of the seventeenth century, was born here.

LANGDON, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of BEAMINSTER, Bridport division of DORSET; containing 332 inhabitants.

LANGDON, EAST (St. AUGUSTINE), a parish, in the union of DOVOR, hundred of CORNILO, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Dover; containing 316 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7; net income, £126; patron, Earl of Guilford. A fair for toys and pedlery is held on Old May-day.

LANGDON-HILLS (St. MARY AND ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ORSETT, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, 13 miles (E. by S.) from Romford; containing 288 inhabitants. This place is situated on a fine tract of elevated ground, rising gradually by a gentle slope from the north to its highest point, but in all other directions abrupt and steep. From the summit of the range, the loftiest in the neighbourhood, and from which the parish partly takes its name, are some extensive prospects, the hills and coast of Kent, as far as the Medway, being visible in clear weather. The parish comprises 1775a. 2r. 24p., of which 1120 acres are arable, 474 pasture, and 113 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 9.; net income, £245; patrons, Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London. The church is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a small chapel on the north side of the latter, and has been enlarged. The parish of West Lee, about a mile distant, was, after the destruction of its church, united with this parish.

LANGDON, WEST (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of DOVOR, hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Dover; containing 119 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 700 acres, of which about 50 are pasture, and the remainder arable. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, which have been commuted for £32. 9. 6.; patron, Archbishop of Canterbury; impropriator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, the Owner of Langdon Abbey: the glebe comprises 4 acres. The church is in ruins. An abbey for White canons, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Thomas the Martyr, was founded here in 1192, by William de Auberville, and at the Dissolution had a revenue estimated at £56. 6.; it is stated to have been the first religious house dissolved by Henry VIII. There are some remains, forming a picturesque ruin.

LANGENHOE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Colchester; containing 161 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1874 acres, of which 161 are common or waste; it is bounded on the east by the navigable river Colne; the soil is generally a strong loam, producing average crops. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Earl Waldegrave: the tithes have been commuted for £480, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with a tower of stone; the east window of the chancel is decorated with numerous armorial bearings. There is a small national school.

LANGVIEW.—See LLANGEVIEW.

LANGFIELD, a township, in the ecclesiastical district of HEPTONSTALL, parish of HALIFAX, union of TODMORDEN, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Halifax; containing 3284 inhabitants. The township is partly situated in the picturesque vale of Todmorden, and comprises by computation 2620 acres, a large portion of which is common or moorland belonging to the freeholders, who depasture it in lots proportioned to the extent of their freeholds. There are quarries of good building-stone. The township includes the hamlets of Stoodley and Mankinholes, and also contains within its limits some scattered dwellings, forming a kind of suburb to the town of Todmorden. Its surface is boldly undulated, and the surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified. On the moor are two capacious reservoirs, one of which covers fifty-three acres of ground, for the supply of the canal and the various mills in the neighbourhood; and on a commanding eminence in the hamlet of Stoodley, called Stoodley Pike, a lofty column was erected in 1814, by subscription, to commemorate the restoration of peace throughout Europe. A fair for sheep is held at Lumbutts on the 11th of September. There are places of worship for dissenters.

LANGFORD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of BIGGLESWADE, county of BEDFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Biggleswade; containing 840 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £240; impropriator, M. E. Welby, Esq.

LANGFORD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of FARRINGTON, partly in the hundred of FARRINGTON, county of BERKS, and partly in that of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Lechlade; containing, with the tything of Little Farringdon, in Berks, and the township of Grafton and hamlet of Radcutt, in Oxfordshire, 707 inhabitants. It is said that the boundary line of the two counties divides the church and churchyard. For electoral purposes the whole parish is attached to Oxfordshire. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21. 19. 4½.; net income, £349; patron, W. Vizard, Esq.; appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment, under acts of inclosure, in 1808 and 1810. The church has been repaired, and 140 free sittings have been provided, the Incorporated Society having granted £80 in aid of the expense. There is a chapel of ease at Little Farringdon.

LANGFORD (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by W.) from Maldon; containing 257 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the Chelmer and Blackwater navigation, is about six miles in circumference. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 4. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of J. E. Wescomb, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £270, and the glebe comprises 32 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice. A school is conducted on the national plan.

LANGFORD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of SWAFFHAM, hundred of SOUTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Brandon; containing 57 inhabitants. It comprises 1405a. 12p., of which about 892 acres are arable, 366 pasture, meadow, and heath, and 130 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Ickborough united, valued together in the king's books at £10. 2. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £238; patrons, Lords Berners and Ashburton. The tithes have been commuted for £120, and the glebe contains $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is chiefly in the early style, and consists of a nave and chancel, separated by a decorated Norman archway; the chancel contains a splendid monument to the Garrard family.

LANGFORD (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union, and N. division of the wapentake, of NEWARK, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Newark; containing 146 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the west by the river Trent, comprises by computation nearly 2900 acres. Its soil on the west side, which is principally meadow land, is strong; in the middle portion, a fine turnip soil, on a substratum of gravel; and on the east, a cold wet gravel and a tenacious clay. The surface is generally flat, but the village, irregularly built upon an eminence overlooking the river, has a picturesque appearance. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £40; patrons, Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The Fosse-road crosses the parish.

LANGFORD, a hamlet, partly in the parish of BURRINGTON, hundred of BRENT with WRINGTON, and partly in that of CHURCHILL, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, union of AXBRIDGE, E. division of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Axbridge. It is situated on the road from Bristol to Axbridge, and is divided into Upper and Lower Langford, in which latter is the village.

LANGFORD-BUDVILLE (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, hundred of MILVERTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Wellington; containing 608 inhabitants. It comprises 1750 acres, of which 176 are common or waste. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Milverton. The church contains a monument to William Bacon, ancestor of the celebrated sculptor.

LANGFORD, LITTLE (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of WILTON, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Wilton; containing 37 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Wiley, near the road to Bath, and comprises 900 acres, by measurement. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Earl of Pembroke: the tithes have been commuted for £145, and the glebe comprises 9 acres. The church is plain, with a south porch, over which is some ancient sculpture.

LANGFORD, STEEPLE, or GREAT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WILTON, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Wilton; containing 626 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Wiley, and upon the road to Bath, and comprises 3935 acres. A fair for sheep and horses is held on the 4th of October, upon the site of an old British camp named Yarnborough Castle. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £34. 0. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Corpus Christi College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £720, and the glebe comprises $45\frac{1}{2}$ acres. There are some trifling benefactions for distribution to the poor.

LANGHALE (St. STEPHEN), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of LODDON, E. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Bungay. The living is a rectory, united to that of Kirstead, and not valued in the king's books.

LANGHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, Colchester division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Colchester; containing 816 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the navigable river Stour, and is supposed to have derived its name from the great length to which it extends, comprises 2971a. 1r. 38p. of good land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 11. $0\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster: the tithes have been commuted for £629. 4., and the glebe comprises 63 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice with a tower, and consists of a nave, south aisle, and chancel. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and a school has been established, which is conducted on the national system.

LANGHAM (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union and soke of OAKHAM, county of RUTLAND, 2 miles (N. W.) from Oakham; containing 591 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 2809 acres, of which 601 are arable, 1368 pasture, 16 woodland, 81 roads and waste, and the remainder meadow. Good stone is quarried for building and for the roads. The Oakham and Milton canal passes through the parish. The living, with that of Brooke, is annexed to the vicarage of Oakham. The church is a very handsome structure. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A school is supported by a bequest of the Rev. H. Forster; and a girls' school has been built, and is supported, by the Countess of Gainsborough. The poor have bequests amounting to £49. 16. per annum.

LANGHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of STOW, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Ixworth; containing 293 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement nearly 1000 acres, and is chiefly the property of Joseph Wilson, Esq., whose seat, Langham Hall, is pleasantly situated. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 16. $10\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £252, and the glebe comprises 52 acres. The church, within the grounds of the hall, is in the decorated English style, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by a richly-carved screen. A national school is supported by Mr. Wilson. Ten acres of land are let in small allotments; and there is a farm of 11 acres, of which the rent is laid out in clothing for the poor.

LANGHAM, GREAT, or BISHOP'S (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of WALSHINGHAM, hundred of Holt, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Blakeney; containing 383 inhabitants. This parish, which includes also that of Little Langham, comprises 1692a. 17p., whereof 150 acres are pasture, 100 woodland, and the remainder arable; the soil is of a mixed quality, and in some parts rather light, resting on a substratum of marl; the surface is gently undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by a tributary stream falling into the river Stiffkey. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 10. 2.; net income, £146; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Norwich. The tithes of Great and Little Langham were commuted for land in 1815; the glebe of this parish comprises 101 acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains a Norman font. There are no remains of the church of Little Langham.

LANGHAM-ROW, a hamlet, in the parish of MUMBY, union of SPILSBY, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 71 inhabitants.

LANGLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of HAMPSTEAD-NORRIS, union of WANTAGE, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from East Ilsley. The chapel has long been desecrated.

LANGLEY, a township, in the parish and union of LANCHESTER, W. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Durham; containing 81 inhabitants. This place was, very probably, the residence of Henry, Lord Scroop, temp. Henry VIII., and the occasional seat of his descendants, who held the estate till the death of the Earl of Sunderland, in 1630, when it passed by marriage to the Marquess of Winchester, in whose family it remained till, in the middle of the last century, it was sold to the Lambtons. The township comprises about 2500 acres, and is situated on the road from Durham to Lanchester. On the bank of the river Browney are the ruins of an ancient castellated mansion, formerly belonging to the Scroops, and part of which has been converted into a farm-house. The view from it over the vale of the Browney is wild and varied, and in front, to the east, the cathedral rises majestically over the Durham hills.

LANGLEY (St. John the Evangelist), a parish, in the union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of CLAVERING, N. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Newport; containing 448 inhabitants. It comprises 1617a. 2r. 27p., of which 807 acres are arable, 500 pasture, 260 woodland, and 50 waste. The living is an endowed vicarage, annexed to Clavering; improprators, Governors of the Hospitals of Christchurch, Bethlehem, and St. Thomas, London. The great tithes have been commuted for £152, and the vicarial for £153, and the glebe comprises 47 acres. The chapel, a very ancient edifice, was enlarged by the addition of a chancel during its appropriation to the priory. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a small national school.

LANGLEY, a hamlet, in the parish and union of HITCHIN, hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD; containing, with Missenden, 170 inhabitants.

LANGLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBORNE, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 4 miles (S. E.) from Maidstone; containing 294 inhabitants. It comprises 1263a. 1r. 24p., of which 923 acres are arable and pasture, and 340 woodland, exclusively of about 60 acres of heath and waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 19. 9½; net income, £390, with a house; patron, P. Pusey, Esq. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LANGLEY (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of LODDON, E. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (N.) from Loddon; containing 323 inhabitants. This place was distinguished at an early period as the site of an abbey, founded and liberally endowed, in 1198, by Robert Fitz-Roger Helke, for Præmonstratensian canons; the establishment flourished till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £128. 19. 9.; there are considerable remains of the conventual buildings. The parish is on the navigable river Yare, and comprises 2723 acres, of which 475 are common or waste; the scenery is pleasingly diversified. Langley Park, the seat of Sir W. B. Proctor, Bart., is a stately mansion, with a portico of the Doric order; in the grounds is an ancient cross. The village is pleasantly situated, and the inhabitants had formerly the privilege of a market, granted in the reign of John. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £50; patron and improprator, Sir W. B. Proctor, whose tithes have been commuted for £400. The church is a handsome structure, with a square embattled tower, and is remarkable for the beauty of its windows, which were all embellished with richly-stained glass by the late Sir T. B. Proctor; in the chancel are several neat monuments to the Beauchamp and Proctor families. Schools are supported by Sir W. B. Proctor and his lady.

LANGLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of SHIPTON-UNDER-WHICHWOOD, union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (N. E.) from Burford; containing 68 inhabitants. A palace of King John was formerly situated here, and a portion of the walls is still remaining. There is a quarry of rough marble, which is susceptible of a very high polish.

LANGLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of ACTON-BURNELL, union of ATCHAM, hundred of CONDOVER, S. division of SALOP, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Much Wenlock; containing 83 inhabitants, and comprising 1487 acres, tithe-free.

LANGLEY, a township, in the parish of HALES-OWEN, union of BROMSGROVE, Hales-Owen division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, county of SALOP; containing 802 inhabitants.

LANGLEY, a tything, in the parish of WIVELISCOMBE, union of WELLINGTON, W. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY and of the county of SOMERSET; containing 1499 inhabitants.

LANGLEY, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW FOREST, hundred of REDBRIDGE, Romsey and

S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 617 inhabitants.

LANGLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of CLAVERDON, union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, Henley division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Henley-in-Arden; containing 179 inhabitants. It contains 991 acres of tolerably good land, and is watered by a small branch of the river Avon.

LANGLEY, a tything, in the parish of KINGTON ST. MICHAEL, union of CHIPPENHAM, N. division of the hundred of DAMERHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Chippenham; containing 601 inhabitants. A small school is supported by subscription.

LANGLEY, ABBOT'S (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WATFORD, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. by S.) from King's-Langley; containing 2115 inhabitants. Here are some corn and paper mills. The Grand Junction canal passes through the parish, and the London and Birmingham railway within less than a mile of the church. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15, and in the gift of Sir J. Filmer, Bart., who is impropriator: the great tithes have been commuted for £856. 17. 6., and the vicarial for £315; there are 7 acres of glebe. The church, partly Norman, and partly in the later English style, has a square tower surmounted by a short spire, and contains some handsome monuments, among which is one to Chief Justice Raimond. A national school is endowed with £10 per annum, and a school of industry for girls, with £8 per annum; and there is another school, supported by charity. Nicholas de Breakspear, who first instructed the Norwegians in Christianity, and the only Englishman ever raised to the popedom, was born in the parish, though the place from which he took his name is situated in the adjoining parish of St. Michael; he assumed the title of Adrian IV., and was poisoned in 1159, in the fifth year of his pontificate, by a citizen of Rome, whose son he had refused to consecrate bishop.

LANGLEY-BURREL (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Chippenham; containing 626 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Oxford road from Chippenham to Bath, and through the centre of it, to the summit of Wickhill, extends a causeway more than three miles in length, supported on 60 arches, and carried over the river Avon and across the adjoining meadows. It was constructed at the expense of Maude Heath, to whom a monument, with the figure of a female sitting, has been erected, in commemoration of her munificence; and the causeway has been since continued on the London road from Chippenham to the foot of Derry Hill, an additional length of three miles. The Great Western railway passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 7. $3\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £386; patron and incumbent, Rev. R. Ashe. A national school is supported by subscription.

LANGLEY-DALE, with SHOTTON, a township, in the parish of STAINDROP, union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 4 miles (N. W.) from Staindrop; containing 185 inhabitants. The township comprises 4685a. 2r.

17p., of which the soil is fertile, though in many parts wet, from its proximity to the moors. The smelting-works established here, at the Gaunless lead-mill, are owned by the Duke of Cleveland, and leased to Messrs. Stagg and Sherlock. The land is tithe-free, with the exception of a farm of 59 acres, the tithes of which have been commuted for a rent-charge of £7, payable to the Duke of Cleveland, as impropriator. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a small school is partly supported by his Grace. Here is an ancient tower, formerly an out-post belonging to Raby Castle.

LANGLEY, KING'S (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HEMEL-HEMPSTEAD, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 19 miles (W. S. W.) from Hertford; containing, with the hamlet of Chipperfield, 1629 inhabitants. A priory, or house for friars-preachers, was founded here by Roger, son of Robert Helle, or Helke, and afterwards enlarged and more liberally endowed by the munificence of the kings Edward I., II., III., and IV.; it possessed, in the 26th of Henry VIII., a revenue of £150. 14. 8. Queen Mary restored it for a prioress and nuns, but it was totally suppressed in the 1st of Elizabeth. The parish comprises 3461 acres, of which 182 are common or waste. A large paper manufactory affords employment to about 50 persons. The Grand Junction canal passes through the parish, in excavating for which a human skeleton and jawbones, of gigantic size, were found in 1820, and an ancient sword and a spear in 1822. One of the second-class stations on the London and Birmingham railway has been established here. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Ely. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £600, and the vicarial for £220: the appropriate glebe comprises 95 acres, and the vicarial 5 acres. The church is of flint and stone, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a short spire, and has been enlarged, and galleries built; it contains the tomb of Edmund de Langley, fifth son of Edward III., and Duke of York, who was born at a royal palace here, and was buried in 1402, in the church of the priory, from which, at the Dissolution, his tomb was removed to the parish church. About five years since, a chapel was erected and endowed by subscription at Chipperfield common, where the poor are occasionally christened and buried.

LANGLEY, KIRK (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BELPER, hundred of MORLESTON and LIT-CHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Derby; containing, with the township of Meynell-Langley, 647 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 2. 1.; net income, £318; patron, Godfrey Meynell, Esq. The church was nearly destroyed by a violent tempest, in 1545. A school-house, erected in 1750, was endowed in 1752, by the Rev. John Bailey, rector, with land now let for £12 a year, and again, in 1768, with a rent-charge of £5.

LANGLEY-MARISH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of ETON, hundred of STOKE, county of BUCKINGHAM; comprising a portion of the market-town of Colnbrook, and containing 1844 inhabitants. The Great Western railway passes through the parish, a short distance north of the church. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Wyrardisbury; impropriator, W. Nash, Esq. The old chapel of St. Mary, which forms the chancel of the church, was erected in the time of Edward I., and contains three stone stalls and a piscina, and there is also a curious chapel, built for a pew by Sir John Kederminster, in 1613, and attached to the estate of Langley Park. Here is a place of worship for Independents; and a national school for girls is supported by subscription. Sir John Kederminster founded, in 1649, almshouses for four people, and endowed them with property producing £52. 2. per annum. Henry Seymour erected others for six inmates, in support of which Captain Henry Seymour, in 1733, bequeathed £30 per annum.

LANGLEY, MEYNELL, a township, in the parish of KIRK-LANGLEY, union of BELPER, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY; containing 122 inhabitants. The manor took its name from an ancient family who possessed it so early as the reign of Edward III., and from whom it passed, by successive female heirs, to the families of Bassett and Cavendish. In the year 1669, William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, sold it to Isaac Meynell, citizen of London, whose only daughter and heirress conveyed it to the Cecils, by whom the lands were sold to another branch of the family of Meynell. There are now several owners.

LANGLEY-PRIORY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER; containing 9 inhabitants. A priory of Benedictine nuns, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded in the beginning of the reign of Henry II., by William Pantulf and Burgia his wife; the revenue, at the Dissolution, was estimated at £34. 6. 2.

LANGLEY-WOOD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of ALDERBURY, hundred of FRUSTFIELD, Salisbury and Amesbury and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 15 inhabitants.

LANGMERE, a hamlet, in the parish of DICKLEBURGH, union of DEPWADE, hundred of DISS, Eastern division of the county of NORFOLK; containing 109 inhabitants.

LANGO, a district chapelry, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Clitheroe; containing 988 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have been the scene of a battle that occurred between Wada, a Saxon duke, and one of the murderers of Ethelred, and Ardulph, King of Northumberland, in the year 798, in which the former was defeated, and his army put to flight. The chapelry is bounded on the east by the river Calder, and in other parts by the Ribble, and comprises about 1800 acres; the soil is cold and wet, and in some places are pits of marl, sunk to a great depth; also quarries of stone, principally used in draining. The inhabitants are partly employed in hand-loom weaving. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £125; patron, Vicar of Blackburn. The church, a very ancient structure, contains some interesting details; in the south wall of the chancel is a piscina of elegant design; and inserted in the north wall is a font of one single stone, beautifully enriched with tracery. There is a Roman Catholic chapel. A school for the instruction of the poor is supported by an endowment of land; and two school-rooms have been built.

LANGPORT-EAST-OVER (ALL SAINTS), an incorporated market-town, and a parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of PITNEY, W. division of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Somerton, and 130 (W. S. W.) from London, on the great western road; containing 1172 inhabitants.

This place, in the Domesday survey called Lanporth, is of great antiquity, and is supposed to have derived its name from the Saxon words long, extended, and port, a town, from the length of its principal street. It was a royal burgh in the time of William the Conqueror, and contained 34 resident burgesses; and in the civil war in the reign of Charles I., being considered a commanding station, it was well garrisoned, and alternately in the possession of the royal and the parliamentary forces. In July, 1644, the former were compelled to abandon the place, from the result of an engagement here, in which 300 men were killed, and 1400 made prisoners. The town is situated on the river Parret, which is navigable for barges, near its junction with the Yeo and the Ile; at the western entrance a very ancient bridge of ten arches crosses the river, and there are nine other bridges, which are repaired from the funds of the corporation. At the eastern approach, on the old lines of fortification, is an arch thrown over the road, which supports a building called the "Hanging Chapel," formerly devoted to religious uses, but during Monmouth's rebellion, the place of execution. The principal part of the town is on an eminence, and commands some pleasing and extensive views; but that portion near the river, lying low, is subject to frequent inundations. Since 1800, the general appearance of the whole has been much improved by the erection of many new houses, and the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water from an adjacent well. A considerable traffic in coal, culm, iron, timber, salt, corn, &c., is carried on with London, Bristol, and various other places; and several boats, of from eight to fourteen tons' burthen, are constantly employed between this town and Bridgwater. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the Monday before Lent, the second Wednesday in August, the last Monday but one in September, and the last Monday in November, for cattle.

The government is vested, by a renewed charter of James I., in the year 1617, in a corporation consisting of twelve chief burgesses, including a portreeve, justice, and two bailiffs, assisted by a recorder, town-clerk, serjeant-at-mace, and other officers. The portreeve, justice, and recorder, are justices of the peace; the portreeve is coroner for the borough and clerk of the market, and his predecessor is justice. The corporation are empowered to hold a court of record before the portreeve, recorder, and bailiffs, every Tuesday, for pleas not exceeding the value of 40s. The town-hall, which is a neat edifice, was erected about 1733. The borough sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I., but the privilege was not subsequently exercised. The parish comprises 171a. 1p., chiefly pasture. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Huish-Epis- copi: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £15, and the vicarial for £70. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style; in the eastern window, amongst other representations in stained glass, are those of the Twelve Apostles; the edifice recently underwent new internal arrangement and decoration. There is a place of worship for Independents. The free grammar school, founded about the year 1675, by Thos. Gillett, has an income of £70 per annum; a national school was erected in 1827. An hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, stood here previously to 1310. The poor law union of Langport comprises 29 parishes or places, and contains a population of 18,109.

LANGPORT-WESTOVER, a hamlet, in the parish of CURRY-RIVELL, union of LANGPORT, hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 171 inhabitants.

LANGPORT-WESTOVER, a tything, in the parish of HUISSH-EPISCOPI, union of LANGPORT, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 66 inhabitants.

LANGRICK-FERRY, an extra-parochial place, in the union and soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 22 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Methodists.

LANGRICK-VILLE, a chapelry, in the union of BOSTON, soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 218 inhabitants. Langrick-Ville was, with six other districts, created a township, by act of parliament, in 1812, on the occasion of a very extensive drainage of about 14,000 acres of Wildmore, and the eastern and western fens. A chapel was consecrated in 1818, of which the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £91; patrons, certain Trustees.

LANGRIDGE (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of BATH-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Bath; containing 109 inhabitants. This place is distinguished as the scene of a sanguinary though indecisive battle which occurred on Lansdown Hill, at the extremity of the parish, between the royalist and parliamentary armies, in 1643, and which is commemorated by a monument, erected on the spot, to Sir Bevil Grenville, who fell in that engagement. The parish comprises 647 acres, of which 32 are common or waste; the soil is rocky, and the surface diversified with hill and dale; the scenery is in parts enriched with wood, and the lower grounds are watered by a rivulet, which bounds the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 19. 4½., and in the gift of William Blathwayt, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £112, and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower, and consists of a nave and chancel, between which is a highly-enriched Norman arch; there is also a Norman arch of plainer character in the south porch. In rebuilding the rectory-house, a few years since, several stone coffins and skulls, and a silver-mounted battle-axe, were discovered.

LANGRIGG, with MEALRIGG, a township, in the parish of BROMFIELD, union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Wigton; containing 262 inhabitants.

LANGRISH, a tything, in the parish and hundred of EAST MEON, union of PETERSFIELD, Petersfield and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 222 inhabitants.

LANGSETT, a township, in the parish of PENISTONE, union of WORTLEY, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Penistone; containing 303 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the county of Chester, and comprises by computation nearly 4400 acres, chiefly a mountainous tract of moorland, for the inclosure of which an act was obtained in 1820; but the greater portion is still uncultivated, affording only rough pasture. The principal sources of the river Don are within the limits of the township.

LANGSTONE, with TRE-EVAN, a township, in the parish of LLANGARRAN, union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD; containing 104 inhabitants.

LANGSTONE, a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, 4½ miles (E. by N.) from Newport; containing, with the chapelry of Llanbeder, 220 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1200 acres, of which 350 are arable, 800 pasture, and 50 woodland; the soil in the southern and western portions is chiefly clay, resting upon limestone, and in the northern and eastern of a light sandy quality. Llanbeder comprises about 200 acres. The scenery is beautifully diversified, and the northern part of the parish, through which runs the road from Chepstow to Newport, commands a fine view of the Severn, and the counties of Devon and Somerset. Limestone is quarried for burning, and also for tomb-stones and paving. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 1. 0½.; net income, £158; patron, Montague Gore, Esq.: the glebe comprises 50 acres. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the early and later English styles.

LANGTHORNE, a township, in the parish and union of BEDALE, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, 3¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bedale; containing 115 inhabitants. The Duke of Leeds, who is proprietor of most of the district, has a large brick and tile manufactory here.

LANGTHORP, a township, in the parish of KIRBY-ON-THE-MOOR, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, ½ mile (N. W.) from Boroughbridge; containing 304 inhabitants. The township is separated from Boroughbridge by the river Ure, and contains an extensive brewery, a large mill for flour, a mill for crushing bones, and an oil-mill. The Baptists have a place of worship.

LANGTHWAITE, with TILTS, a township, in the parish and union of DONCASTER, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK; containing 25 inhabitants. This place, called in Domesday book Langetovet, occupies a detached situation, being separated from the parish of Doncaster by that of Arksey; it adjoins Adwick-le-Street, and comprises about 400 acres, exclusively of 400 acres in an adjoining portion of ground called Tylse, or Tilts, also in the parish of Doncaster.

LANGTOFT (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of BOURNE, wapentake of NESS, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Market-Deeping; containing 779 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1857 acres; the soil in the higher grounds is a brown, and in the lower a rich black, loam; the surface is generally flat, and the lands have been much improved by draining. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 5. 7½.; net income, £288; patron, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Bart.; impropriators, Heirs of the late R. Parker, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1801; the glebe comprises 133 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, surmounted by a spire at the west end of the north aisle; the nave is lighted by a fine range of clerestory windows, and there are some portions of earlier date. A school is partly supported by a trifling endowment. Rachel Hyde, in 1707, bequeathed funds now accumulated to £450, for the purchase of a freehold estate for the poor.

LANGTOFT (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of DICKERING, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelry of Cottam, 688 inhabitants, of whom 647 are in Langtoft township, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Great Driffield. The parish is on the road from Driffield to Scarborough, and comprises, exclusively of Cottam, 3140 acres, of which the soil is generally very good; the scenery is open and bold, and on the wolds very wild and bleak. The village is picturesquely situated in a valley. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Cottam annexed, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £354; patron, Archbishop of York; impropriator, Rev. E. Gibbons. The tithes were commuted for land in 1801; there are 300 acres of glebe. The church is an old structure, with a square tower, and contains an ancient font. There is a chapel of ease at Cottam, in which divine service is performed monthly. The Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists have places of worship. Peter of Langtoft, a celebrated monk and historian, was born here.

LANGTON, a township, in the parish of GAINFORD, union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Darlington; containing 99 inhabitants. This place, under the appellation of Langadun, was one of the vills surrendered by Bishop Aldhune to the earls of Northumberland; it long formed part of the estate of the Nevills, was included in their forfeiture, and is now the property of the Duke of Cleveland. The township comprises 1061a. 2r.: a magnesian limestone quarry is in full operation. Langton-Grange was for some years the residence of the Countess Dowager of Darlington. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £61. 16., and the impropriate for £118. 2. 9., payable to Trinity College, Cambridge.

LANGTON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, wapentake of SOUTH GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1½ mile (W. by S.) from Horncastle; containing 177 inhabitants. The parish, of which the greater part is in the duchy of Lancaster, comprises 908 acres of land, with a subsoil of strong white clay, burnt as a substitute for lime. The river Witham, which communicates with the Horncastle canal, passes by one extremity of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 19. 4½., and in the gift of the Bishop of Lincoln: the tithes were commuted for land in 1767; the glebe comprises 172 acres, valued at £276, exclusive of 5 acres attached to the rectory-house, which has been nearly rebuilt by the present incumbent. The church is a plain modern edifice. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Two almshouses were founded, and endowed with 27 acres of land, by the Rev. Willoughby West, in 1691.

LANGTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3¼ miles (N. by W.) from Spilsby; containing 194 inhabitants. This parish, which has been the residence of the Langton family for more than seven centuries, comprises by computation 1261 acres: a soft kind of limestone, called calc, is found. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 3½., and in the gift of George Langton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £340, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is a handsome modern structure, of the Ionic order of Grecian architecture. There are three tumuli, and some slight vestiges of a Roman road.

LANGTON (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, E. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1¼ mile (E. S. E.) from Wragby; containing 262 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4.; patrons, alternately, and joint impropriators, Earl Manvers and C. Turnor, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £331. 12. 6., and the glebe comprises 32 acres.

LANGTON, with BONGATE, a township, in the parish of APPLEBY-ST. MICHAEL, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 1½ mile (E.) from Appleby, containing 618 inhabitants. Langton, or Long Town, once a populous place, was almost destroyed by the Scots, in the reign of Edward II. At Kirkbergh was anciently a church.

LANGTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK; containing 328 inhabitants, of whom 256 are in the township, 3½ miles (S. S. E.) from Malton. The parish includes the township of KENNYTHORPE, and comprises by computation 3080 acres, of which about 600 are sheep-walk on the wolds; the scenery is picturesque, and the soil of various kinds, being clayey in the valleys, and on the hilly parts of a lighter nature. The village is neat and pleasant, situated on a bold acclivity rising from a small rivulet, and contains Langton Hall, a handsome mansion, the seat of Lieut.-Col. Norcliffe, who is lord of the manor, and chief proprietor of the soil. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £460. The church is a neat structure, built on the site of a more ancient edifice, in 1820, at a cost of £600, and contains 300 sittings, all free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school was built in 1841.

LANGTON, CHURCH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Harborough; containing 869 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 4000 acres, and includes the township of East Langton, and the chapelries of Thorp-Langton, Tur-Langton, and West Langton. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £48. 13. 4.; net income, £989; patron, the Rev. William Hanbury. The church is an ancient and stately structure, in the decorated English style, of remarkably light and elegant design, but much out of repair. There are chapels at Thorp and Tur-Langton, and a place of worship for Independents. A school on the Hanbury foundation, endowed with £500 per annum, has lately been opened; and there is also a school for the townships of East and West Langton, supported by a rent-charge on land bequeathed by three ladies. The Rev. William Hanbury, for many years rector of the parish, and equally remarkable for his benevolence, and his taste for the cultivation of trees, of which he had extensive plantations, in 1767 bequeathed the profits arising from their sale at different periods, to trustees, for the erection of a splendid church in the parish, and for the endowment of colleges, schools, hospitals, and literary and charitable institutions of every description; but it was expressly ordered that the funds should be suffered to accumulate till they amounted to £10,000 or £12,000 per annum. In 1837, the funds had realized £6421. 10. 10., and the annual income of the charity was £574. Previously to the foundation of the school above noticed, the only branch of the bequest that had come into operation, was, a gift of beef to the parish, which has been continued since the year 1773, and is distributed annually among all the poor of the several townships. The accumulation is still in progress.

LANGTON, EAST, a township, in the parish of CHURCH-LANGTON, union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Harborough; containing 288 inhabitants. £38 per annum, the rent of 20 acres of land, allotted under an act of inclosure, in 1792, in lieu of common right, are applied to the repair of the highways. Thomas Staveley, an antiquary and church historian, was born here in 1626.

LANGTON, GREAT, a parish, in the union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK; including the township of Little Langton, and containing 252 inhabitants, of whom 160 are in Great Langton, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from North-Allerton. It comprises by computation 1550 acres, whereof 750 are in Great Langton township. The few houses here that give name to the parish, are so near the brink of the river Swale, that they are in frequent danger of being swept away. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 10. 10.; net income, £294; patron, the Rev. T. M. Hunt. The church is a small edifice, without aisles or tower, and stands in a retired situation about half a mile from the village. The old rectory-house, and two acres of glebe, are said to have been washed away by the river. A boys' school is supported by Mrs. Lawrence and the Rev. Dr. Drake, and a girls' school by Mrs. Drake.

LANGTON, HERRING, a parish, in the union of WEYMOUTH, hundred of UGGSOMBE, Dorchester division of DORSET, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Weymouth; containing 260 inhabitants. This place, which suffered much from an inundation of the sea in Nov. 1824, is bounded on the south-west by the Backwater, which separates it from the remarkable tongue of land called the Chesil Bank: this singular sheet of water is covered with a profusion of aquatic birds of every kind, and there are not less than 100 swans on it, the property of the Earl of Ilchester. The parish comprises 902 acres, of which 320 are common or waste; the soil is generally clay, alternated with sand, but beds of shells to a considerable depth abound in various places, and there no soil of any kind is found. The surface is hilly, and the surrounding scenery is characterised by features rather of boldness than of beauty; there are some quarries of limestone, and granite of excellent quality is found. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 2. 11., and in the alternate patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall, and Isaac Sparks, Esq.; net income, £126. The church has been enlarged.

LANGTON, LITTLE, a township, in the parish of GREAT LANGTON, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from North-Allerton; containing 92 inhabitants. It comprises about 800 acres, and lies to the south-east of Great Langton. Langton Lodge is a neat mansion on the bank of the Swale.

LANGTON-LONG-BLANDFORD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford division of DORSET, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (E. S. E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 202 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1100 acres; the soil is chiefly chalk, alternated with clay, the former occurring in the arable, and the latter in the pasture, lands; the surface is diversified with hills, and the lower grounds are watered by the Stour. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 10.; net income, £379; patron, J. T. Farquharson, Esq. The church, an ancient edifice, had formerly a chantry in honour of St. Mary and St. Thomas, and an hospital for lepers existed here in the reign of Edward I. A small school is supported by subscription.

LANGTON-MATRAVERS (ST. GEORGE), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of ROWBARROW, Wareham division of DORSET, 9 miles (S. E.) from Wareham; containing 762 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the British Channel, and situated on the road from Wareham to Swanage, comprises by measurement 2250 acres of arable and pasture in nearly equal portions, with a little wood, and 83 acres of common or waste; the scenery is bold and romantic, and the upper lands command some fine views of the Channel and the Isle of Wight; the soil is a heavy clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 8. 9.; patron and incumbent, Rev. John Dampier: the tithes have been commuted for £380, and the glebe comprises 18 acres. The church was, in 1838, nearly rebuilt on a larger scale, at an expense of £900, by subscription; it had formerly a chantry for the use of the small priory of St. Leonard, at Wilcheswode, which was founded before the time of Edward III. There is a remarkable oblong tumulus within the parish.

LANGTON, THORP, a chapelry, in the parish of CHURCH-LANGTON, union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Harborough; containing 160 inhabitants. £28, the rent of an allotment of 13 acres, under an inclosure act, in 1792, are applied to the repairs of the highways. The chapel is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LANGTON, TUR, a chapelry, in the parish of CHURCH-LANGTON, union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Harborough; containing 350 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LANGTON, WEST, a chapelry, in the parish of CHURCH-LANGTON, union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Harborough; containing 71 inhabitants. Here is a school with a small endowment. Walter de Langton, lord high treasurer of England, a favourite of Edward I., was born here.

LANGTON-WOODHOUSE, an extra-parochial place, adjacent to the parish of APLEY, in the W. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, union and county of LINCOLN; containing 7 inhabitants.

LANGTREE, a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Great Torrington; containing 941 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Torrington to Holsworthy and Launceston, and comprises 4594 acres, of which 322 are common or waste; the soil is various, in some parts fertile, and in others coarse and of inferior quality; the arable lands produce fair crops of wheat, barley, and oats, and the pastures are generally good; the prevailing timber is oak and pine. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £29. 1. 3., and in the gift of Lord Rolle: the tithes have been commuted for £510, and the glebe comprises 64 acres. The church is an ancient structure, containing some rich specimens of architectural beauty. There was formerly a chapel at Cross Hill, in the parish.

LANGTREE, with STANDISH, a township, in the parish of STANDISH, union of WIGAN, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of LANCASHIRE, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Wigan; containing 2565 inhabitants.

LANGWATHBY.—See LONGWATHBY.

LANGWITH (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of MANSFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Mansfield; containing 194 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1360 acres, of which 230 are woodland, and the remainder chiefly arable; the surface is diversified with hill and dale, and the scenery enriched with wood, principally oak, ash, and elm. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 0. 2½., and in the gift of the Duke of Devonshire, who supports a school: the tithes have been commuted for £195, and the glebe comprises 44 acres. The church is a small ancient structure, and appears to have been originally of larger dimensions. A school is supported by endowment.

LANGWITH, a township, in the parish of CUCKNEY, union of WORKSOP, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Mansfield; containing 443 inhabitants. The township consists of 1295 acres. The village is pleasantly situated near the source of the river Poulter, and has a beautifully romantic appearance; near it is Langwith Hall, once the occasional residence of Earl Bathurst.

LANGWITH, a township, in the parish of WHEEL-DRAKE, union of YORK, wapentake of OUSE and DERWENT, E. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from York; containing 40 inhabitants. It comprises 718 acres, of which 168 are common or waste; the lands are set out in farms. The tithes have been commuted for £51. 13. 8.

LANGWORTH, a township, in the parish of BARLINGS, wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, union and county of LINCOLN; containing 251 inhabitants.

LANHYDROCK (St. HYDROCK), a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of PYDER, E. division of CORNWALL, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Bodmin; containing 263 inhabitants. Lanhydrock House, which is approached from the river Fowey by a fine avenue of trees about a mile in length, and under an archway, was garrisoned for the parliament in the civil war, and surrendered to the royalists under Sir Richard Granville, in Aug. 1644; it is an embattled structure of granite, forming three sides of a quadrangle, in the style that prevailed in the early part of the seventeenth century. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Hon. Anne Maria Agar. The church is a small elegant fabric, with an embattled tower, and a few years since underwent a thorough repair at the expense of the Hon. A. M. Agar, the original style of the building being preserved. There is an ancient cross in the churchyard.

LANIVET, a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of PYDER, E. division of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Bodmin; containing 1149 inhabitants. It comprises 5008 acres, of which 600 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24; net income, £667; patron and incumbent, Rev. William Phillips. In the churchyard is an ancient Maltese cross. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans. About a quarter of a mile from the church are considerable remains of a Benedictine monastery, called St. Bene't's, supposed to have been a nunnery subordinate to some foreign house. There are certain lands, part of its former possessions, producing an income of about £150 per annum, which is applied in aid of the poor rates, with the exception of about £17 to a school.

LANLIVERY (St. BREVITA), a parish, in the union of BODMIN, E. division of POWDER hundred and of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by S.) from Lostwithiel; containing 1809 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Plymouth to Falmouth, and intersected by the river Fowey, and comprises 6814 acres, of which 563 are common or waste land. Granite of very good quality is quarried extensively for the use of the dockyards of Plymouth and Portsmouth. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 6. 8.; patron, Nicholas Kendall, Esq.; impropiator, Earl of Mount-Edgumbe. The rectorial tithes have been commuted for £372. 10., and the vicarial for £304. 10., and the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church is a handsome structure of granite, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, and consists of two spacious aisles, separated by a central range of clustered columns. There are two places of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is supported by subscription.

LANOVER.—See LLANOVER; and the same with regard to other places, having the prefix LLAN.

LANREATH (St. MARNARCH), a parish, in the union of LISKEARD, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from West Looe; containing 651 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4560 acres, of which 400 are common or waste; the soil is various; there are some fertile portions of arable and pasture land, and others of very inferior quality. The river called Herod's Foot, and the lakes of Ball and Trebant Water, are within the parish. Fairs for cattle are held on Whit-Tuesday, Nov. 18th, and the third Tuesday after Shrovetide. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £32, and in the patronage of John Bul-ler, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £522, and the glebe comprises 70 acres. The church is a hand-some structure, in the later English style, with some Norman details, and contains a curious Norman font, and an elegantly-carved screen in good preservation, in one of the panels of which is a portrait in oil of Richard II. There are places of worship for Calvinists and Wesleyans. A national school is supported by sub-scription, and a weekly and Sunday school by the rector. Some remains exist of a Roman encampment on Bury Down.

LANSALLOES (St. ALWYS), a parish, in the union of LISKEARD, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 6 miles (W. by S.) from West Looe; containing 828 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by Lantivet bay, and comprises by measurement 2774 acres, of which 80 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18; patron and incum-bent, the Rev. William Rawlings: the tithes have been commuted for £500, and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a neat structure. There is an episcopal chapel, erected in 1839, at the expense of the Rev. W. Rawlings, by whom a school is supported.

LANTEGLOS (St. LANTY), a parish, in the union of LISKEARD, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 2 miles (E.) from Fowey; containing, with the township of Polruan, 1269 inhabitants, of whom 549 are in the township of Lanteglos. This place is separated from the town of Fowey by the river and harbour of the same name, for the defence of which there is an old castle, corresponding with one on the opposite shore. The fishing village of Polruan had anciently a market and a fair, and appears to have been of some importance, having furnished one ship and sixty mariners to the fleet before Calais, in the reign of Edward III. Barton manor-house, in the parish, garrisoned for the par-liament, sustained much injury in the civil war, and ultimately surrendered to Sir Richard Granville, who placed in it a garrison for Charles I., that monarch having narrowly escaped being shot here, whilst inspecting the harbour from a fine promenade in the grounds. The parish comprises 2773 acres by computation; the soil is various, partly a shelving slate, and partly good corn land; the surface is very irregular, rising into hills of precipitous elevation, and the lower grounds are watered by numerous springs. The copper-mine of Wheal Howell was discovered within the last twenty years, and is now in operation. The living is a vicar-age, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £14. 7. 1.; patron, and impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, Lord Granville. The inappropriate tithes have been com-muted for £315, and the vicarial for £225, and the glebe comprises 8 acres. On the brow of a hill behind the village are the remains of an ancient chapel dedicated to Christ, serving as a landmark.

LANTEGLOS cum CAMELFORD (St. SANTY AND St. ADVENT), a parish, in the union of CAMELFORD, hun-dred of LESNEWTH, E. division of CORNWALL, 1½ mile (W. S. W.) from Camelford; containing 1541 inhabitants, of whom 836 are in Lanteglos. This parish, which is intersected by the river Camel, comprises by measure-ment 3562 acres; the surface is very hilly, and the soil for the greater part is shallow and slaty, with some por-tions of good meadow land on the banks of the river. A slate quarry is in full operation. The living is a rec-tory, with that of Advent annexed, valued in the king's books at £34. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall; net income, £474. The church is a very handsome structure, with a lofty tower, and contains 500 sittings. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, and an endowed school on the national system. Near Castle Gough are some remains of earthworks.

LANTON, a township, in the parish of KIRK-NEW-TON, union of GLENDALE, W. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Wooler; containing 83 inhabitants. It is situated on the north side of the Glen river, and also north of the road from Kirk-Newton to Wooler; the houses are few and scattered.

LAPAL, a township, in the parish of HALES-OWEN, union of BROMSGROVE, Hales-Owen division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, county of SALOP; containing 351 inhabitants.

LAPFORD (St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of NORTH TAWTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 5¼ miles (S. E.) from Chulmleigh; containing 706 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3580 acres, of which 438 are common or waste. Serges were formerly manufactured to a considerable extent, but about the year 1820, the factory was taken down. Bury Barton House, now a farm building, was anciently a splendid mansion, the property of the late Admiral Bury; there are still some remains of the chapel. A fair is held on the Monday after the festival of St. Thomas à Becket. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 1. 10½.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. John Arundel Radford. The church is a very ancient structure, with a richly-carved oak screen. There is a place of worship for dissenters; and a parochial school is supported by subscription.

LAPLEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of PENKRIDGE, W. division of the hundred of CUTLE-STONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 3¼ miles (W. by S.) from Penkridge; containing, with the chapelry of Wheaton-Aston, 952 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 12. 3½.; net income, £124; patron and impro-piator, S. Swinfen, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £300, and the vicarial for £200, and the glebe comprises 22 acres. In 1669, Joan Scutt gave £10 per annum for instruction. Here was anciently a priory of Black monks, subordinate to the abbey of St. Remigius at Rheims: all that now remains is the church, a large fabric, with a noble tower.

LAPWORTH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SOLIHULL, Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Henley-in-Arden; containing 729 inhabitants. It comprises 2810 acres, of which 30 are common or waste. The Stratford-on-Avon canal passes through. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 7., and in the gift of Merton College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £350, and the glebe comprises 68 acres. The church contains specimens of the early, decorated, and later English styles; the tower and spire are on the north side of the north aisle. There is a place of worship for Independents; and two schools are partly supported by the proceeds of benefactions, amounting to £412 per annum, which are applied to various benevolent purposes.

LARBRICK, with LITTLE ECCLESTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Poulton; containing 199 inhabitants. There is a chalybeate spring.

LARK-STOKE, a hamlet, in the parish of ILMINGTON, union of SHIPSTON-ON-STOUR, Upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (N. E.) from Chipping-Campden; containing 18 inhabitants.

LARKTON, a township, in the parish of MALPAS, union of NANTWICH, Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Whitchurch; containing 53 inhabitants.

LARLING (St. Ethelbert), a parish, in the union of WAYLAND, hundred of SHROPHAM, W. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from East Harling; containing 205 inhabitants. The parish, sometimes called Larlingford, comprises about 1400 acres; the soil is light, and in some parts sandy, and the lower grounds are watered by a river which divides this parish from that of Snetterton. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Lord Colborne: the tithes have been commuted for £209, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, with an embattled tower and a south porch, in which is a highly-enriched Norman arch.

LARTINGTON, a township, in the parish of ROMALD-KIRK, union of TEESDALE, wapentake of GILLINGWEST, N. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Barnard-Castle; containing 188 inhabitants. This place, which is situated in the vale of Teesdale, belonged in the 16th century to the family of the Maires, from whom it passed by marriage to the Lawsons, of Brough, near Catterick, and from them to its present proprietor, Henry Thornton Maire Witham, Esq., who is lord of the manor. The township comprises 5299 acres, of which 3438 are common or waste; a considerable portion is within the ancient forest of Stainmore. The surface is finely diversified with hill and dale, and intersected by deep rocky glens, well wooded, through which have been formed extensive rides of several miles, abounding with romantic features; the soil near the banks of the Tees is a rich loam, which assumes a less fertile aspect as it gradually recedes from the river towards the moorlands, which are stocked with grouse. A large quantity of moorland has been inclosed, and brought under profitable cultivation, by the present proprietor, and the pastures are good; the short-horned breed of cattle has attained great perfection, and on the several farms much attention is paid to the improvement of live stock. The woods are extensive and well managed; and the more elevated lands, crowned with thriving plantations, add much to the beauty of the landscape.

Lartington Hall, the seat of Mr. Witham, is a spacious mansion, situated on the bank of the Tees, in a richly-wooded park; the pleasure-grounds command some fine views of that river, combining a variety of interesting scenery, and the house and demesne have been much improved by the late and present proprietor. Attached to the hall is a Roman Catholic chapel, in which service is daily performed; the interior is embellished with a painting, in imitation of sculpture, by Le Brun. In 1831, Mr. Witham, who is distinguished for his love of geological research, laid the foundation-stone of a building which has been completed as a museum, and contains an extensive collection of geological and mineralogical specimens; it is open to public inspection at all times, and visited annually by numerous amateurs and professors of that science, for the promotion of which he has published a treatise on the internal structure of vegetable fossils, the study of which he has successfully reduced to method. The building is 63 feet in length, and of proportional breadth and height, and is of handsome architecture, with a highly-ornamented ceiling; the walls are hung with splendid mirrors, and adorned with a valuable and well-chosen collection of paintings by the most esteemed masters of the Italian and Flemish schools, and with others of more modern date. A beautiful clock was presented to Mr. Witham in 1838, by 2098 of the inhabitants of Barnard-Castle, in testimony of his attention to the interests of the town, and his exertions to promote infant education, and diffuse useful knowledge among the humbler classes. The village, which is situated on the western acclivity of the dale, consists of two ranges of neatly-built houses. The tithes have been commuted for £55. 13. A school was founded in the year 1686, by John Parkins and Francis Applebye, Esqrs., who endowed it with £100, and it has also an endowment of £7 per annum by William Hutchinson, to which the lord of the manor adds an annual gratuity, raising the master's salary to £20.

LARTON, with NEWTON, a township, in the parish of WEST KIRBY, union and Lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Great Neston; containing 53 inhabitants.

LASBOROUGH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TETBURY, hundred of LONGTREE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Tetbury; containing 12 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 994 acres, of which 714 are arable, 220 sheep-walks, and 60 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 5.; patron, Edward Estcourt, Esq.

LASHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ALTON, hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Alton; containing 284 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1587 acres, of which 1330 are arable, 57 meadow, and 200 woodland; the surface is varied, and the scenery of pleasing character; the soil is principally a red clay; the chief crops are wheat, oats, and barley, and the prevailing timber oak and beech. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 9., and in the gift of G. P. Jervoise, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £350, and the glebe comprises 81 acres. A national school is supported.

LASKILL-PASTURE, a township, in the parish and union of HELMSELEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Helmsley; containing 94 inhabitants. This is a small township, consisting of four farms, and lying on the east side of Ryedale.

LASSINGTON, a parish, in the Lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union and E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Gloucester; containing 82 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north and east by the river Leadon, and comprises about 520 acres, nearly two-thirds of which are of a light sandy soil, and the remainder a stiff clay, with some good dry meadow land. The Herefordshire and Gloucestershire canal runs parallel with the Leadon, which falls into the western branch of the Severn, near an ancient camp, where both rivers are crossed by the same bridge. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 10., and in the gift of Sir B. W. Guise, Bart., and the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, the former having two presentations, and the latter one: the tithes have been commuted for £119, and the glebe comprises 8 acres. The church is a small plain edifice. A parochial school is supported by subscription. The petrification called Astroites, or Star-stone, is met with in a hill in the neighbourhood.

LASTINGHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of PICKERING, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK; comprising the townships of Appleton-le-Moors, Farndale East-side, Hutton-le-Hole, Lastingham, Rosedale West-side, and Spaunton; and containing 1463 inhabitants, of whom 175 are in the township of Lastingham, 7 miles (N. W.) from Pickering. A Benedictine monastery was founded here, in honour of the Virgin Mary, about 648, by Cedd, Bishop of the East Saxons, and flourished until 1080, when the monks removed to York. The parish is intersected by the small river Dove, and comprises by computation 19,200 acres, of which 8000 are common or waste; 406 acres are in the township. The whole, with the exception of Farndale East-side, forms part of the manor of Spaunton, of which the Darley family, now represented by Henry Darley, Esq., of Aldby Park, have for a considerable period been the lords. The soil is of various qualities, and though there are some tracts of open moor and uncultivated land, much of it is fertile and productive. In Rosedale township are several beds of coal. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £17. 7. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £215. The church is a small and very ancient edifice, supposed to have belonged to the monastery; underneath the choir is a vaulted crypt, of which the massive cylindrical columns and sculptured arches exhibit fine specimens of Norman architecture, and other portions are in a later style; the east end is circular, and at the west end is a low tower. There are chapels of ease at Farndale East-side and Farndale High-Quarter; and at Appleton-le-Moors and Hutton-le-Hole are places of worship for Wesleyans. A school is conducted on the national plan. John Jackson, the celebrated painter, was a native of this place.

LATCHFORD, a chapelry, in the parish of GRAP-PENHALL, union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E.) from Warrington; containing 2361 inhabitants. Latchford had anciently two weekly markets and two fairs, granted in the fourteenth century. The Duke of Bridgewater's, the Mersey, and the Irwell canals pass through the parish. A cotton-manufactory has been established. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £181; patron, W. Hall, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, has been rebuilt, and contains 400 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £400.

LATCHFORD, a hamlet, in the parish of GREAT HASELEY, union of THAME, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Tetsworth; containing 32 inhabitants.

LATCHINGDON (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of Essex, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Maldon; containing 372 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by Latchingdon Creek and the river Blackwater, and on the south by the navigable river Crouch, and comprises 3672 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £37, and in the gift of the Archbishop of Canterbury: the tithes have been commuted for £900, and the glebe comprises 44 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice. A school, conducted upon the national system, is supported by the rector.

LATHBURY (All Saints), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile (N.) from Newport-Pagnell; containing 127 inhabitants. The parish, which is nearly surrounded by the river Ouse, comprises 1000 acres by computation; the soil is chiefly of a gravelly nature, and the surface is undulated. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £68; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. In the chancel of the church is a handsome pavement of black and white marble, the gift of Margaret, daughter of Sir H. Andrewes, Bart. The learned Dr. Chelsum, celebrated for his defence of Christianity against Gibbon, held the living. An ancient monastery formerly occupied the site of the present manor-house.

LATHOM, a township, in the parish and union of ORMSKIRK, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Ormskirk; containing 3262 inhabitants. This place was anciently the seat of the Lathom family, of whom Robert de Lathom, in the reign of Edward I., received the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair, and whose baronial mansion, Lathom House, equally remarkable for its extent and magnificence, and formidable for its strength, afterwards became so conspicuous in history. The manor, in the reign of Henry IV., was conveyed by marriage with the daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Lathom, to Sir John Stanley, ancestor of the earls of Derby, of whom Thomas, the first earl, entertained Henry VII. in his baronial castle here, at that time in its full splendour. This noble castle, which had eighteen towers, and was surrounded by a fosse eight yards in breadth, and accessible by a drawbridge, defended by a lofty gateway tower, was frequently besieged by the parliamentary forces during the reign of Charles I., of whose cause its owner was a resolute supporter. On the 28th of February, 1646, during the absence of the earl, it was besieged by General Fairfax with a force of 3000 men, but was heroically defended by the Countess of Derby, who, with her retinue of 300, in several destructive sallies, killed 500 of the assailants, and maintained possession till, on the arrival of the royalist army under Prince Rupert, the enemy thought proper to retire. In the following year the castle was again besieged by General Egerton, at the head of 4000 parliamentarians, to whom, after a protracted and obstinate resistance, it was finally surrendered for want of ammunition; after being plundered it was dismantled, and the fortifications were demolished. Upon the Restoration, Lathom House again became the residence of the Stanley family, and in 1730 was conveyed by marriage with Henrietta, daughter and heiress of William, Earl of Derby, to John, the third Earl of Ashburnham, by whom it was sold; and it was subsequently purchased by Sir Thomas Bootle, Knt., who restored and nearly rebuilt the ancient mansion, in a style commensurate to its former splendour, and by whose niece it was conveyed by marriage to Richard Wilbraham, Esq., father of Lord Skelmersdale, the present proprietor. The mansion is spacious, and contains numerous stately apartments, and a domestic chapel, lately improved at a cost of £1200; the park, which is nearly four miles in circumference, is tastefully embellished. The township comprises 7917 acres, of which 4383 are arable, 1286 meadow, 1894 pasture, and 229 woodland. The chapel, dedicated to St. John, is a neat structure, the living of which is a perpetual curacy; net income, £178; patron, Vicar of Ormskirk. The great tithes have been commuted for £1001. 6. 8. The free school at Newburgh, in the township, was erected in the year 1714, by the Rev. Thomas Crane, who endowed it with an estate at Dalton, which, with subsequent benefactions, produces £52 per annum; it is conducted on the national plan, and a school-house has been erected by Lord Skelmersdale, in which the children are instructed at his lordship's expense. At Lathom Park is an ancient almshouse, with a chapel. Here is a saline chalybeate spring.

LATIMER, ISELHEMPSTEAD, or EASTMANSTED-LATIMER, a chapelry, in the parish of CHESHAM, union of AMERSHAM, hundred of BURNHAM, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Chesham; containing 250 inhabitants. This place, with the surrounding estate, belonged, in the reign of Edward III., to Simon Beresford, on whose attainder it reverted to the crown, and was given to William and Elizabeth Latimer, from whom it derived its name. The ancient house has been almost entirely rebuilt, in the Tudor style. The living is a donative of very ancient date, endowed with the rectorial and other tithes of a portion of the parish of Chesham, and valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £101; patron, Hon. C. C. Cavendish, who and the Duke of Bedford are the impropiators. A chapel in the Elizabethan style, built by the Hon. Mr. Cavendish, was opened for divine service in 1842.

LATTON (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of EPPING, hundred of HARLOW, S. division of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Harlow; containing 303 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the river Stort, and comprises 1566 acres, whereof 174 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £7; patron and incumbent, Rev. J. Arkwright: the tithes have been commuted for £355, and the glebe comprises 113 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a square embattled tower. Here was a priory of Black canons, founded in the fourteenth century, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist: some remains of the conventual buildings have been converted into a barn, and contain specimens in the decorated style.

LATTON (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSET, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Cricklade and N. divisions of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W. by N.) from Cricklade; containing 379 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with which that of Eisey is annexed, valued in the king's books at £9. 3. 4.; net income, £380; patron and impropiator, Earl of St. Germans: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1801. The church is a neat structure. A national school is supported by the earl and the incumbent. A tessellated pavement was discovered in 1670.

LAUGHTERTON, a hamlet, in the parish of KETTLETHORPE, union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 174 inhabitants.

LAUGHTON (ST. LUKE), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Harborough; containing 180 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the north of the road leading from Harborough to Lutterworth, and comprises 1109 acres. From Laughton hills, celebrated in the annals of fox-hunting, are fine and extensive views of the surrounding country. The Grand Union canal passes about a mile from the village, and along the southern boundary of the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 10. 5.; net income, £247; patron, Charles Humfrey, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land, under an act of inclosure, in 1778, and under the recent Tithe act for a rent-charge of £100. 11. 9.; the glebe comprises 25 acres, with a good house. The church is an old and very small edifice, the two side aisles of which are said to have been pulled down many years since; it contains a monument to Colonel Cole, who served in the reign of Charles I. 12 acres of land, let in small allotments to the labouring poor, and producing £10 per annum, are applied to the use of the parish.

LAUGHTON, a parish, in the union of BOURNE, wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. by E.) from Falkingham; containing 73 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, united to the rectory of Falkingham. The church has long been in ruins.

LAUGHTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of CORRINGTON, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing, with the hamlet of Wildsworth, 483 inhabitants, of whom 336 are in the township of Laughton, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Gainsborough. This parish is situated on the river Trent, and comprises 4482 acres, of which about two-thirds are arable, and the remainder pasture, with 434 acres of common or waste; the soil is various, in some parts a stiff clay, and in others a shifting sand. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12; net income, £159; patron, Hugo Meynell Ingram, Esq. The church is a very neat structure. An additional church was built in 1839, in the hamlet of Wildsworth, chiefly at the expense of the late Lady William Gordon; it contains 100 sittings, all of which are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school was founded in the reign of James I., by Roger Dalysen, D.D., who endowed it with a rent-charge of £20; a new school-house was built for it in 1821, principally at the cost of the Marchioness of Hertford.

LAUGHTON, a parish, in the union of HAILSHAM, hundred of SHIPLAKE, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Uckfield; containing 850 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Lewes to Hastings, has been for ages the property of the Pelham family, earls of Chichester, whose ancient manorial mansion, Laughton Place, erected in 1534, is still remaining. There are some quarries of Sussex marble, which is susceptible of a very high polish, and is applied to various uses. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 11. 3.; patron and impropiator, Earl of Chichester: the great tithes have been commuted for £645, and the vicarial for £255, and the glebe comprises 6 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, and some insertions of a later date; it contains the family vault of the Pelhams; it was new-pewed in 1827, and a gallery was erected in 1831. A school is conducted on the national system.

LAUGHTON-EN-LE-MORTHEN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the unions of ROTHERHAM and WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Rotherham; containing 742 inhabitants. This place, during the wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, suffered greatly from the Lancastrian party, in an attack made upon it by the Baron of Mowbray and his adherents, who greatly injured the town, and nearly destroyed the church. The parish comprises by computation 3685 acres, most of which is fertile land in good cultivation; the surface is varied, and the scenery in parts enriched with wood. Laughton Hall, the ancient seat of the Butler family, is a spacious mansion, commanding extensive views. The village is situated on an eminence, and is large and neatly built. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £200, with a glebe of 4 acres, and a glebe-house, erected in 1842; patron and appropriator, the Chancellor of the Cathedral of York. The church is a handsome and stately structure in the early and decorated English styles, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a lofty crocketed spire, rising together to the height of 180 feet, and forming a conspicuous and beautiful object in the landscape for many miles round; the interior contains various rich details; the reading-desk is an eagle of wood, highly gilt. There is a place of worship for Independents. A parochial school is endowed with 3 acres of land, and £13 per annum from bequests; and there are several benefactions for distribution among the poor.

LAUNCELLS (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of STRATTON, E. division of CORNWALL, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Stratton; containing 855 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 6184 acres, of which 350 are common or waste; the Bude canal passes through it from west to east. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 10. 10.; patron and impropiator, L. W. Buck, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £280, and the vicarial for £220, with a glebe of 15 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a lofty embattled tower, crowned by pinnacles; part of the floor is laid with tiles curiously figured, and in the south aisle is an altar-tomb with the recumbent effigy of John Chamond, who died in 1624. There is an almshouse for four persons; and a school is supported by subscription.

LAUNCESTON (ST.

MARY MAGDALENE), a borough, market-town, and parish, possessing separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 20½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Bodmin, and 213 (W. S. W.) from London; containing, exclusively of those portions of the borough which extend beyond the limits of the parish, 2460 inhabitants. The ancient name of Launceston was Dunheved, the Swelling hill: it was also called Lanstephadon, or Church Stephen Town. Its present appellation seems to be a contraction of Lan-cester-ton, or Church Castle Town; the word Llan signifying a church in the British language. The manor and honour, which had a very extensive jurisdiction, belonged from time immemorial to the earls of Cornwall, who had their chief seat at Launceston Castle; it was given by William the Conqueror to his half-brother, Robert, Earl of Montaigne, whom he made Earl of Cornwall. The church of St. Stephen, (within which parish is the borough of Newport, adjoining to Launceston, and considered as part of it,) was made collegiate, before the Conquest, for Secular canons, and King Henry I. gave it to the church of Exeter. Reginald, Earl of Cornwall, was a great benefactor to the college, and used all his influence with King Stephen to remove the bishop's see from Devonshire to Cornwall, and constitute this the cathedral; but it was successfully opposed by William Warlewast, Bishop of Exeter, who, being then resident at Lawhitton, on his first triennial visitation, suppressed the college of Secular canons, and in its stead founded a priory of Augustine monks, in the parish of St. Thomas, about half-way between St. Stephen's and the castle. The CASTLE of Launceston passed with the earldom, and was annexed to the duchy of Cornwall by act of parliament. Hubert de Burgh, who had large possessions in Cornwall, was made governor of the castle, and sheriff for the county, by King John. It has since passed by grant into the hands of the Duke of Northumberland, who was thereupon made constable of Launceston. From its strong position, and its situation at the entrance into the county, this castle was an important post during the civil war of the 17th century. It was at first in the hands of the parliament, and under the governorship of Sir Richard Buller, who, on the approach of Sir Ralph Hopton with the king's forces, quitted the town and fied. In 1643, Sir Ralph was attacked by Major-General Chudleigh, without success. In August, 1644, the place was surrendered to the Earl of Essex, but fell into the hands of the royalists again, after the capitulation of the earl's army. In 1645, the Prince of Wales sojourned for some time in Launceston. In November of the same year, the town was fortified by Sir Richard Granville, who, being at variance with Lord Goring, another of the king's generals, caused proclamation to be made in all the churches of Cornwall, that if any of Lord Goring's forces should come into the county, the bells should be rung, and the people rise to drive them out. Shortly after, Sir Richard having refused to take the chief command of the infantry under Lord Hopton, as generalissimo, was committed to the prison of Launceston. Colonel Basset being then governor, surrendered the place to Sir Thomas Fairfax, in March, 1646. In the time of the Commonwealth, the castle and park were put up to sale by the government, and purchased by Robert Bennet, Esq., but on the Restoration they reverted to the crown.

The town, which abounds with many objects interesting to the antiquary, is pleasantly situated near the western bank of the Tamar, on a steep ascent, at the foot of which is the little river Kinsey. On the summit of a hill is a high conical rocky mount, partly natural, and partly artificial, upon which the keep of the ancient castle, with a Norman gateway, and part of the outer walls, is standing. Traces of the wall that surrounded the town yet exist; and the old South-gate, still remaining, is used as a place of temporary confinement for prisoners, prior to their removal to the county gaol at Bodmin. There are many good houses, and the town is rapidly improving and increasing, but the streets, which are macadamized, are in general narrow. It is lighted with gas; and the inhabitants are well supplied with water, which is brought by pipes from Trenibbett, or Dunheved Green. On the north side of the church is a pleasant promenade, shaded by an avenue of trees, and commanding a fine prospect over the adjacent country; and there is another on the green below the castle. Two book clubs and three subscription libraries are supported. Some years since, a philosophical institution, with a good apparatus, was established; and lectures are given, during the winter, in a public subscription room at the head of the town. There is also, in the centre of the town, a room of large dimensions, occasionally used for concerts, &c. An extensive manufacture of serges was formerly carried on, but it has for several years been on the decline. A branch of the Bude canal has been brought within four miles of the town, and promises materially to improve the general trade; and in 1836, an act was procured for making a railway from Tremoutha haven. The markets are on Wednesday for butcher's meat, and on Saturday for corn and provisions of all sorts. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday, July 5th, Nov. 17th, and Dec. 6th, for cattle; and on the first Thursday in March, and the third Thursday in April, for cattle of all sorts, free of toll. There are likewise three cattle-fairs in the parish of St. Stephen, on May 12th, July 31st, and September 25th. An act for erecting a market-house, and for the regulation of the markets, was passed in 1840.

Launceston was constituted a free BOROUGH in the reign of Henry III., by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, who granted various privileges to the burgesses, and a piece of ground on which to build their guildhall, to be held of him and his heirs by the annual tender of a pound of pepper. Since that time the town has received several charters, and those by which it was governed until the passing of the Municipal act, were bestowed by Queen Mary and Charles II., the former in 1556, and the latter in 1683. By the above act, the controul is vested in a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, the mayor and late mayor being magistrates for the borough, concurrently with the county justices. The town first returned members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I.: under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, it now sends one: the mayor is returning officer. Petty-sessions for the Northern division of the hundred of East are held here, on the first Friday in every month. The assizes for the county, once held wholly in this town, and for more than half a century here alternately with Bodmin, were, in 1838, entirely removed to the latter place. An act for the recovery of small debts was passed in 1841. A private house between the church and the tower was purchased by the corporation in 1810, for the transaction of public business, and is now called the Mayoralty Room. The South-gate, repaired some years since, is used as the town prison.

The parish comprises by computation 1100 acres; the soil is generally of a loamy quality, and in the neighbourhood of the town the meadows are rich; the subsoil is rock, alternated with clay, and from the prevalence of mineral springs, an opinion was once entertained that mines existed, but every attempt to find them has failed. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £116; patrons, Mayor and Corporation; impropiator, Duke of Northumberland, whose tithes have been commuted for £34. 7. The church was erected about the year 1540, by the munificence of Sir Henry Trecarrell, Knt., on the site of a decayed chantry, and was made parochial in the early part of the sixteenth century; it is in the later English style, built with square blocks of granite, and covered with a profusion of beautiful ornaments; the tower is of different materials, and apparently of much greater antiquity. A series of square blocks of granite is continued round the building on the outside, upon each of which is a single letter, on a shield, the whole forming the following congratulatory dedication: "Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum. Sponsus amat sponsam; Maria optimam parte melegit." "O quam terribilis ac metuendus est locus iste! vere aliud non est hic nisi domus Dei, et porta celi." On the south side is the principal entrance, over which are the figures of St. George and the Dragon, and St. Martin, on horseback, cutting off the skirts of his coat with his sword, to clothe a cripple who is represented as begging and with crutches. At the east end within a recess on the outside, is a recumbent figure of Mary Magdalene. The interior of the church is light and uniform, and the altar is embellished with two superb paintings, representing Moses and Aaron; there is a fine organ, and the ceiling is ornamented with elaborately carved oak. There are numerous stately and interesting monuments, and in the north aisle is a splendid monument of marble, reaching from the floor to the ceiling, and displaying a profusion of chaste and elegant sculpture, to the memory of Granville Piper and Richard Wise, Esqrs. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and other dissenters. The grammar school was founded by Queen Elizabeth, and endowed with £16 per annum, chargeable on the estates of the duchy of Cornwall, to which an augmentation of £10 per annum was made in 1685, by George Baron, Esq.: after having been shut up for some years, it was lately re-opened, and the corporation rebuilt the school-house. There are also a national and a British school. Here was formerly an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Leonard; the income, amounting to about £25 per annum, is vested in the corporation for charitable uses. The poor law union of Launceston comprises twenty-one parishes or places, of which nineteen are in Cornwall, and two in Devon; and contains a population of 16,746. Over the entrance to the White Hart inn is a fine Norman arch, said to have been removed thither on the demolition of the priory. Launceston gives the title of Viscount to the reigning sovereign.

LAUNCESTON-TARRANT, county of DORSET.—See TARRANT, LAUNCESTON.

LAUNDE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Uppingham; containing 38 inhabitants. A priory was founded here in the reign of Henry I., by Richard Basset and Maud his wife, for Black canons of the order of St. Augustine; the revenue, at the Dissolution, was valued at £510. 16. 5. The chapel and burial-ground are still preserved.

LAUNTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BICESTER, hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E.) from Bicester; containing 619 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 2800 acres, of which the greater portion is pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £618; patron, Bishop of London. A school with a small endowment is further supported by the Countess of Jersey.

LAURENCE, ST., a parish, in the union of the ISLE of THANET, hundred of RINGSLOW, or ISLE of THANET, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W.) from Ramsgate; containing 2694 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3244 acres, of which 65 are common or waste; it is bounded on the south by Pegwell bay, which is celebrated for shrimps, and much resorted to by visitors from Ramsgate and Margate, for whose accommodation there is an excellent inn, commanding a fine sea-view. The village is situated on a hill, upon the road from Ramsgate to Canterbury; and a pleasure-fair is held in it on the 9th of August. In 1826, Ramsgate was separated from this parish by act of parliament, and made distinct. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7; net income, £180; patron, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, with the Dean and Chapter, is appropriator. The church is very ancient, particularly the tower, which is of Saxon architecture; it was one of the chapels belonging to Minster, but made parochial in 1275. His late Majesty William IV. erected a tablet to the memory of Admiral Fox, who is buried here, as is also Lady Augusta Murray. The remains of a small chapel in the village have been incorporated into a dwelling-house.

LAVANT, EAST and WEST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of ALDWICK, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Chichester; and containing 370 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation nearly 3000 acres, of which more than one-half is arable, and the remainder pasture, woodland, down, and common; the scenery is of pleasing character, and the river Lavant flows through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 18. $1\frac{1}{2}$, and in the gift of Lord Willoughby de Broke: the tithes have been commuted for £483, and the glebe comprises 38 acres. The church is a very ancient structure, of which the chancel has been rebuilt, and the tower, which is of brick, was added at the close of the seventeenth century; at the west end is a fine Norman arch.

LAVANT, MID, a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Chichester; containing 279 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from London, via Midhurst, to Chichester, and comprises 1000 acres by computation. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £52; patron and impropiator, the Duke of Richmond. The church is a neat structure, in the later English style, and contains a handsome monument to Lady Mary May, whose figure is beautifully sculptured in white marble.

LAVENDON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Olney; containing 691 inhabitants. Here was formerly a market on Tuesday, granted to Paulinus Peyore in 1248, but now disused; and a fair is held on the Tuesday before Easter. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Cold Brayfield annexed, valued in the king's books at £6; net income, £194; patron, Sir G. N. Noel, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1801. An abbey of Præmonstratensian canons was founded in the reign of Henry II., by John de Bidum, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was valued at £79. 13. 8.

LAVENHAM (St. Peter and St. Paul), a market-town and parish, in the union of COSFORD, hundred of BABERGH, W. division of SUFFOLK, $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Ipswich, and 61 (N. E.) from London; containing 1871 inhabitants. The town, which is remarkably healthy, occupies the declivities of two hills rising gradually from the river Brett, and consists of several small streets; the houses are in general of mean appearance; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The manufacture of blue cloth formerly flourished, under the direction of several guilds, each of which had its separate hall; at present, wool-combing and spinning, but only on a small scale, are carried on, and the women and children are employed in platting straw for bonnets. The market, now almost disused, is on Tuesday: the market-place is a spacious area, containing a stone cross. Fairs are held for horses and cattle on Shrove-Tuesday, and October 11th, 12th, and 13th; the former is well attended, but the October fair, which was once for the sale of butter and cheese, and the hiring of servants, is no longer frequented for such purposes. Lavenham was formerly governed by six capital burgesses, styled headboroughs, elected for the last time in 1775.

The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 2. 11., and in the patronage of Caius College, Cambridge: the rectorial tithes have been commuted for £850, and the impropriate for £37; there are 144 acres of glebe. The church was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VI., partly by the De Veres, earls of Oxford, who formerly resided here, and partly by the family of Spring, wealthy clothiers. It is an eminently beautiful structure, in the later English style; the body is of rich workmanship, having a most elaborate open-worked parapet, and the tower is a structure of massive grandeur. The entrance is by a porch, supposed to have been erected by John, the fourteenth earl of Oxford, and much enriched; over the arch is a finely-sculptured double niche, and on each side of the niche are three escutcheons, each bearing quartered coats of the arms of the De Vere family. In the church are, a curious mural monument to Allaine Dister, a clothier of the town, and another of alabaster and marble to the Rev. Mr. Copinger. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The free school was founded in 1647, by Richard Peacock, with an endowment of £5 per annum, augmented, in 1699, by Edward Colman, with £16 per annum. A national school is supported by the proceeds of a bequest of £2000 three per cent. consols., by Henry Steward, in 1806; and some almshouses, rebuilt in 1836, are inhabited by forty aged persons. The Rev. George Ruggle, author of a Latin comedy, entitled Ignoramus, and other dramatic pieces, was born at Lavenham, in 1575.

LAVER, HIGH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Chipping-Ongar; containing 478 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1500 acres; the soil is principally a strong clay, forming excellent corn and grazing lands; the surface is generally level, and in addition to numerous springs, the grounds are watered by a copious brook which flows through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 1. 8.; net income, £370; patron and incumbent, Rev. Philip Budworth. The church is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a tower surmounted by a spire of wood. Here is a small national school. The celebrated John Locke resided at the mansion-house of Otes, in the parish, then the property of the Lords Masham, during the last two years of his life; he died in October, 1704, and was interred on the south side of the churchyard; over his remains is a black marble tomb, inclosed within iron rails, and on the wall of the church is his epitaph in Latin, composed by himself.

LAVER, LITTLE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Harlow; containing 128 inhabitants. It comprises 894 acres, of which 20 are woodland, and the remainder chiefly arable, with a small portion of pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 5.; net income, £261; patron, Robert Palmer, Esq. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a central tower surmounted by a small spire of wood. Here is a national school.

LAVER-MAGDALEN (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of EPPING, hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, 5½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chipping-Ongar; containing 217 inhabitants. The parish derives the affix by which it is distinguished from other places of the same name, from the dedication of its church; it is pleasantly situated in the south-western extremity of the district, and is remarkable for the salubrity of the air. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 12. 1.; net income, £281; patron and incumbent, Rev. W. J. Burford, D.D. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a nave and chancel.

LAVERSTOCK (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ALDERBURY, partly in the hundred of ALDERBURY, and partly in that of UNDERDITCH, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 1 mile (N. E.) from Salisbury; containing 539 inhabitants. The parish is situated in a fertile country, and comprises 1674a. 3r. 22p.; the views, in which the adjacent city with its venerable and beautiful cathedral forms a conspicuous and interesting feature, are romantically picturesque. Laverstock House, for the reception of insane patients, has been long distinguished as one of the first establishments in which the mild and social system of treatment was practised with success. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to the commonalty of the Vicars-Choral of the Cathedral of Salisbury: the tithes have been commuted for £680. The church is an ancient structure, in the Norman style, and contains some monuments to the Bathurst family, who are buried here.

LAVERSTOKE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the hundred of OVERTON, Kingclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2¾ miles (E. N. E.) from Whitechurch; containing 123 inhabitants. It comprises about 1500 acres; the surface is finely undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by the limpid stream of the river Test, which has its source within two miles; the soil is chiefly clay, on a substratum of chalk. A very extensive manufactory of the paper used for the notes of the Bank of England has been established. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 10.; net income, £61; patron, William Portal, Esq.

LAVERTON, a hamlet, in the parish of BUCKLAND, union of WINCHCOMB, Lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 208 inhabitants.

LAVERTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, 3½ miles (N.) from Frome; containing, with the tything of Peart, 199 inhabitants. It comprises 1108 acres by computation; the soil in the western part is a strong clay, and in the eastern a light red loam; the surface is undulated, and the low grounds are watered by a brook which flows into the river Frome. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 6½.; net income, £277; patron, Bishop of Bath and Wells. A small school is supported.

LAVERTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-MALZEARD, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 6¼ miles (W. by N.) from Ripon; containing 487 inhabitants. The township comprises 6707 acres, of which 3992 are common or waste land: the village consists chiefly of scattered houses. Rent-charges, as commutations for the tithes, have been awarded, amounting to £196. 4. 8., of which £73. 17. are payable to the vicar, and £122. 7. 8. to Trinity College, Cambridge. A school-house was built by Mrs. Lawrence, lady of the manor, in 1832.

LAVINGTON, or LINTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Folkingham; containing 329 inhabitants. The parish, including the township of Osgodby and the hamlets of Hanby and Keisby, comprises 4152*a.* 3*r.* Osgodby Hall, once the residence of Sir W. Armyne, Knt., is now a farm-house; and at Hanby was formerly a mansion belonging to the family of Manners. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £14. 7. 1.; net income, £514; patron, and impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, Sir G. Heathcote, Bart.: the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church is a neat ancient structure, with a lofty spire. Here is a school, endowed with £10 per annum by Mrs. Parnham, in 1721.

LAVINGTON, EAST, or MARKET (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, in the union of DEVIZES, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 1616 inhabitants, of whom 1115 are in the town, 6 miles (S.) from Devizes, and 90 (W. by S.) from London. The town is situated in a fertile valley, at the base of the chalk hills which form the northern boundary of Salisbury Plain, and consists principally of one street: the trade is chiefly in corn and malt. The market is on Wednesday; and a fair takes place on August 10th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 2. 6.; net income, £300; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church stands on a lofty eminence, from which circumstance the town is popularly termed Steeple-Lavington. There are two places of worship for Independents. The learned and laborious antiquary, Dr. Thomas Tanner, Bishop of St. Asaph and author of the Notitia Monastica, was born here in 1674, his father having been vicar of the parish; and at his death, in 1733, he bequeathed £200 for the benefit of the poor.

LAVINGTON, WEST, or BISHOP'S (All Saints), a parish, in the union of DEVIZES, hundred of POTTERNE and CANNINGS, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS, 1½ mile (S. W. by S.) from East Lavington; containing 1595 inhabitants. This place was for many generations the property of the Dauntsey family, of whom William Dauntsey, a younger son, was alderman of London in 1542; it afterwards became the property of Sir John Danvers, by marriage with the granddaughter and heiress of Sir John Dauntsey, Knt., and was subsequently sold to the late Duke of Marlborough. The village suffered greatly from a destructive fire in 1689. The parish is situated on the road from Devizes to Salisbury, and comprises some very rich land, whereof a portion is laid out in market-gardens, from which large quantities of excellent vegetables are sent to Bath, Salisbury, and other markets. A soft chalkstone is quarried, and burnt into lime; blocks of green sandstone are frequently raised for building; and on the downs, considerable quantities of flints are dug for road-mending. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 16. 3.; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Salisbury. The great tithes have been commuted for £1325, and the vicarial for £360, and the glebe comprises 17 acres. The church is an ancient and spacious structure, in the early English style, with a square embattled tower; the interior contains the sepulchral chapel of the Dauntsey family, which is a beautiful specimen of the later English style. William Dauntsey, alderman of London, founded and endowed an almshouse and grammar school, the latter open to all children of the parish; and there is also an almshouse for three poor women, who receive 1*s.* per week each from the lord of the manor. A school-house for 100 girls has recently been erected. The neighbourhood abounds with tumuli, camps, and other relics of Roman and British antiquities.

LAWFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 1½ mile (W.) from Manningtree; containing 868 inhabitants, and consisting of 2769*a.* 1*r.* 4*p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15, and in the gift of St. John's College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £720, and the glebe comprises 35 acres. The church, situated on elevated ground commanding an extensive prospect, is an ancient edifice, with a tower of stone, and consists of a nave and chancel, the interior walls of which are elaborately ornamented with sculpture. In 1723, John Leach bequeathed a rent-charge of £22. 4*s.*, for teaching children, and clothing poor persons.

LAWFORD, CHURCH (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Rugby; containing 333 inhabitants. The London and Birmingham railway passes through the parish, which is situated on the left bank of the river Avon, and consists of 1747 acres: the portion occupied by the railway is returned at the annual value of £1200. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of King's-Newnham united, valued in the king's books at £11. 15. 5*s.*; net income, £196; patron, Lord John Scott.

LAWFORD, LITTLE, a hamlet, in the parish of NEWBOLD-UPON-AVON, union of RUGBY, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (W.) from Rugby; containing 34 inhabitants, and comprising 410 acres. It is situated on the right bank of the river Avon, and is skirted by the Oxford canal.

LAWFORD, LONG, a hamlet, in the parish of NEWBOLD-UPON-AVON, union of RUGBY, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 2½ miles (W. N. W.) from Rugby; containing 625 inhabitants. It comprises 1578 acres, and is intersected by the London and Birmingham railway, which here approaches close to the left bank of the river Avon. A school is supported by subscription, for the benefit of the poor.

LAWHITTON (St. Michael), a parish, in the union and parliamentary borough of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 2¼ miles (S. E. by E.) from Launceston; containing 487 inhabitants. This place was anciently the occasional residence of the bishops of Exeter, one of whom obtained for the inhabitants a weekly market and a fair, which are now discontinued. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 6. 8*s.*, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £360, and the glebe comprises 90 acres, with a house. A school is supported by subscription.

LAWKLAND, a township, in the parish of CLAPHAM, union of SETTLE, W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Settle; containing 364 inhabitants. The township is situated on the road from Settle to Kirkby-Lonsdale, and comprises, with the hamlet of Eldroth, 4220 acres, chiefly meadow and pasture, of customary freehold tenure in the manor of Lawkland, the property of Thomas Ingleby, Esq., whose seat, Lawkland Hall, is a noble mansion of the time of Elizabeth, and contrasts favourably with many modern erections in the style of that age. Crow-nest Scarr is a very remarkable and singular range of rocks: good stone is quarried in the vicinity. The chapel at Eldroth, formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church, is still in a measure used for divine worship, and also for a school, which is endowed with 2*a*. 1*r*. of land, and £6. 10., for the instruction of six free scholars. The tithes are in lease, in trust for the landowners, for three lives.

LAWLEY, a township, in the parish and union of WELLINGTON, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 173 inhabitants.

LAWLING, a chapelry, in the parish of LATCHINGDON, union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, 5½ miles (N. W.) from Burnham.

LAWRENCE, ST., a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bradwell-near-the-Sea; containing 176 inhabitants. It comprises 2031*a*. 3*r*. 7*p*., of which 91 acres are common or waste land; the soil is in some parts a heavy clay, in others lighter and more easily pulverized; the surface is hilly, and the low lands are watered by the Blackwater river, which is navigable, and bounds the parish on the north. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £550, and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a plain ancient edifice, pleasantly situated on a hill.

LAWRENCE, ST., a chapelry, in the parish and union of PRESTON, hundred of AMOUDERNES, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Preston.

LAWRENCE, ST., a parish, in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Newport; containing 114 inhabitants. The parish consists of a narrow district, extending about a mile and a half along the sea-coast, and forming part of a romantic tract called Undercliff; it comprises by measurement 300 acres, of which about 20 are in plantations, chiefly of juniper trees, 50 meadow, and the remainder arable land in good cultivation. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4; net income, £106; patron, Earl of Yarborough. The tithes are held by the earl and the rector, and that portion of them belonging to the latter has been commuted for £84; the glebe comprises 18 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, and is only 25 feet in length, and 12 in width, within the walls. In a field near it are the remains of a chantry. A national school is supported by subscription.

LAWRENCE, ST., ILKETSHALL, county of SUFFOLK.—See ILKETSHALL, ST. LAWRENCE.

LAWRENCE-WESTON.—See WESTON, LAWRENCE.

LAWSHALL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of BABERGH, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6½ miles (S. by E.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 925 inhabitants, and consisting by survey of 2998 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 2. 9½., and in the patronage of the Dowager Lady Middleton: the tithes have been commuted for £700, and the glebe comprises 29 acres. In 1826, two schoolrooms were erected. The remains of a Roman station, considered to have been Cambretonium, not far from the source of the river Bret, are clearly visible.

LAWTON, CHURCH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CONGLETON, hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Newcastle-under-Lyme; containing 622 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the great road to Liverpool, and comprises 1452*a*. 21*p*. Its substratum contains coal of good quality, of which mines were formerly in operation; and there are some brine-pits from which salt is made, and in which about thirty persons are employed. The Trent and Mersey canal passes through the parish, and is here joined by the Macclesfield canal. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 2. 7., and in the gift of C. B. Lawton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £260, and the glebe comprises 37 acres, with a house. The church, supposed to have formed part of an ancient abbey, of which it occupies the site, has been rebuilt; it is, with the exception of the tower, of handsome elevation, and has a Norman porch on the south side. Schools are supported by Mr. Lawton; and there is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LAXFIELD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Framlingham; containing 1172 inhabitants, and the parish consisting of 3630 acres by admeasurement. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Cratfield, and valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 4.: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £617. 10., and the vicarial for £220; the glebe comprises 14 acres. The church is a very spacious and handsome structure, with a lofty square embattled tower; the chancel was rebuilt by Lord Huntingfield, in 1827. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A free school was founded in 1718, by John Smith, who endowed it with the proceeds of his estates; the income exceeds £200 per annum. Ann Ward, in 1721, devised a rent-charge of £30 for teaching children, and for other charitable purposes; the town lands produce £80 per annum, and there is a house, called the Guildhall, for the poor. A corn market is held during the winter months on Monday.

LAXTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of CORBY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 7¼ miles (N. E. by E.) from Rockingham; containing 136 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1297*a*. 2*r*. 35*p*. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Lord Carbery.

LAXTON, or LEXINGTON (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, South Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Tuxford; containing, with the hamlet of Moorhouse, 642 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 3955 acres, of which 1245 are open fields and common, 118 woods and plantations, and the remainder principally arable; the soil is chiefly a strong clay, with some tracts of black vegetable mould. The village, which is considerable, and situated on a gentle acclivity, appears to have been formerly a place of some importance, having given the title of baron to the family of Lexington. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; patron and impropiator, Earl Manvers. The great tithes have been commuted for £387. 16., and the vicarial for £225. 2. 6.; the glebe comprises about one acre of ground, attached to the house. The church is a spacious structure, in the later English style, with a lofty tower, and was once replete with ancient and handsome monuments to several distinguished families. The chapel, which has been long used as a schoolroom, has been cleared out, and three effigies of crusaders, in full armour, have been removed into the chancel of the church, where are various others. At Moorhouse is a chapel of ease. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a parochial school is supported by subscription. William Chappell, Bishop of Cork and Ross, in Ireland, who died in 1649, and was eminent for his piety and learning, was born here.

LAXTON, a chapelry, in the parish and union of HOWDEN, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, E. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Howden; containing 266 inhabitants. It comprises about 1500 acres of land, and is situated to the north and east of the river Ouse, which makes a very considerable bend in the vicinity: the village is well built. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £39; patron, Vicar of Howden. The chapel has ample accommodation for the inhabitants; the chancel is of stone, but the nave and tower are built of brick. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LAYCOCK (St. CYRIACK), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Chippenham; containing 1780 inhabitants. An abbey for nuns of the order of St. Augustine was founded here in 1229, by Ela, Countess Dowager of Salisbury, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. Bernard; it continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £203. 12. 3.; the remains have been converted into a private residence. The Countess of Salisbury, during her widowhood, held the shrievalty of the county of Wilts, in the reign of Henry III.; and in a room in which the records are kept, is a copy of the charter sent to her as such by that monarch, for the use of the knights and military tenants of the county. A weekly market and an annual fair were granted to the abbey, but the former has long been disused, and fairs are now held on July 1st and December 21st. The parish comprises 3546 acres, of which 46 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 4. 2.; patron and impropiator, W. H. F. Talbot, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £341. 10. 6., and the vicarial for £325, and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church contains several monuments to the family of Montague, who formerly resided at Lackham House, in the parish. There is a place of worship for Independents.

LAYER-BRETON, a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Kelvedon; containing 290 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 933 acres, of which 803 are arable, 90 pasture, and 40 heath. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7; net income, £288; patron, Rev. R. W. Sutton. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Independents; and a school is conducted on the national plan.

LAYER-DE-LA-HAY, a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Colchester; containing 731 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2577 acres, of which 59 are common or waste; it is the most easterly of the three parishes of the name. The land is generally wet, and in some parts is a light soil, well adapted for turnips, and in others a very shallow loam. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £82; patron, Sir G. H. Smyth, Bart.; impropiator, J. Pearson, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £680. The church is a plain edifice, with a stone tower. There is a national school.

LAYER-MARNEY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Kelvedon; containing 256 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1900 acres, of which about 100 are woodland and plantation, and the remainder chiefly arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 3. 4., and in the gift of Quintin Dick, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £466, and the glebe comprises 3 acres. The church is principally in the later English style, and contains several fine monuments of the Marney family. In an ancient brick edifice, about 50 yards from the church, William de Marney, in 1330, founded a college for a warden and two chaplains.

LAYHAM (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of COSFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by E.) from Hadleigh; containing 549 inhabitants, and consisting of 2488a. 2r. 29p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 0. 7½., and in the gift of St. John's College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £800, and the glebe comprises 71 acres.

LAYMORE, a tything, in the parish and hundred of CREWKERNE, union of CHARD, W. division of SOMERSET; containing, with part of Black-Down hamlet, and the hamlets of Horn, Ash, and Greenham, 208 inhabitants.

LAYSTERS (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Tenbury; containing 226 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by a part of Worcestershire, and intersected by the road from Tenbury to Leominster, and comprises by measurement 1977 acres. Its soil is generally a moderately tenacious clay, resting on a bed of coarse limestone; the surface is finely undulated, and the surrounding scenery diversified. The grain produced is of excellent quality, and the breed of cattle in much repute. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £335; patron, Thomas Elton Miller, Esq.; impropriator and incumbent, the Rev. J. K. Miller. An ancient ecclesiastical establishment here was connected with the priory of Sheen, in Surrey; and there are still some vestiges of the buildings on a farm called the Cinders, which is partially surrounded by a moat.

LAYSTHORPE, with EAST NEWTON, a township, in the parish of STONEGRAVE, union of HELMSLEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Helmsley; containing 82 inhabitants. The township, which comprises by computation 860 acres, is situated south of the river Rye, and the road from Gilling to Helmsley passes on the west.

LAYSTON (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of EDWINSTREE, county of HERTFORD, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. N. E.) from Buntingford; containing 1187 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Buntingford annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 16. 2.; net income, £149; patron and impropriator, William Butt, Esq. The church is situated in the fields, about half a mile eastward from the town of Buntingford, in the centre of the site of the ancient village of Layston, which has totally disappeared; it is used only for the solemnization of marriages, the parishioners resorting to the chapel at Buntingford, on account of its greater convenience. There are two small endowments for instruction.—See BUNTINGFORD.

LAYTHAM, a township, in the parish of AUGHTON, union of HOWDEN, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 8 miles (N.) from Howden; containing 109 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1270 acres, the property of various persons; the river Derwent passes on the west, and the road from Duffield to Holme on the south.

LAYTON, with WARBRICK, a township, in the parish of BISPHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Poulton; containing 1968 inhabitants. Rent-charges, as commutations for the tithes, have been awarded amounting to £241. 4., of which £1. 4. are payable to an impropriator, £38. 3. to the perpetual curate of Trinity Chapel, South Shore, and £201. 17. to the impropriate curate of Bispham, who has also a glebe of 4 acres. Two schools are supported by subscription.

LAYTON, EAST, a township, in the parish of STANWICK ST. JOHN, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 10 miles (E. N. E.) from Darlington; containing 117 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1010 acres of land: the village is situated on the crown of a fertile eminence commanding extensive views. The clergymen of the adjoining parishes officiate here alternately in a small chapel.

LAYTON, WEST, a township, in the parish of HUTTON-MAGNUM, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Greta-Bridge; containing 88 inhabitants. It comprises about 730 acres, partly the property of Lord Rokeby. The village, which is small, is seated on an eminence, and lies on the road from Greta-Bridge to Hartforth. The lands are partly in farms.

LAZONBY (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND; containing, with the chapelry of Plumpton-Wall, 891 inhabitants, of whom 570 are in the township of Lazonby, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Penrith. The township comprises 7980a. 1r. 17p., of which 3888a. 2r. 20p. are arable, 1140a. 2r. 35p. woods and plantations, 62a. 2r. 7p. meadow and pasture, and 2888a. 1r. 35p. waste. The village is situated on the west bank of the river Eden, and the surrounding country is pleasing. There are good quarries of freestone, and one producing stone for millstones. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £13. 1. 3.; net income, £551; patron, Bishop of Carlisle: the impropriation of the remainder of the rectorial tithes belongs to the poor of the chapelry of Witherslack, Westmorland. In Baron Wood is a lofty rock, wherein is an artificial cave, called Giant's Chamber, or Samson's Cave. The great Roman road passes from north to south, and another intersects the parish in a direction towards Salkeld Gate. At Castle Rigg are the ruins of a moated building; and upon the fell, urns, containing bones and ashes, were discovered some years since. There are also several cairns.

LEA, a township, in the parish of BACKFORD, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Chester; containing 115 inhabitants. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £29, and the appropriate for £62, payable to the Bishop of Chester.

LEA, a township, in the parish of WYBUNBURY, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing 68 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £50. 10., of which £9 are payable to the vicar, and £41. 10. to the Bishop of Lichfield.

E.) from Ross; containing 209 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Gloucester to Ross, and included within the electoral boundary for the county of Hereford, comprises 661a. 2r. 12p. Building-stone is found in several parts of the parish, but there is no regular quarry. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £68; patron, Vicar of Linton. The church is an ancient structure.

LEA, with ASHTON, INGOL, and COTTAM, a township, in the parish and union of PRESTON, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Preston; containing 710 inhabitants, of whom 273 are in the hamlet of Lea. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £235. 0. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$., and the vicarial for £13. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel. A school was endowed in 1784, by S. Neeld; the property consists of a farmhouse and 25 acres of land, producing £82. 10. per annum.

LEA (St. Helen), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Gains-borough; containing 198 inhabitants. Gypsum is found under the marl in the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 4. 2., and in the gift of the Rev. Sir C. J. Anderson, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £392. 8. 10., and the glebe comprises 42 acres. Here are some fish-ponds and a moat, the remains of a Cistercian nunnery founded in 1180, at Hevening, in the parish, by Reyner Evermue; it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £58. 13. 4.

LEA (St. GILES), a parish, in the union and hundred of MALMESBURY, Malmesbury and Kingswood, and N. divisions of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Malmesbury; containing, with the hamlet of Cleverton, 446 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the river Avon, and comprises by measurement 1691 acres, of which 312 are arable, 1332 pasture, and 10 woodland; the soil of nearly one-half is a sandy loam, and of the other a tenacious clay. The living is annexed to the rectory of Garsdon; the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £30, and the vicarial for £188. 9., and the glebe comprises 44 acres. The church is a very ancient structure, supposed to have been erected before the Conquest, and appears to have been partly rebuilt at a remote period; it contains 200 sittings, half of which are free.

LEA-BAILEY, a tything, in the parish of NEWLAND, union of ROSS, hundred of ST. BRIAVELL'S, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Ross; containing 135 inhabitants.

W. by N.) from Witney; containing 737 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £55; patron, Vicar of Shipton; appropriator, Prebendary of Shipton in the Cathedral of Salisbury. The chapel was founded in the reign of Elizabeth by Sir Henry Upton, and dedicated to St. Michael; it has been enlarged, and contains 250 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £250 in aid of the expense. A national school-house was built in 1839. There are two barrows in the parish, one of which was opened in 1828; and ancient coins have been dug up. Lord Churchill appropriates several acres of land for the encouragement of spade husbandry, at a nominal rent, which has considerably benefited the place.

LEAGRAM, with BOWLAND, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of CLITHEROE, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 9 miles (W. N. W.) from Clitheroe; containing 273 inhabitants, of whom 141 are in Leagram.

LEAKE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of THIRSK, chiefly in the wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, but partly in the wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK; comprising the chapelry of Nether Siltan, and the townships of Borrowby, Crosby, Knayton with Brawith, Landmoth with Catto, Leake, and Gueldable; and containing 1235 inhabitants, of whom 7 are in Leake township, 6 miles (N.) from Thirsk. This was anciently a town of considerable importance, but was destroyed about the time of the Conquest, and the only remains of its former buildings are, the church, and mansion of the Danby family, now a farm-house, in which are some interesting and valuable paintings on the panels in one of the rooms. The parish comprises about 2830 acres. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Nether Siltan annexed, valued in the king's books at £16; net income, £320; patron, the Bishop of Ripon. The church is an ancient structure, partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with a tower, on the front of which is a sun-dial rudely carved: in the churchyard several stone coffins have been dug up at different times, supposed to have contained the remains of Saxon or Danish warriors.

LEAKE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BOSTON, wapentake of SKIRBECK, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Boston; containing 1859 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 7044 acres; the soil is various, in some parts richly fertile, and in others marsh and fen; the lands have been materially improved by draining, and considerable portions of marsh have been brought into profitable cultivation. A spacious canal, or drain, for carrying off the water from the fens, is made available for the purpose of navigation to Boston. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Governors of Oakingham and Uppingham grammar schools and hospitals, who are also impropiators. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1810; the income of the benefice, which was augmented in 1841, with £52 per annum, by a grant of £1200 from the patrons, and £400 royal bounty, is now £210, with a glebe-house. The church is an ancient structure, built at different periods. There are two proprietary episcopal chapels, for the accommodation of the fenny districts; also places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; and in the adjoining parish of Wrangle is a school, endowed for the instruction of children of both parishes, by the Rev. Thomas Allenson, who also bequeathed funds for distribution among the poor. The Rev. Jacob Conington, vicar, in 1718, left 40 acres of land, producing £98 per annum, to his successors, for morning service every Wednesday and Friday in the week, and on all holydays throughout the year. £140 per annum, arising from numerous benefactions, are distributed among the poor; and £10, the produce of land bequeathed by Simon Clarke, in the 44th of Elizabeth, are paid to a widow. There are some remains of two religious houses.

LEAKE, EAST (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, S. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Kegworth; containing 1057 inhabitants, and consisting of 2400 acres. Nearly one-half of the population are employed in the manufacture of cotton stockings. Limestone of good quality is quarried for manure, and there are some pits of gravel and sand. Statute fairs are held at Candlemas and Martinmas. The living is a rectory, with that of West Leake united; net income, £719; patron, Marquess of Hastings. The tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1798; the glebe comprises 460 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. A free school was founded and endowed with land, about 1731, by John Blay: the income is £48 per annum. A girls' school is partly supported by the Rev. Dr. Halcombe.

LEAKE, WEST (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, S. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Kegworth; containing 208 inhabitants, and consisting of 1400 acres. The living is a rectory, united to that of East Leake, and valued in the king's books at £25. 4. 7.: the tithes have been commuted for £130, and the glebe comprises 10 acres. The church is a very ancient structure, with an open campanile turret. A school is partly supported by the rector.

LEAMINGTON-HASTINGS (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Southam; containing, with the hamlets of Broadwell, Hill, and Kytes-Hardwick, 509 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Leam, comprises by computation 3220 acres of fertile land. Limestone is abundant, and the blue lias kind crops up to the very surface. The Warwick and Napton canal passes through the parish, on the southern side. The living is an endowed vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £695; patron, E. Sitwell, Esq. The church is an ancient structure. A parochial school on the national plan is supported by the produce of land granted at the inclosure of the parish. Eight almshouses are endowed with estates left by Humphrey Davis, and two were endowed with lands purchased with a bequest by Dame Wheler. There was anciently a chapel at Broadwell.

LEAMINGTON-PRIORS (ALL SAINTS), a parish, and fashionable watering-place, in the union of WARWICK, Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Warwick, and 90 (N. W.) from London; containing 12,864 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the river Leam, on which it stands, and from its having originally belonged to the priory of Kenilworth. It is beautifully situated in a fine open vale, surrounded by gentle acclivities richly clothed with wood; and the river Leam, over which is a handsome stone bridge connecting the old with the new town, and the river Avon, wind through the adjoining meadows. From an inconsiderable hamlet, consisting only of a few cottages, it has, on account of the celebrity of its mineral springs, risen with unprecedented rapidity, within the present century, into a large and populous town; and the peculiar mildness of the temperature, and the salubrity of the air, contribute greatly to augment the number of its permanent residents. The mineral springs are of three kinds, viz., sulphureous, saline, and chalybeate: the water of the sulphureous spring, according to the analysis of Dr. Loudon, contains sulphuric acid, magnesia, chlorine, soda, and lime, and the gases are oxygen, azote, carbonic acid, and sulphuretted hydrogen. The saline water contains chlorine, lime, sulphuric acid, magnesia, silica, peroxyde of iron, and soda, and the gases are oxygen, azote, and carbonic acid: the chalybeate water differs from the saline chiefly in the proportion of its several ingredients. The spring first discovered, and now called the Old Well, is described by Camden, Speed, and Dugdale; its water was analyzed in 1688, and it was recently inclosed by the Earl of Aylesford, who erected a neat pump-room over it, containing a marble fount, from which a pipe is conducted on the outside of the building, for the use of the poor. The second spring, where Smith's baths now stand, was discovered in 1784, by Mr. Abbots, who erected six warm baths, a cold bath, and shower baths, with dressing-rooms adjoining. The Imperial Fount and Marble Baths, in Clemens-street, contain a complete arrangement of hot, cold, sulphureous, vapour, fumigating, and shower baths, with jets d'eau for topical application, and a pump of sulphureous, saline, and chalybeate water, with every requisite accommodation and attendance. Wise's baths, at the corner of Bath-street; Robbins' baths, near the bridge; and various similar establishments, are all arranged with due care; and there is also a bathing establishment for the gratuitous use of the poor. The principal baths, however, are at the Royal Spa, a handsome stone edifice, with a colonnade of the Doric order extending the whole length of the front, and having, at each end, entrances leading respectively to the gentlemen's and ladies' baths; the pump-room, which forms the centre of the building, contains an orchestra, in which a band performs during the hours of attendance. This structure forms one of the chief ornaments of the town, and is situated on the bank of the Leam. In proportion to the number and rank of the visitors are the hotels provided for their accommodation, all of which are fitted up with a considerable degree of taste and elegance; and there are numerous private boarding and lodging houses.

The town is well paved, and lighted with gas, under the direction of commissioners appointed by an act obtained for local purposes; and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. The streets are spacious, and intersect each other at right angles; the houses are handsome, and fronted with Roman cement, and many of them display elegant specimens of Grecian and other styles of architecture. A town-hall was lately erected. The public library and reading-rooms, in Bath-street, form a well-built edifice, with a colonnade of six Ionic pillars, supporting an entablature, and resting upon a piazza; contiguous to the principal reading-room is a small orchestra, which is generally used in the winter season; above the reading-rooms and library is a spacious assembly-room; the card and refreshment rooms are equally splendid, and the whole suite is admirably adapted either for public or private meetings. The Upper Assembly-rooms, in the Union Parade, consist of a ball-room, at the end of which is a fine organ; attached are card and refreshment rooms, and the entire range is completed by a library and reading-room. The Warwick races, which are held in March and Sept., attract numerous visitors; and the Warwickshire hunt has become equally celebrated. The Ramelagh gardens contain a choice collection of plants and flowers. The market, which is on Wednesday, is abundantly supplied with provisions. The Warwick and Napton canal passes through the town; and the Grand Junction and Oxford canals afford a facility of water conveyance to all parts of the kingdom. The parish consists of 1072 acres of productive land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 10.; net income, £255; patron, Rev. Henry Wise; impropiator, Earl of Aylesford. The church, an ancient structure in the decorated English style, with a tower, was lately considerably enlarged, and a spire added to it, and though it has undergone many recent alterations, it still retains externally much of its original character. An episcopal chapel, in the upper part of the town, erected at the expense of the vicar, is professedly after the Norman model, and in many respects the details of that style have been imitated. St. Mary's chapel, erected in 1839, is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles; the interior is adapted for a congregation of 900 persons. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics; the last having, in a niche over the entrance, a full-length figure of St. Peter. A national school is supported by subscription; and an hospital, occupying a site given by the Earl of Aylesford, who is lord of the manor, was recently erected on the London road, by the munificent donations of the Rev. Dr. Warneford, aided by subscriptions. There are various bequests for the poor.

LEAP, a tything, in the chapelry of EXBURY, parish of FAWLEY, union of NEW-Forest, hundred of BISHOP'S-WALTHAM, Southampton and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Lymington. The village is nearly opposite to Cowes, in the Isle of Wight.

LEARCHILD, a township, in the parish of EDLINGHAM, union of ALNWICK, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Alnwick; containing 35 inhabitants. It lies one mile west from Edlingham, and consists of lands set out in farms. The road between Morpeth and Wooler runs at a little distance on the west.

LEARMOUTH, a district, in the parish of CARHAM, union of GLENDALE, W. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Coldstream. It includes East and West Learmouth, Tithe-Hill, and Hagg, and comprises 2200 acres, of which the whole is arable, with interspersions of woodland; the surface is undulated, and the soil a good loam, with light turnip ground: there is a whinstone quarry, overlaid with freestone. The river Tweed bounds the district on the north for a quarter of a mile. The hamlet of West Learmouth is situated near the bourne to which it gives name, and though now very small, was once a thriving village, but it became almost depopulated by the system of throwing a number of small farms into one of great extent. East Learmouth lies at the junction of four roads. There is an old burial-ground, now neglected. In an adjoining marl-pit were found, some years since, several large stag-horns, and a curious oaken paddle, such as the South Sea islanders use. A mineral spring here is impregnated with iron.

LEASINGHAM, NORTH (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Sleaford; containing, with the hamlet of Roxholme, 472 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united, in 1726, to the rectory of South Leasingham, and valued in the king's books at £10. 15. 5. The church has been demolished.

LEASINGHAM, SOUTH (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Sleaford; containing 397 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of North Leasingham united, valued in the king's books at £13. 2. 8½.; net income, £924; patron, Sir J. Thorold, Bart. The tithes of South Leasingham have been commuted for £640, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. A small school is supported partly by charity.

LEATHERHEAD (St. Mary and St. Nicholas), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of EPSOM, Second division of the hundred of COPTHORNE and EFFINGHAM, W. division of SURREY, 12 miles (E. N. E.) from Guildford, and 18 (S. W. by S.) from London; containing 1740 inhabitants. This place, anciently called Leddrede, comprises 3507 acres, of which 416 are common or waste; it is pleasantly situated on the river Mole, over which is a bridge of fourteen arches, built of brick. The vale through which the stream flows, in its course to Reigate, is bounded on each side by a range of steep eminences, on the declivities of which are numerous elegant seats, with fine parks and plantations; and the scenery in the neighbourhood is highly beautiful. The trade of the town is considerable: there are a tanyard and brewery; and a fair is held on Oct. 11th, in a field to the north, chiefly for the sale of horses and pigs. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 6. 0½.; patrons, Dean and Chapter of Rochester. The church is a cruciform structure, said to have been founded by Edward I.; the nave and aisles are in the early, the chancel in the decorated, and the tower and north transept in the later, English style; the east window is ornamented with stained glass, and there is a fine screen. The Independents have a place of worship. A free school, endowed with £30 per annum, principally from bequests by John Lucas and David White, has merged into a national school, for which a school-house was erected in 1839. Several benefactions have been made for distribution among the poor. Judge Jeffreys resided in a house in the town, now the property of Col. Spicer.

LEATHLEY, a parish, in the Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Castley, 382 inhabitants, of whom 272 are in the township of Leathley, 2½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Otley. This parish, which is situated on the north side of the vale of the river Wharfe, comprises by admeasurement 1839 acres, chiefly the property of F. H. Hawkes, Esq., lord of the manor; the surface is varied, and the village neatly built. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £302. The church, which appears to have been erected about 400 years, affords, from its peculiar situation, when viewed at a distance, a pleasing object in the picturesque scenery. There is a place of worship for dissenters. A free school, and almshouses for four persons, were founded in 1769, by Mrs. Anne Hitch, who endowed them with £12 per annum for the master, and £4 for each of the almspeople, and £2 are received for repairs, making in the whole £30; the school and master's house form the centre, and the apartments for the almspeople the wings, of a handsome range of building.

LEATON, with WOOLASCOTT, a township, in the parish of St. Mary, Shrewsbury, hundred of PIMHILL, N. division of SALOP, 4½ miles (N. N. W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 277 inhabitants, of whom 254 are in Leaton. The tithes have been commuted for £157. 10., payable to the grammar school at Shrewsbury.

LEAVELAND (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union and hundred of FAVERSHAM, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Faversham; containing 100 inhabitants. It contains 300 acres, of which about 15 are in hop plantations. A fair is held in Whitsun-week. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Badlesmere, and valued in the king's books at £4.

LEAVENING, a township, in the parish of ACKLAM, union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 6½ miles (S.) from Malton; containing 434 inhabitants. It comprises about 1180 acres of land, broken into abrupt and occasionally picturesque undulations, and the property of various owners: the village, which is considerable, is situated upon a pleasant acclivity at the western foot of the wolds. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1804. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; also a school, to which Lady Middleton contributes £20 per annum.

LEAVINGTON, CASTLE, a township, in the parish of Kirk-Leavington, union of STOCKTON, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 2¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from Yarm; containing 46 inhabitants. The manor and estate, which, at the time when the Domesday survey was taken, were demesne of the crown, continued in the possession of the successive sovereigns till the reign of Edward I., when they were granted to the Meinells, who held the lands till the time of Edward III., since which the property has passed through various families. The township is on the western side of the river Leven, and comprises 1006a. 17p., of which 532 acres are arable, 389 meadow and pasture, 77 wood, and 6 roads and waste. On a large and steep eminence, of conical form, rising from the river side, and now called Castle hill, was anciently a castle, the residence of the Meinell family. The hill, on the west, south, and south-west, is nearly upon a level with the adjoining fields, from which it is guarded by a deep trench; the sides on the east, south-east, and north, are almost perpendicular, and rise from the bottom to the summit, a height of about 200 yards above the river; and the crown of the hill is a plain of 40 paces in diameter, defended by a breastwork of earth of considerable height, forming a circle 200 paces round, with an opening or entrance on the south. The tithes, which belong to the Archbishop of York, have been commuted for £54, those of hay and corn of the greater part of the township being covered by a modus. Here are the Druidical remains of Ravenscarr.

LEAVINGTON, KIRK (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of STOCKTON, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Castle-Leavington, Pickton, and Low Worsall, 483 inhabitants, of whom 233 are in the township of Kirk-Leavington, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Yarm. This place, formerly called Leventon, and in Domesday book Lentune, or "the town upon the river Leven," was once the inheritance of the crown, and was bestowed by the Conqueror upon the Bruces, who held under the king, and continued proprietors until about the time of Richard I., or John, when the estate passed to the Percys, with whom it remained up to the reign of Henry VIII., since which time the lands have been owned by different families. The place suffered greatly in the incursion made by the Scots, under the command of Sir James Douglas and the Earl of Murray, in the 12th of Edward II., and on this account the inhabitants were exempted in the following year by that monarch from paying his taxes. The parish is on the road from Yarm to Thirsk, and is bounded on the west by the river Tees, and on the east by the Leven, which flows through a picturesque dale: the township comprises 2133*a.* 1*r.* 35*p.*, of which 1170 acres are arable, 782 meadow and pasture, 20 woodland, and 160 roads and waste. The soil is chiefly a strong fertile clay, more favourable for corn than grass; the level grounds near the Tees, at Worsall, and on the border of the Leven, at Castle-Leavington, consist of a deep rich loam; about Pickton the soil is rather inferior. From various situations are fine views of the Cleveland hills. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of York, whose tithes have been commuted for £428. The church is a small ancient edifice. The poor have about £8 per annum, the rent of two cottages and an acre of land, bequeathed by William Hall, in 1792.

LECHLADE (St. LAWRENCE), a market-town and parish, in the union of FARRINGDON, hundred of BRIGHTWELLS-BARROW, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 28 miles (S. E.) from Gloucester, and 75 (W. by N.) from London; containing 1300 inhabitants. The name is derived from the little river Leche, and the Saxon word ladean, to empty; that stream, which rises near Northleach, falling into the Thames below St. John's bridge, in the parish. The town, situated on the margin of the Thames, and on the road from Cirencester to London, is neatly built, and consists principally of two long and wide streets; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. Its commerce formerly depended chiefly on the transit of commodities, particularly Wiltshire and Gloucester cheese, brought hither for conveyance to the metropolis by the Thames, which becomes navigable at this place, where also the canal terminates which unites this river and the Severn; but the traffic has within the last few years been diverted into another channel. The market, for which a grant was obtained by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry III., is held on Friday, but is almost disused: a fair, however, for cattle and toys on September 9th, is much frequented. A constable and a tythingman are appointed at a triennial court leet held by the lord of the manor.

The parish comprises 3542*a.* 1*r.* 7*p.*; the pastures are rich, and the dairy-farms under good management; the surface is pleasingly varied, and the surrounding scenery abounds with interest. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4.; patron and incumbent, Rev. Edward Leigh Bennett, whose tithes have been commuted for £710. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, built about the middle of the fifteenth century, at the joint expense of the vicar, the inmates of Lechlade Priory, and the inhabitants of the parish; the spire is remarkable for its symmetrical beauty; the interior was new-pewed and beautified in 1829. There are a place of worship for Baptists, and a national school; and benefactions, amounting to about £80 per annum, have been made to the poor. In a meadow near St. John's bridge formerly stood a priory of Black canons, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which was founded by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, in the reign of Henry III., and the revenue of which, on its suppression in 1473, was applied to the foundation of a chantry in the parochial church. There was also an hospital on or near the bridge, founded by Peter Fitz-Herbert, about the time of Henry III. Towards the end of the last century, a subterraneous structure was discovered in a meadow in the vicinity, with brick pillars and mosaic pavement, supposed to have been a Roman bath, from which circumstance it has been conjectured that this was a Roman town, to which a vicinal road extended from Cirencester. There is a mineral spring. Thomas Coxeter, an eminent antiquary, was born here in 1689.

LECK, a chapelry, in the parish of TUNSTALL, union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale; containing 288 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60; patron, Vicar of Tunstall; impropiator, W. C. Wilson, Esq.

LECKBY, with CUNDALL, a township, in the parish of CUNDALL, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Boroughbridge; containing 188 inhabitants. The township, which comprises by computation 2120 acres, is situated on the western side of the river Swale. The hamlet is about a mile north from Cundall.

LECKFORD (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of STOCKBRIDGE, hundred of KING'S-SOMBOURN, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 1¾ mile (N. N. E.) from Stockbridge; containing 231 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2200 acres, chiefly arable, with some excellent pasturage for sheep; the surface is varied, and the scenery in some parts picturesque. The village is situated near the Andover canal, which passes through the parish, affording facility of conveyance for the produce of the chalk-pits, of which there are several in operation. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 16. 10½., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Leckford in the Cathedral of Winchester: the prebend, or sinecure rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, is in the gift of St. John's College, Oxford. The rectorial tithes have been commuted for £400, and the vicarial for £142. 10.; there are 30 acres of rectorial, and one of vicarial glebe. The church is an ancient edifice.

LECKHAMPSTEAD, a chapelry, in the parish of CHIEVELEY, union of NEWBURY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 5¼ miles (S. W.) from East Ilsley; containing 372 inhabitants. It comprises 1742*a.* 1*r.* 29*p.*, of which 22 acres are common or waste. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £118. 10., and the vicarial for £100, and there is a glebe of nearly 13 acres. A school is endowed with the sum of £14 per annum.

LECKHAMPSTEAD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Buckingham; containing 505 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2522*a.* 2*r.* 16*p.*, of which 1921 acres are meadow and pasture, 334 arable, and 266 woodland; the surface is finely undulated, and the scenery enriched with wood; the low lands are watered by a brook that issues from Whittlebury forest; the substratum abounds with limestone, which is quarried for building. A branch canal from Buckingham passes through the parish, and communicates with the Grand Junction at Cosgrove. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the gift of H. W. Beauclerk, Esq.; the tithes have been commuted for £517, and the glebe comprises 79 acres. The church contains an octagonal font, ornamented with representations of the Crucifixion, St. Catherine, &c., rudely executed in basso-relievo. A school for boys was endowed by John Smith, Esq., with £15 per annum, in 1801. There is a chalybeate spring. Wycliffe is said to have held this living with that of Lutterworth.

LECKHAMPTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELTENHAM, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Cheltenham; containing 1770 inhabitants, and consisting by survey of 1560 acres. There are quarries of stone of good quality, both for building and for burning into lime, for the conveyance of which facilities are afforded by a branch of the Gloucester and Cheltenham railway, which passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 13. 4.; net income, £356; patron, H. N. Trye, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1778: the glebe comprises 170 acres. An additional church, dedicated to St. Philip, was consecrated in May, 1840; it is a neat structure, and contains 800 sittings, half of which are free. A national school is supported by subscription.

LECKONFIELD (St. Catherine), a parish, in the union of BEVERLEY, Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Beverley; containing, with the hamlet of Arram, 347 inhabitants. This place is memorable as the residence of the Percy family, earls of Northumberland, whose stately castle, falling into decay, was taken down in 1600, to furnish materials for the repair of their castle of Wressel; the site, comprising an area of about 4 acres, is now a rich pasture, but parts of the moat by which it was surrounded may still be distinctly traced. The manor, on the death of the 11th earl without issue male, passed to his daughter's son, Algernon Seymour, Duke of Somerset, and from him to Sir Chas. Wyndham, Earl of Egremont, and is now the property of Col. Wyndham. The parish comprises about 4000 acres, and a considerable portion is let to cottagers, in small allotments of 3 or 4 acres, by the lord of the manor, at a moderate rent; the surface is pleasingly varied, and the scenery in many parts picturesque. The village is neatly built, and the scattered hamlet of Arram, about a mile and a half to the east of it, extends nearly to the river Hull. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income £48; patron and impropiator, Col. Wyndham. A parochial school was built in 1784, and is supported by subscription. The Rev. Robert Machell, the present incumbent, is a descendant of the family of Machell, one of whom accompanied Earl Percy from the north to the castle of Leckonfield, in which, in the reign of Henry VII., he had a chamber always appointed for his use.

LEDBURN, a hamlet, in the parish of MENTMORE, union of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Leighton-Buzzard; containing 169 inhabitants.

LEDBURY (St. Michael), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD; containing, with the township of Parkhold, 4591 inhabitants, of whom 4549 are in the town, 15 miles (E. by S.) from Hereford, and 120 (W. N. W.) from London. This place derives its name from the river Leden, which intersects the parish from north to south. The manor at the time of the Conquest belonged to the bishops of Hereford, to whom it had been given by Edwin the Saxon, and who had formerly a park called Dingwood and an episcopal palace, of which there are now no remains. Queen Elizabeth gave other lands to the bishops in exchange for the manor, which was bestowed by James I. upon his son Charles I., who sold it to the citizens of London, from whom it was purchased by the predecessors of the present proprietors. Edward II., when made prisoner by the Earl of Leicester in the castle of Lanstephen, was conveyed to this town, and lodged for some time in the Bishop's palace previously to his confinement in Berkeley Castle. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I. the Earl of Leven besieged and took a small garrison of royalists at Canon-Froome in the neighbourhood; and on the 22nd of April, 1646, the parliamentary forces, under Col. Massey, were attacked and routed at Ledbury by Prince Rupert, who had fixed his head-quarters here: on this occasion 100 of the enemy were killed, and 27 officers and 400 others made prisoners.

The town, which stands at the eastern angle of the county, and at the southern extremity of the Malvern hills, is situated on a declivity, and consists of three continuous streets, of which the central is the principal, and is detached at each end from the northern and southern portions of the line by smaller streets crossing at right angles. The streets are macadamized; the foot way in the high-street is paved with flags, and the inhabitants are indifferently supplied with water brought from reservoirs in Coninger wood. In the more ancient parts the houses are composed of timber and brick, with projecting stories; but those of more modern erection are handsomely built of brick. A subscription reading and news-room has been established, and is well supported; there is also a circulating library with an extensive collection of volumes, and assemblies are held during the season in the ball-room of the Feathers' inn. Races take place in August; and a temporary theatre is opened by an itinerant company of comedians. The manufacture of silk and broad-cloth was carried on to a considerable extent during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., but has declined. There are some malt-ing establishments, and some tanneries; but the chief trade is in cider, of which very great quantities are made in the parish and vicinity; and in cheese, for which the town is the best mart in the county. The canal from Gloucester to Hereford passes through the town, and adds materially to the benefit of the district. The market is on Tuesday, for poultry, butter, and pedlery; and fairs are held on the Monday after Feb. 1st, Monday before Easter, May 12th, June 22nd, Oct. 2nd, and the Monday before Dec. 21st, for cattle, pigs, &c. The market-house is an ancient edifice of timber and brick, supported on sixteen strong oak pillars; the lower part is used as a butter and poultry market, and the upper part as a store-room, and also as a national school. The parish is divided into five parts, the Borough, Wall Hills, Ledon and Haffield, Wellington, and Mitchell and Netherton; the last four form the Foreign of the manor, for which courts leet and baron are held annually, when the constables for the town are chosen; the borough is called the Denizen, and has likewise a court leet and baron. Petty-sessions for the hundred are held every Wednesday. Ledbury sent members to two parliaments in the reign of Edward I., but surrendered the elective franchise subsequently, on the plea of poverty.

The parish comprises, according to survey, 8324 acres, in the highest state of cultivation; much of the land is laid out in orchards and market-gardens, and great quantities of fruit and vegetables are raised for the supply of the surrounding district. There are some quarries of excellent limestone, which is used for building, and also for burning into lime; and a grey marble is found in abundance, and quarried extensively. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 12. 6.: the rectory is divided into the two portions of Overhall and Netherhall: the Bishop of Hereford appoints to the portions and to the vicarage. The tithes have been commuted for £250 each to the prebendaries of Netherhall and Overhall, £52. 10. to the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, and £400 to the vicar. The church is a spacious and handsome structure, exhibiting some fine specimens of Norman architecture, particularly the door in the centre of the west front, and the chancel, on the north side of which is a chapel, dedicated to St. Catherine, of decorated character; the north porch is in the early English style, as is also the tower, which is detached from the church, and surmounted by a well-proportioned spire, about 60 feet in height. Over the altar is a painting of the Lord's Supper, copied from an original of Leonardo da Vinci, by T. Ballard, Esq., a native of the town, and student of the Royal Academy; and at the east end of the south aisle, a new window is ornamented with the figures of Faith, Hope, and Charity, in stained glass. There are also numerous ancient, highly interesting, and beautifully sculptured monuments; some very antique sculptures, and much carving in good preservation. A district church has been erected at Wellington Heath, by private munificence. Here are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Plymouth Brethren, and Wesleyans; also a national school, supported by subscription; a girls' school, maintained by endowment; and a small boys' school, endowed with £3. 11. per annum.

The hospital of St. Catherine was established in the thirteenth century, by Hugh Foliot, Bishop of Hereford, and endowed originally for six widowers and four widows: the revenue was valued at the Dissolution at £32. 7. 11. It was refounded by Elizabeth, in 1580, for a master, seven widowers, and three widows. The increase of funds enabled the trustees to erect a new hospital in 1822, from a design by Mr. Smirke, intended to comprise twenty-four dwellings for as many brethren, twelve of which have been completed, at an expense of £5888; the building is of handsome design, erected with grey marble raised in the parish. Morning service is performed in a chapel adjoining the hospital, twice in the week, by a chaplain. There are several almshouses for poor persons; and a dispensary was established in 1824. The union of Ledbury comprises 22 parishes or places, of which 21 are in the county of Hereford, and one in that of Worcester, the whole containing a population of 12,899. At Wall Hills, about a mile from the town, is a camp, supposed to have been originally British, though subsequently occupied as a Roman station, containing an area of about 30 acres; a smaller camp at Haffield was probably used as a temporary position. Within the parish is also a part of the famous Beacon camp, considered by some antiquaries as one of the fortresses constructed by Caractacus, when this part of Britain was invaded by the Romans under Ostorius Scapula. At Ledbury died Jacob Tonson, an eminent bookseller, whose epitaph was closely copied by Dr. Benjamin Franklin, for his own tombstone, and has been often recorded in print.

LEDSSHAM, a township, in the parish of NESTON, union and Higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 6½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chester; containing 81 inhabitants. It comprises 790 acres, of which 26 are common or waste. The tithes have been commuted for £72. 15., of which £1. 5. are payable to an impropriator, £1. 10. to the vicar, and £70 to the Dean and Chapter of Chester.

LEDSSHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Fairburn and part of Ledstone, 1061 inhabitants, of whom 340 are in the township of Ledsham, 4½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ferry-Bridge. This parish, which is near the great north road, comprises by computation 5150 acres; the soil is in some parts fertile, in others luxuriantly rich, but in more very indifferent land; the surface is boldly diversified, and the scenery beautifully picturesque. The substratum abounds with coal and limestone of excellent quality, of which several mines and quarries are in operation. The village is pleasantly situated in a vale near the source of a rivulet. Facility of conveyance is afforded by the Aire and Calder rivers, which bound the parish; and the Leeds and Selby, and North-Midland railways pass in the immediate vicinity. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. 2.; net income, £397, with a glebe-house; patron, Rev. Charles Medhurst. The church contains a splendid monument to Lady Elizabeth Hastings and her two sisters. She is represented as seated on a sarcophagus reading a book of devotion, and the statues of her sisters Frances and Ann are on pedestals by her side: opposite is a monument of Sir John and Lady Lewis, the grandfather and grandmother of Lady Elizabeth. Schools for 20 boys and 20 orphan girls, the latter also fed and clothed, were liberally endowed by Lady Elizabeth. An hospital for five aged bachelors and six unmarried women was founded in 1670, by Sir John Lewis, who endowed it with £60 per annum; the endowment was augmented by Lady E. Hastings, with a rent-charge, which has been increased by her trustees, and by benefactions, and the present income exceeds £152 per annum; the building was repaired in the year 1816.

LEDSTONE, a township, partly in the parish of LEDHAM, Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, and partly in the parish of KIPPAX, Lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (N. W.) from Ferry-Bridge; containing 259 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation nearly 2000 acres; the soil is extremely fertile, and the surface beautifully varied, and embellished with wood. Ledstone Hall is a handsome mansion, anciently the seat of the Witham family, and subsequently of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford. After the attainder of the earl, the property was purchased by Sir John Lewis, Bart., and from him descended, through Granville H. Wheler, Esq., to the present possessor, the Rev. Charles Medhurst. The Hall, now occupied by Henry Ramsden, Esq., is beautifully situated on an eminence, and surrounded by an extensive park, inclosed with a stone wall; it was honoured on the 29th Sept., 1806, with the presence of the Prince of Wales and Duke of Clarence, who paid a visit to Michael Angelo Taylor, then resident here. The York and North-Midland railway passes through the township.

LEDWELL, a hamlet, in the parish of SANDFORD, union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Neat-Enstone; containing 205 inhabitants. A fine sand, used in the manufacture of glass, is found in the vicinity. Here was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

LEE (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of AMERSHAM, hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Great Missenden; containing 142 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 461 acres, of which about 281 are arable, 125 meadow, 5 woodland, and 50 uninclosed waste; the soil is a wet cold clay, and the surface is level, but considerably elevated. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £50; patron, Henry Deering, Esq. The church was formerly a chapel of ease to the rectory of Weston-Turville.

LEE (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of LEWISHAM, hundred of BLACKHEATH, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 7 miles (S. E. by E.) from London; containing 2360 inhabitants. This parish, which within the last few years has very much increased in population, formerly consisted only of a few detached houses. A very handsome range of buildings, called Lee Park, has been recently erected, consisting of villas on both sides of the road, with grounds tastefully laid out, and forming one continuous line with Blackheath Park. Great additions have also been made to the village, and in various parts of the vicinity are elegant mansions. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the Greenwich court of requests for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £407, and the glebe comprises 39 acres. The ancient church, with the exception of the tower, was taken down, and the present edifice erected on the site in 1814; it is built of flint and stone, and has a neat cemetery containing several handsome monuments, the most conspicuous of which are those of the great astronomer, Edmund Halley; the comedian, William Parsons; the amiable Lady Dacre; and Sir Samuel Fludyer, Bart., who, as lord mayor of London in 1761, gave a sumptuous banquet to George III. and his royal consort. Some indications of insecurity in the structure having appeared, it was deemed advisable to prepare for the probable result, and on the 17th of July, 1839, the foundation-stone of a new church was laid, and the building, which is an elegant specimen, in the early English style, with a lofty and graceful spire, was completed at an expense of £8000, and consecrated on the 11th March, 1841. The interior is chastely and beautifully arranged; the windows are embellished with stained glass, and the central east window, of which the design is taken from the "Five Sisters" in York Minster, is finely executed; it is adapted for a congregation of 1000 persons, and forms an interesting feature in the landscape. There is also a chapel of ease in the parish. The Blackheath proprietary grammar school, in connexion with King's College, is a handsome building; and the Lee Park proprietary grammar school is also a good edifice, after the model of the Propyleum of Athens. A national school has been erected. Christopher Boone, in 1683, founded and endowed an almshouse for six persons, with a chapel attached, and a school for twelve children; the endowment produces about £71 per annum. Behind Boone's almshouses are those endowed by the Merchant Tailors' Company for 29 widows of freemen; the houses are built of white brick, ornamented with stone.

LEE, a tything, in the parish and union of ROMSEY, hundred of KING'S-SOMBOURN, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 156 inhabitants.

LEE-BOTWOOD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CHURCH-STRETTON, hundred of CONDOVER, S. division of SALOP, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Church-Stretton; containing 233 inhabitants. The parish is situated in a flat valley between the Caer-Caradoc, Lawley, and Longmynd hills, which form the south-western boundary of the hundred; and comprises 1286a. 2p. A considerable portion of the land is rough pasture; there are quarries of limestone of very good quality, both for building and for burning into lime; and coal is found, and some mines are in operation. The surface is varied, and the lower grounds are intersected by a brook called the Rae, increased by numerous smaller streams from the hills. The village is on the road from Shrewsbury to Ludlow. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Longnor united; net income, £135; patron, Archdeacon Corbett: the tithes have been commuted for £105. The church, which is an ancient structure, once belonged to the abbey of Haughmond.

LEE-BROCKHURST (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of WEM, Whitechurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wem; containing 165 inhabitants. It comprises 579a. 1r. 33p. Sandstone of suitable quality for building and other purposes is found, and for its conveyance facilities are afforded by the river Roden, on which the village is situated. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £72; patron and impropiator, John Walford, Esq.

LEE, CHAPEL, an extra-parochial liberty, in the parish of EAST TILBURY, union of ORSETT, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX; containing 11 inhabitants.

LEE, ST. JOHN, a parish, in the union of HEXHAM, S. division of TINDALE ward and of NORTHUMBER-

LAND, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Hexham; containing 1947 inhabitants. This is an extensive parish, consisting of the townships of West Acomb, Anick, Anick-Grange, Bingfield, Cocklaw, Fallowfield, Hallington, Portgate, Sandhoe, and Wall, and comprising by computation 15,000 acres; the soil is in general good, and the surface varied and picturesque; it is rich in mines of coal and lead, and well-watered by the Tyne and the northern branch of that river. The parish contains several villages and hamlets, but no village of its own name. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £280; patron, T. W. Beaumont, Esq.: the impropriation belongs to the Misses Smith and the family of Errington. The church, dedicated to St. John of Beverley, and situated on a fine eminence on the northern side of the Tyne, was anciently noted for an annual procession made to it by the monks of Hexham; the east end was rebuilt in 1819, and the west end, with the spire, in 1842, total cost of re-erection, £1400, raised by subscription, aided by £200 from T. W. Beaumont, Esq. It contains 400 sittings, of which 100 are free. There are chapels of ease at Bingfield and Wall. Mary Vernol, in 1771, conveyed a piece of ground in the chapelry of Bingfield for building a school-house, which she endowed with a rent-charge of £10.

LEE-WARD, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Rothbury; containing 91 inhabitants. It is the property of the Duke of Northumberland.

LEEDS (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBORNE, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Maidstone; containing 675 inhabitants. The parish is said to have derived its name from Ledian, councillor to Ethelbert II., who built a fortress here in 978. Subsequently, in 1119, a priory of Black canons, in honour of St. Mary and St. Nicholas, was founded by Robert de Crepito Corde, alias Crevecœur, or Crouchheart, Knt., the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was £362. 7. 7. The abbey church was equal in beauty to a cathedral, and the monastic buildings, remains of which still exist, were of correspondent size and grandeur. Leeds Castle, one of the most stately in the kingdom, is seated in a beautiful park, and surrounded by a moat: the buildings, which are entirely of stone, are ranged round a spacious quadrangle, and, though they exhibit the architecture of different periods, produce, as a whole, a most striking and noble effect. The structure has two ancient gateways, a grand hall, and a magnificent suite of apartments: there are also the remains of the inner vallum, of the keep, and various other detached parts, said to have been erected by the Crevecœurs, by William of Wykeham, and by Henry VIII. George III. and his royal consort were entertained here, in their excursion to Coxheath Camp, in 1779. It has lately been very extensively repaired, and the style that prevailed in the time of Henry VII. has been adhered to, being that which was most prominent in the remains of the ancient edifice. The living is a perpetual curacy, to which that of Broomfield is united; net income, £163; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of Canterbury. The church has at the west end a remarkably low square tower, and contains some good monuments to the Meredith family.

Present Seal and Arms.

LEEDS (St. PETER), a parish and liberty, in the W. riding of YORK, comprising the market-town and borough of LEEDS, which has a separate jurisdiction, though locally in the wapentake of SKYRACK; and containing 152,054 inhabitants, of whom 88,741 are in the town, 24 miles (S. W. by W.) from York, and 194 (N. N. W.) from London. This place is of great antiquity, and is supposed to have been the site of a Roman station connected with that of Cambodunum, an opinion in some degree corroborated by the discovery of traces of a Roman road, and other ancient remains in the vicinity. After the destruction of Cambodunum, by Cadwallo, a British prince, and Penda, King of Mercia, it was made a royal vill, and obtained the Saxon appellation of Loidis, though from what source does not clearly appear, but from which its modern name is obviously derived. During the heptarchy a memorable battle took place here, between Oswy, King of Northumbria, and Penda, the pagan King of Mercia, who, in 655, had invaded Oswy's territories, in which Penda, with many of his vassals, was slain, and numbers of his forces, in their attempt to escape from the field of carnage, perished in the waters of the river Aire, which had at that time overflowed its banks. At the time of the Conquest, the manor of Leeds was given to Ilbert de Lacy, who erected a baronial castle here, which was besieged by Stephen, King of England, on his route to Scotland, and in which Richard II., after his deposition, was for some time confined, previously to his removal to the Castle of Pontefract, in which he was inhumanly murdered. During the war in the reign of Charles I., numerous skirmishes between the contending parties took place in the immediate neighbourhood, and that monarch resided for a short time at Red Hall, a mansion of brick, so called from the colour of that material, situated in that part of the borough now called Guildford-street. In 1643, the town was taken by the parliamentary forces under General Fairfax, who had marched from Bradford to besiege it, and to whom, after an assault of two hours, it surrendered. After the battle of Marston Moor, in 1643, the Scottish troops halted here; on which occasion Charles I., who was then a captive at Red Hall, refused the opportunity offered to him by a female servant of the house to effect his escape in disguise: her fidelity, however, was amply acknowledged and rewarded after the Restoration, on the production of a token given to her for that purpose by the unfortunate monarch. In the reign of William III., Thomas, Marquess of Carmarthen, was created Duke of Leeds, and the title is still inherited by his descendants.

The town, which is more celebrated as the principal seat of the woollen manufacture, than either for its antiquity or historical importance, is pleasantly situated on the acclivities and summit of a gentle eminence rising from the north bank of the river Aire, over which are five bridges. Leeds bridge, consisting of five arches, forms the principal avenue to the south entrance, but is inadequate to its purpose, the nature of the ground and the surrounding property presenting great obstacles to improvement; Wellington bridge, a handsome structure of one noble arch, 100 feet in span, was erected in 1818, at an expense of £7000, from a design by Rennie, and affords communication with the townships of Wortley and Armley. Victoria bridge, connecting Sandford-street with the Holbeck road, was completed in 1838, at a cost of £8000, and is a handsome and substantial structure of one arch, 80 feet in span, and 45 feet in breadth, between the battlements; during its erection it withstood the shock of an overwhelming flood without injury; it extends the navigation of the Aire, and affords an uninterrupted line of inland communication between the eastern and western seas. The other two are Suspension bridges, one constructed in 1829, at an expense of £3950, by Messrs. Hartop and Co., of the Milton iron-works, and forming a direct communication between Hunslet and the road to York on the east, and the other communicating with Holbeck and the western part of the town. A sixth bridge, of stone, and very commodious, to be called Crown-Point bridge, is in course of building under an act of parliament, about 500 yards below Leeds bridge, opening a communication between Hunslet-lane (the London entrance) and the eastern precincts; it will cost, with approaches, at least £20,000, and several of the owners of property in its vicinity who have acted with great liberality, will be rewarded by the increased value of land and houses resulting from the erection. The streets in the more ancient parts of the town are inconveniently narrow, but in other parts spacious and well built; Briggate, the principal street, is more than 600 yards in length, ascending in a direct line from the old bridge, by a gradual rise, to St. John's-street, and forming one of the widest and handsomest thoroughfares in the north of England. From St. John's church, the town extends towards the west by a gentle slope, on which are many good streets, squares, and public buildings; and eastward, towards the Sheepscar beck, which receives the waters of the Gipton stream, and flows southward through a populous district, and falls into the river Aire about a quarter of a mile below the parochial church. Considerable improvements have been made under acts of parliament obtained in 1809 and 1815, by which the town is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water, formerly conveyed from Addle into three capacious reservoirs, from which it was distributed to the houses of the inhabitants; but now brought from Eccup, near Harewood, about six miles north of the town, by a company incorporated by parliament, in 1840, and for which works at Headingley and on Woodhouse Moor were constructed in 1841. In 1842 an act was obtained, very ample in its provisions, relating to lighting, paving, improvement, and police; its administration is in the hands of the town-council, and a board of works has been constituted, which will be productive of great public benefit; in the same year an act was also passed for providing additional parochial burial-ground, which was much wanted. The houses are in general neatly built of brick, and roofed with grey slate; and in various parts are elegant mansions, and handsome ranges in the modern style, of which Park-place has some ground in front, tastefully laid out in parterres and shrubberies. Park-square, Hanover-square, and Woodhouse-square are also similarly inclosed and planted. The town is rapidly increasing in the west and north-west, particularly in the district of Little Woodhouse, which affords excellent sites for building.

The Leeds Subscription Library, in Commercial-street, was first instituted in 1768, at the recommendation of Dr. Priestley, and has now one of the most extensive collections, literary and scientific, in the north; the New Subscription Library in Park-row, the New Library, and the Young Man's Library, have all valuable collections; and there are also a Parochial Library, a Church of England Library, containing chiefly books on divinity, and libraries connected with some of the dissenting places of worship. The Theatre, a plain edifice of brick, erected in 1771, is opened occasionally by the York company of comedians. The Assembly Rooms over the White Cloth Hall were built in 1775, and the Music Hall in Albion-street, in 1792; they are both neat buildings of brick, and the latter is often appropriated to various other uses. The Public Baths in Wellington-street, a handsome range in the Grecian style, erected in 1820, under the superintendence of Mr. Chantrell, at an expense of £6000, are conveniently arranged, and comprise hot, cold, shower, and vapour baths, with others artificially prepared, and possess the properties and temperature of the Matlock and Buxton waters. The Literary and Philosophical Society was established in 1820, and a building of stone, erected by Mr. Chantrell, in the Grecian style, at a cost of £6500, and containing a library, lecture-room, and museum, is appropriated to the use of the members. The Mechanics' Institution and Literary Society, which possesses no fewer than 800 members, is composed of two societies until recently distinct, namely, the Mechanics' Institute, founded in the year 1825, and the Literary Institution, established in 1834, which were combined in one under the above title, in 1842. It has a library of more than 5000 volumes, arranged in a handsome saloon, used for lectures and as a reading-room for the members, and which contains also a valuable philosophical apparatus: there are likewise several classrooms. The building was purchased a few years since, principally with the proceeds of a successful exhibition. The Commercial Buildings, a spacious structure of stone, in the Grecian style, were erected in 1826, at an expense of £34,000, under the superintendence of Mr. Clark, architect, and are used as an exchange for the merchants and manufacturers of the town; the buildings contain also numerous other apartments, among which are a news-room, well supplied with daily journals and periodicals, and an elegant room for public meetings and exhibitions. A Museum of natural curiosities was established in 1827, by Mr. Calvert, and contains more than 15,000 specimens. A Masonic Hall has been opened in Sterne's-buildings, Briggate. A School of Medicine for the benefit of practitioners and their pupils, has been instituted, of which the sessions commence in October, and close in April; and there is also a Floral and Horticultural Society, which, after having been discontinued for some years, was re-established in 1837.

The SUBURBS comprise several villages and hamlets connected with the town by long ranges of factories in some parts, and in others by series of detached villas of pleasing and picturesque appearance. The environs abound with numerous handsome mansions, the seats of merchants and families of distinction; and the surrounding country is rich in interesting features. On the northern acclivity of Airedale, between Headingley and Burley, are Botanical Gardens, comprising an area of 20 acres, embellished with appropriate buildings, interspersed with several sheets of water, and richly planted with every variety of foreign and indigenous specimens, tending to illustrate science. Nearly adjoining Woodhouse Moor, is the General Cemetery, for the interment of persons of all religious denominations, which was opened to the public in 1835, and occupies an area of 10 acres, purchased at a cost of £4000, by a company of £50 shareholders, who expended more than £11,000 in the requisite buildings and arrangements; it is situated on a gentle acclivity, commanding a fine view of the town and of the picturesque vale of the Aire. The grounds, which are enclosed with a wall twelve feet in height, are beautifully laid out, and are adapted for 14,000 graves, in addition to the vaults and catacombs; in the centre is a chaste and elegant chapel in the Grecian style, for the performance of the funeral service; and on one side of the principal entrance, through a portal of good design, are the residences of the chaplain and registrar, and on the other the house for the sexton and keeper. The Cavalry Barracks, at the north entrance to the town, were erected in 1820, at an expense of £28,000, and occupy an area of 11 acres; the buildings are of brick, and form a very complete establishment, comprising spacious grounds for exercise and parade, with stabling for several troops of horse.

To the great extent and variety of the MANUFACTURES carried on in the town and neighbourhood, and particularly to that of woollen-cloth, which has within the last few years been brought to a high state of perfection, may be attributed the present prosperity of the West riding of the county. The pre-eminence obtained by the cloth manufactures of the town over its once more successful competitors, Halifax and Bradford, is not of more ancient date than the middle of the seventeenth century, since which period the rapidity of its progress, more especially during the last thirty years, has been altogether unprecedented. Formerly, only the coarser kinds of woollen-cloth, distinguished from those of the west of England by the appellation of Yorkshire cloths, were manufactured here; but since the introduction of machinery, and particularly since the great improvements introduced by Mr. William Hirst, a native of this place, cloths have been produced equalling, and in some instances surpassing, those of the western counties, in fineness of texture, and brilliancy and permanency of colour; and superfine black and blue cloths, made from wool carefully selected, have been sold for £5 per yard. Many extensive factories have been established, in some of which the whole process, from the first breaking of the wool to the finishing of the cloth for the consumer, is performed by machinery propelled by steam. The principal branches of the manufacture are, superfine broad and coarse narrow cloths, ladies' pelisse cloth and shawls, and carpets, with Scotch camlets, and a variety of other stuffs. The worsted manufacture is also carried on here and in the vicinity to a considerable extent; but the chief quantities of stuffs are purchased in the rough state at Bradford and Halifax by the Leeds merchants, to be dyed and finished here, and afterwards sent to all parts of the kingdom. In the town are likewise several spacious factories for spinning flax, and the making of canvas, sacking, linen, thread, and other articles, with numerous fulling-mills, dye-houses, and other establishments connected with the woollen, worsted, and linen manufactures. In the immediate vicinity are large manufactories for crown and flint glass, and glass bottles, and an extensive pottery, the reputation of which procures for its wares a great demand in every part of the kingdom; fire-bricks and tobacco-pipes, also, are made in great quantities, for which clay of excellent quality is obtained in the parish. There are several large iron-foundries, and works for the manufacture of steam-engines, and machinery of all kinds; and on the banks of the Aire are numerous mills for grinding corn, crushing rapeseed and dye-woods, with mills for fulling cloth, and the manufacture of tobacco and snuffs, in which a very good trade is carried on. The business of the clothing manufacture is chiefly transacted in the Cloth Halls, of which that for the sale of coloured or mixed cloths, was built in 1758, and is a spacious, neat, quadrangular structure, 127½ yards long, and 66 yards wide; the area is divided into six compartments, called streets, each containing two rows of stands for the exposure and sale of the goods; in 1810 an additional story was built on the north side, principally for the sale of ladies' cloth in an undyed state. The White Cloth Hall, of nearly the same dimensions as the former, was built in 1775. The halls are open for business every Tuesday and Saturday morning; the Mixed Hall at half-past eight in the summer, at nine in the spring and autumn, and at half-past nine in the winter, and the White Hall immediately after the former is closed. The time allotted does not exceed one hour and a quarter, in which short interval business to a large amount is frequently transacted; but the progress of the factory system has of late years materially diminished the business done in the cloth halls.

The river Aire, which passes through the southern part of the town, is navigable to the Humber; and the Leeds and Liverpool canal, constructed in 1777, joins the Aire, and opens a direct line of navigation between Hull and Liverpool, and the principal towns in the kingdom. This canal, for which the first act was obtained in 1770, was not completed to Liverpool till 1816; the whole length is 128 miles, the average breadth 72 feet, and the depth 5 feet; the number of locks from Leeds to the summit is 44, and the rise 411 feet 4½ inches, and the number of locks from the summit to Liverpool 47, and the fall 433 feet 3 inches. It communicates with the Ribble by the Douglas navigation, and a branch from Wigan to Leigh connects it with the Bridgewater canal. The Aire and Calder Navigation Company have extensive ranges of warehouses and a commodious wharf, from which fly-boats pass daily to Goole. The North-Midland, or Leeds and Derby railway completes the communication between the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire, and the midland counties and London; its principal station is in Hunslet-lane, and is an appropriate range of building, comprising offices for the company's use, and also for the companies of the Manchester and Leeds, and the York and North-Midland, railways, with waiting-rooms for passengers, carriagesheds 300 yards in length, &c. In the front is a handsome arcade with two gateways from Hunslet-lane, with a central gateway for waggons proceeding to the docks at the northern extremity, and on the opposite side two other gateways for passengers arriving by the trains; the erection of the buildings cost £14,000, and contiguous to them is a depot for goods, built at an expense of £7000, the whole occupying an area of 14 acres. The Leeds and Selby railway, which forms a portion of the great transverse line from Liverpool to Hull, has its station in Marsh-lane, which includes also an extensive depôt and all the requisite appendages; near its commencement, it passes under a tunnel, at Leeds, 700 yards long, 22 feet wide, and 17 feet high, cut through strata of shale and coal measures, with some portions of rock. The line, which was opened to the public in 1840, was completed by a company with a joint-stock capital of £210,000, and a loan of £130,000. In 1839, this railway was let to the York and North-Midland Company on a thirty years' lease, and the management was transferred to the directors of that undertaking, and the principal station for passengers removed to Hunslet-lane, though the original station is still partially used for heavy goods and coal. A railway to Manchester quits the North-Midland line at Normanton, near Wakefield, and was opened in the year 1840, under the designation of the Manchester and Leeds railway.

The MARKET days are Tuesday and Saturday, the former principally for corn, and the latter for provisions. The corn market is held in the Corn Exchange, a handsome building in the Grecian style, completed in 1828, at an expense of £12,500, raised in shares of £50 each; the front in Briggate is ornamented with Ionic columns supporting an entablature and a cornice, with a pediment, surmounted by an elegant campanile turret. In a niche between the columns is a marble statue of Queen Anne, originally presented to the corporation by Alderman Milner, and placed in front of the ancient moot hall, which once stood conveniently in the centre of Briggate. Part of the building is appropriated as an hotel, in the rear of which is a spacious court, surrounded by a piazza, where the corn is sold by sample. The Central Market is a spacious edifice at the corner of Duncan-street, commenced by a proprietary of shareholders, and completed in 1827 at an expense of £35,000, from a design of Mr. Goodwin, of London; the principal front is divided into three compartments by fluted columns of the Ionic order and antæ of corresponding character, supporting an entablature, on which are inscribed the words "Central Market," and surmounted by a triangular pediment. The interior is divided into three ranges of stalls, and a gallery extends round three sides of the area, of which the fourth is occupied by a bazaar. The South Market, extending from Hunslet-lane to Meadow-lane, was erected in 1824, after a design of Mr. Chantrell, at an expense of £14,500, and is a handsome structure in the Grecian style, appropriated for the sale of leather; the interior comprises a spacious area arranged in streets, with regular shops for the sale of leather, and a semicircular range of building for other general wares, in the centre of which is a circular market-house, crowned with a dome resting on pillars of the Doric order. The Wholesale Carcase Market, called "Leadenhall," in Vicar-lane, is a well-arranged area, with slaughter-houses under ground, sufficiently capacious for the slaughter of 150 beasts, exclusively of calves and sheep; it is amply supplied with water, and kept perfectly clean. The New Shambles and Fish Market were erected in 1826, on ground purchased at a cost of £6000, and are conveniently arranged for the purpose in two streets, Cheapside and Fleet-street; above the central row of shops is a bazaar 80 yards in length, formerly let in shops to dealers in various kinds of fancy articles. The Free Market for the sale of vegetables, fruit, hay, cattle, and pigs, which is about to be enlarged, at present occupies an area of nearly 10,000 square yards, purchased in 1823 by the commissioners, under a special act of parliament; it is under excellent arrangements, and though originally intended to be free, as its name implies, the parties frequenting it pay moderate tolls, producing from £1200 to £1400 a year, now, by the new improvement bill, under the controul of the town-council. Fairs are held on July 10th and 11th for horses, and on November 8th and 9th for cattle; and eight fairs are held annually for leather in the South market-place.

The town received its first CHARTER of incorporation in the second year of the reign of Charles I.: this having been forfeited, a new charter was granted by Charles II., in the 13th of his reign, under which the inhabitants were governed by a mayor, 12 aldermen, and 24 assistants, a recorder, deputy recorder, town-clerk, coroner, clerk of the market, and other officers. Since the passing of the Municipal act, however, the borough has been divided into 12 wards, and the corporation made to consist of a mayor, 16 aldermen and 48 councillors; the total number of magistrates is 30, but a few have not qualified. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session for the borough; and the Michaelmas sessions for the West riding also take place here. Petty-sessions for the borough are held every Tuesday and Friday, and for the several parishes in the wapentake of Skyrack by the magistrates of the riding weekly. The borough justices sit daily for the examination of offenders, and the regulation of police affairs, two attending in rotation; and a court baron for the recovery of debts not exceeding £15, within the honour of Pontefract, is held every fortnight. The police force consists of a chief constable and about 100 men. An act was obtained in 1839 for exempting the inhabitants of the manor from the obligation of grinding their corn and malt at the king's mills, upon paying an adequate compensation to the lessee, for which purpose £13,000, and a sum for attendant expenses, have been raised by rates on the owners and occupiers. The Court house is an elegant building, in the Grecian style, consisting of a centre and two wings, erected in 1813, from a design by Mr. Taylor. The central front is decorated with a lofty portico of four Corinthian pillars, supporting an entablature and cornice surmounted by a triangular pediment, enriched with appropriate designs sculptured in bas-relief; the principal entrance opens into a spacious vestibule, on one side of which is the rotation office, so called from the magistrates sitting in rotation at petty-sessions, and on the other the rooms appropriated to the magistrates of the West riding. There are also apartments for the watch committee, the grand jury, and barristers, communicating with the sessions hall, which is well arranged for the purposes of the court and for the transaction of the public business; on each side is a gallery over the spacious area, which is also used for town meetings. The basement story, which is arched with stone, and surrounded by an arcade, comprises a police-office, a guard-room, a room for military stores, an armoury, an engine-house, and apartments for the keeper of the prison, which occupies an area in the rear of the building. The Prison contains thirteen cells and one airing-yard, but prisoners after conviction are removed to the Wakefield house of correction; the construction of a more commodious and better adapted gaol has very lately been commenced. The town, during the usurpation of Cromwell, sent a member to the house of commons, but the privilege was afterwards discontinued till the 2nd of William IV., when the elective franchise was conferred, and the inhabitants were empowered to return two representatives to the imperial parliament; the right of election is vested in the £10 householders of the borough; the number of registered voters is 6298, and the mayor is returning officer.

The PARISH comprises by computation 21,760 acres; the soil is generally fertile, and much of the land is in a very high state of cultivation; the substratum is rich in mineral produce, and the abundance of excellent coal found in various parts, has contributed greatly to the establishment of the extensive works and factories to which the place is indebted for its distinguished prosperity. Within the limits of the parish are the chapelries of Armley, Beeston, Bramley, Farnley, Chapel-Allerton, Headingley with Burley, Holbeck, Wortley, and Hunslet; also the township of Potter-Newton, and part of the townships of Seacroft and Temple-Newsom. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £38. 0. 2½; net income, £1257, with a good glebe-house; patrons, twenty-five Trustees; appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The Parochial church, dedicated to St. Peter, supposed to have been originally built on the site of a more ancient structure, in the reign of Edward III., and enlarged in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., was entirely rebuilt by subscription in 1838-40, at an expense of £28,000, after a design by Mr. Chantrell. It is a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, in the transitional style from the decorated into the later English, with a lofty square embattled tower rising from the north transept. The interior is finely arranged, and contains some ancient monuments preserved from the old church, and several of modern date, among which is one by Flaxman, in statuary marble, to the memory of Captains S. Walker and R. Beckett, who fell in the battle of Talavera. There is also a fine full-length monumental statue by Parke, raised by subscription, of Michael Thomas Sadler, Esq., M.P. for Aldborough and Newark, an eminent linen merchant of this town, who introduced into parliament a bill for limiting the labour of children in factories to ten hours per day, and to whose exertions and example is owing the turn which legislation has taken in behalf of the industrious classes.

At the close of the year 1843, a plan was proposed by the Rev. Dr. Hook, vicar of Leeds, for the division of the parish and vicarage into numerous distinct and separate parishes and vicarages, under the authority of an act of parliament, to be obtained and carried out by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and at a meeting of the commissioners, held on the 9th of January, 1844, they assented to the general principle of the intended arrangements, reserving the details for future consideration. The plan includes within its scope, the formation of new parishes for ecclesiastical purposes, the incumbent of each to be a vicar, and to receive all tithes, moduses, and similar payments, now received by the vicar of Leeds. Churchwardens, with the usual full powers, will be chosen in each new parish; marriages and all other offices will be performed in every church, as in ancient parish churches; parsonage-houses and schools will be provided; and the nave or body of each church will become free and wholly unappropriated. All patronage, also, now vested in the vicar, will be placed in the hands of the bishop of the diocese, subject to the power which the commissioners will possess of assigning part of it to other parties, in consequence of superior benefit arising from such a course.

The church dedicated to St. John, was built in 1634, at the expense of John Harrison, Esq., who endowed it with a house and eighty-four acres of land, now producing £322. 10. per annum, of which he appropriated one-ninth part for the repair of the church, and the residue for the minister. It is a neat structure, in the later English style, with an embattled tower crowned by crocketed pinnacles; the walls, originally of perishable stone, have been rebuilt at an expense of £1500, with stone of more durable quality; the founder was buried in the church, under a monument of black marble. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the joint patronage of the Vicar of Leeds, the Mayor, and the three senior Aldermen; net income, £375. The church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was erected in 1721, at a cost of £4563, of which £1000 were given by Lady Elizabeth Hastings, and the remainder raised by subscription; it was endowed with £80 per annum, by the Rev. Henry Robinson, nephew of the founder of St. John's. It is in the Grecian style, combining the Ionic and Doric orders, with a tower of two stages, of which one is of the Corinthian and the other of the Ionic order; there is a monument to Mr. Robinson, recording his charitable benefactions. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £300; patrons, the Vicar, the Recorder of the borough, and the Minister of St. John's. The church dedicated to St. Paul, was erected in 1793, chiefly through the exertions of the Rev. Miles Atkinson, a late vicar of Kippax, who, with the assistance of numerous friends, raised the structure, at an expense of £10,000, on a site given by Dr. Wilson, Bishop of Bristol, who laid the first stone; it is a neat edifice of stone, with a handsome Ionic portico supporting an entablature and pediment. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £133; patron, since the death of the late incumbent, the Vicar of Leeds. The church dedicated to St. James, was formerly a place of worship belonging to the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, from whom it was purchased by two clergymen of the Established Church, and afterwards by a recent incumbent, and was consecrated by the late Archbishop Markham; it is a plain octagonal building, neatly arranged. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Leeds.

The church on Quarry Hill, dedicated to St. Mary, was erected in 1824, at an expense of £10,456, granted by the Parliamentary Commissioners; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains 2000 sittings, of which nearly half are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £45; patron, the Vicar. Christ-Church, in Meadow-lane, was erected in the same year as St. Mary's, at an expense of £10,951, from the same funds; it is an elegant structure in the decorated English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, strengthened by buttresses, and crowned with crocketed pinnacles, and contains about 2000 sittings, of which one-half are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £65; patron, the Vicar. The church dedicated to St. Mark, in the populous suburb of Woodhouse, was erected in 1825, at an expense of £9000, parliamentary grant, and is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; a district has been assigned, including Woodhouse and the adjoining parts of Headingley and Potter-Newton, and the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £140; patron, the Vicar. The church at Mount Pleasant, dedicated to St. George, was erected for the accommodation of the inhabitants of the north-western suburbs, in 1837, at an expense, including its endowment, of more than £12,000; it is a neat and commodious structure, in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty spire. A church dedicated to St. Luke, was erected in North-street, in 1841, at a cost of £1300, raised by subscription; it is a neat structure in the early English style, and contains 450 sittings, of which 300 are free; underneath, is a schoolroom. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Leeds. A benevolent individual having resolved to build a church at St. Peter's Bank, at his own expense, for which purpose he has given £5000, the first stone of an edifice, to be dedicated to the Holy Cross, was laid 14th September, 1842. Churches or chapels of ease have been erected at Armley, Beeston, Bramley, Chapel-Allerton, Farnley, Hunslet, Headingley, Holbeck, Kirkstall, and Wortley, all of which are described in the articles on those townships. There are also numerous places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Methodists of the New Connexion, Female Revivalists, members of the Scottish Church, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics; many of the buildings are spacious and elegant, and several of them possess organs of unusual tone and power, as well as the parish church.

The Free Grammar School was originally founded in 1552, by Sir William Sheffield, who endowed it with land on the condition that the inhabitants should erect a school-house, which was subsequently fulfilled by John Harrison, in 1624, at his own expense; the school-house was enlarged in 1692, by Godfrey Lawson, mayor, and a dwelling was erected for the master in 1780, by the trustees, since which other additions have been made. The original endowment, augmented by subsequent benefactions, now produces above £2000 per annum; and the school is conducted by a head master and second master, with assistants, and is open to all boys of the parish for instruction in the classics and mathematics, and writing. It has the privilege of sending a candidate for one of Lady Elizabeth Hastings' exhibitions to Queen's College, Oxford, and is entitled, with the schools of Haversham and Halifax, to one of the four scholarships of £80 per annum, founded by the Rev. T. Milner, in Magdalen College, Cambridge, tenable till the holder takes the degree of M.A.; and also, in failure of a candidate from the school of Normanton, to one of the two scholarships founded by Mrs. Frieston, in Emanuel College, Cambridge. A Parochial School for girls, of whom eighty are clothed and instructed, is supported by a portion of the produce of lands bequeathed for charitable uses, and amounting to £40 per annum; an appropriate building was erected in 1815, at an expense of £1000. A National central school, in which about 450 children of both sexes are taught, was opened in 1812, and is maintained by subscription; and of some other national schools in various parts of the town, is a factory school at St. Peter's Bank, one of the first of the kind undertaken by the National Society; the school-house, erected in 1840, at a cost of £1700, contains five rooms, and is capable of receiving 1000 children. A Lancasterian school and a Model Infants' school are likewise carried on, and a Church of England Commercial school, a large and well-conducted establishment; and there are also schools in connexion with several of the dissenting congregations.

The General Infirmary, founded in 1771, is a neat edifice, forming three sides of a quadrangle, and contains accommodation for more than 150 in-patients; it is furnished with an arrangement of cold, warm, and medicated baths; the wards are well ventilated, and a piece of contiguous ground, comprising 4000 square yards, purchased at a cost of £1500, and presented to the institution in 1817, by Richard F. Wilson, Esq., has been appropriated as a garden for exercise in the open air. The charity is supported chiefly by subscription and collections, averaging £2500 per annum, and by the dividends on £3000 three per cent. consols. bought with the amount of various bequests; the usual number of in-patients is about 1600, and of out-patients, 3000, annually. The House of Recovery, a building of brick, was opened in 1804, for the reception of patients in contagious fever, and is maintained by voluntary subscriptions and donations; it is under the care of a board of subscribers, a matron, and resident apothecary, and is visited gratuitously by two physicians and two surgeons. In April, 1844, it was resolved, at a public meeting, to erect a more commodious edifice, to cost £6000. The Dispensary in North-street was established in 1824, and is supported by subscriptions and occasional benefactions, averaging about £600 per annum. The General Eye and Ear Infirmary, in Kirkgate, was commenced in 1821, and, with the assistance of a small subscription, and the gratuitous aid of three surgeons, has produced great benefit among the poor. The Stranger's Friend Society, established in 1790, by the dissenters chiefly, dispenses about £350 annually in visiting and relieving the sick poor; and the Church of England District Visiting Society, established in 1834, distributes upwards of £500 annually among the poor, without distinction of country or creed. Eight houses were bequeathed in 1643, by Josias Jenkinson, Esq., for the reception of aged persons, but without any funds for keeping them in repair; they have been rebuilt, partly by a bequest of £500 by John Blayds, Esq.; and the rent of a farm, left to the poor by the founder, has been appropriated to their endowment, from which each of the inmates derives a payment of £5 per annum. Harrison's Hospital, comprising originally 30 almshouses, to which 12 have since been added, were founded in 1653, by John Harrison, Esq., who endowed them with lands producing £80 per annum; the endowment has been augmented by subsequent benefactions from Mrs. Catherine Parker, Mr. Joseph Midgley, Arthur Iken, Esq., and others; and the buildings, which occupy a large quadrangular area, afford an asylum to 64 aged women, who receive £12 per annum each, in quarterly payments. Houses for 10 aged widows were founded in 1729, by Mrs. Mary Potter, who endowed them with £2000, to which £400 were added by Mrs. Barbara Chantrell; these sums, with subsequent benefactions, produce an income from which each of the inmates receives £12. 12. per annum. Mrs. Rachael Dixon bequeathed houses and premises in trust to the vicar of Leeds, and the minister of St. John's, of which she appropriated the rents to be equally divided among three widows of clergymen of the Established Church.

In the neighbourhood are several chalybeate and other mineral springs, of which that at Holbeck has properties resembling the water of Harrogate, but less strongly impregnated; it is in high repute, and is brought daily to Leeds for sale. On the declivity of Quarry Hill were vestiges of a Roman camp, the trenches of which are now covered with buildings; and Roman coins, and other relics of antiquity, have been found at various times in the immediate vicinity. In Briggate are some slight remains of the chantry chapel of St. Mary Magdalene, founded in 1470, by the Rev. William Evers, vicar of the parish; and on a formerly sequestered but now much frequented spot, upon the bank of the Aire, about 3 miles from Leeds, are the picturesque ruins of Kirkstall Abbey, which see. Among the distinguished Natives or Residents of the town and neighbourhood have been, Hartley, author of the Observations on Man; Smeaton, the celebrated engineer, and builder of the Eddystone lighthouse; Thoresby, the eminent antiquary; Dr. Priestley, the natural philosopher; Joseph and Isaac Milner, eminent theologians; Dr. James Scott, author of three of the Seatonian prize poems, and a writer in the Public Advertiser under the signature of Anti-Sejanus; and Benjamin Wilson, F.R.S., an eminent landscape painter. The place gives the title of Duke to the family of Osborne.

LEEK (ST. EDWARD THE CONFESSOR), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD; containing 11,576 inhabitants, of whom 7071 are in the town, 23 miles (N. N. E.) from Stafford, and 154 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place, which is of great antiquity, and has been styled "The Capital of the Moorlands," subsequently to the Conquest became the property of the earls of Chester, one of whom obtained for it the grant of a market from King John, and it was eventually given to the monks of the abbey Dieu la Croix, in the parish. In 1745, the troops of the Pretender marched through it on December 3rd, in their advance to Derby, and returned on the 7th of the same month. The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence on the road from London to Manchester; the streets are spacious, well paved, and lighted with gas; and the inhabitants are supplied with water by means of pipes from the springs on Leek Moor. The curious phenomenon of a double sunset occurs here at a certain time of the year, owing to the relative position of a rocky mountain westward from the town. The principal business is the silk manufacture, which has long been in a flourishing state, and has of late years been so considerably extended that several very extensive mills have been erected for twisting and doubling the silk. The articles in silk and mohair, for which the town is chiefly celebrated, are sewing-silks, twist, buttons, ribbons, ferrets, galloons, handkerchiefs, shawls, sarcenet, and broad silk. An immense quantity of buttons covered with worsted stuff are also manufactured, affording employment to many hundred women and children in the surrounding villages, who are engaged in sewing the cloth upon moulds. A considerable quantity of cheese is made in the neighbourhood; and there are some valuable mines of coal, lead, and copper, in the adjacent hills, some of which were worked before the year 1680. The Caldron branch of the Trent and Mersey canal passes within half a mile of the town, and near it runs the river Churnet. In 1806, the old market cross, which stood at the foot of the market-place, was taken down, and a town-hall erected on its site, at a cost of £250. Petty-sessions for the Northern division of the hundred are held at the Swan inn, on alternate Wednesdays. The market is on Wednesday; and there are fairs, chiefly for cattle, on the Wednesday before February 3rd, Easter-Wednesday, May 18th, Whit-Wednesday, July 3rd and 28th, and the Wednesday after October 10th: the principal cattle-fair is that on the 18th of May. Courts leet and baron are held by the lord of the manor, at which a constable is appointed.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 9. 1½; net income, £218; patron, Earl of Macclesfield: the tithes were commuted for land in 1805. The church, a very ancient structure, in the later English style, has a tower with eight pinnacles, and stands on an eminence which commands a very extensive prospect: in the interior are several neat mural monuments to the Daintry and other families; and in the churchyard stand the remains of a pyramidal cross, adorned with rude imagery and fret-work, supposed to be of Danish workmanship. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans, and a Roman Catholic chapel, adorned with some fine old paintings brought from a convent at Lisbon, by the nuns of Aston Hall, near Stone. A school, erected at the expense of the Earl of Macclesfield, in the beginning of the last century, is endowed with £9. 13. 10. per annum. Eight almshouses for single women, not under 60 years of age, were founded and endowed by Elizabeth Ash, in 1676, with a rent-charge of £40, and additional benefactions make the total income £78 per annum. Very munificent donations have been made from time to time in aid of the poor, and the annual sum of £290 arises from them. The union of Leek comprises 19 parishes or places, and contains a population of 21,307. There are some remains of Dieu la Croix Abbey (now corrupted to Dieulacres), which was founded by Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester, in 1214, in honour of St. Mary and St. Benedict, for Cistercian monks, and valued at the Dissolution at £243. 3. 6. per annum. The ruins have been dug up and used in erecting barns and stables; but the shafts of the chapel columns are left standing to the height of several feet: the exterior walls of the farm-buildings are decorated with many fragments of arches and capitals, and in one of them is a stone coffin with a crosier and sword carved upon it. Thomas Parker, first Earl of Macclesfield, who became lord high chancellor, and president of the Royal Society, was born in 1666, at Leek, where his father practised as an attorney.

LEEK-FRITH, a township, in the parish and union of LEEK, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Leek; containing 926 inhabitants. John Stoddard, in 1673, bequeathed a rent-charge of £10, to teach 20 poor children.

LEEK-WOOTTON.—See WOOTTON, LEEK.

LEEMAILING, a township, in the parish and union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 1 mile (W. N. W.) from Bellingham; containing 325 inhabitants. The township comprises 4274 acres, and is bounded on the north by the North Tyne river, which sweeps round two-thirds of it, high and rugged rocks skirting portions of it in the opposite direction; the land is mostly heath and sheep-walks, but such parts of it as are in cultivation produce good crops. There are lime and freestone quarries, and iron-ore is found, the remains of a furnace for smelting which, worked in the reign of William III., are visible. Hesleyside, in the township, has been in the possession of the Charltons from the time of Richard II., who is recorded to have lent the sum of £100 to an ancestor of the family: the Hall is a handsome structure of white freestone, commanding a varied prospect, and embracing the picturesque scenery along the vale of the Tyne; one of the wings was burnt down many years since, but has been rebuilt with additions; attached is a neat Roman Catholic chapel. Lee Hall, the residence and property, with the surrounding lands, of Robert Charleton, Esq., is beautifully situated near the river, which abounds with trout.

LEEMING, a chapelry, in the parish of BURNESTON, union of BEDALE, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Bedale; containing, with the townships of Exelby and Newton, 682 inhabitants, of whom 347 are in Leeming. The chapelry comprises 2298a. 2r. 18p., of which 1295 acres are arable, 952 meadow and pasture, and 74 woodland and plantations; its surface is generally flat, and the scenery possesses few attractions, but the soil is fertile, and the arable grounds are in good cultivation. Newton House, a sporting seat of the late Duke of Cleveland, lord of the manor, and owner of a considerable portion of the lands, is now the property of the Dowager Duchess. The village, which is of ancient appearance, is situated on the great Roman road, here called Leeming-Lane, and now so little frequented that grass is growing on its surface; and the river Swale bounds the township on one side. The petty-sessions for the division, formerly held here, have been now removed to Bedale. The old chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was rebuilt by subscription, and consecrated by the Bishop of Ripon, in 1839; it is a neat building of brick, in the later English style, and has an east window embellished with stained glass; it is fitted up with open benches, and contains 300 sittings, of which 200 are free, in consideration of a grant of £200 from the Incorporated Society. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Burneston; net income, about £84, but capable of considerable increase. A school adjoining the chapel is supported by subscription; and bequests by Ralph Cowley in 1670, and Thomas Isles in 1684, together amounting to £7 per annum, are appropriated to the poor.

LEES, a hamlet, in the parish and union of ASHTON-UNDER-LINE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 8½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Manchester. This place is situated in the heart of a manufacturing district, on the road from Oldham to Huddersfield; and the population is chiefly employed in the numerous factories in its immediate vicinity, the establishment of which has given importance to the place. Fairs are held in the spring and autumn. The living is a curacy; net income, £131; patron, Rector of Ashton. The chapel, dedicated to St. John, is a neat edifice of stone, erected in 1742. There is a meeting-house for Wesleyans; and a national school for girls has been established. Near the village is a chalybeate spring, called Lea Spa.

LEESE, a township, in the parish of SANDBACH, union of CONGLETON, hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Middlewich; containing 151 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £43. 0. 10., and the vicarial for £28. 2. 3.

LEFTWICH, a township, in the parish of DAVENHAM, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 1 mile (S.) from Northwich; containing 2001 inhabitants. A national school has an endowment of £10 per annum.

LEGBOURN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Louth; containing 461 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 3500 acres, of which about 100 are woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture, in equal portions; the surface is level, the soil chiefly clay, producing good wheat and beans; and the scenery of pleasing character. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift and incumbency of the Powley family; net income, £84; impropiator, H. R. Allenby, Esq., of Kenwick House: the tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1780, when 167 acres were assigned in lieu of the small tithes. The church is an ancient and handsome structure, in the early English style, consisting of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with a tower. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. A priory of Cistercian nuns, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here before the reign of John, by Robert Fitz-Gilbert: at the Dissolution its revenue was £57. 13. 5., and the site, now occupied by a modern mansion, was granted to Sir Thomas Heneage.

LEGH, HIGH, a township, in the parish of ROSTHERNE, union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 6½ miles (E. S. E.) from Warrington; containing 982 inhabitants. The township comprises by measurement 4170 acres, of which 1000 are arable, 3030 meadow and pasture, and 140 woodland. There are two chapels very near each other; one, which is in the grounds of G. Cornwall Legh, Esq., and is a donative, in the presentation of that gentleman, was built in 1581, though some part of it is of an earlier date; and the other was erected by the late Egerton Leigh, Esq., and is a perpetual curacy; net income, £160; patron, E. Leigh, Esq. A school, built in 1717, is endowed with £9 per annum; and there is a school for girls, supported by Mrs. Cornwall Legh.

LEGSBY (ST. THOMAS THE APOSTLE), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, W. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Market-Rasen; containing 326 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2861a. 2r. 21p. inclusive of the hamlets of Collow and Bleasby. The village, which is small, is situated on the acclivity of a picturesque valley. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 4. 2.; net income, £104; patron and impropiator, Sir J. Nelthorpe. The church is an ancient thatched building, without tower or steeple. Sir J. Nelthorpe, Bart., in 1669, bequeathed the tithes of hay at Bleasby, now under composition for £15, to the incumbent, for an afternoon sermon on every Sunday; and a moiety of his endowment of the school at Glandford-Brigg is appropriated to the poor of this parish, jointly with the poor of Fullsby, in the parish of Kirkby-upon-Bain. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

Seal and Arms.

the Romans, made one of their stipendiary cities, and is clearly identified with the Rata of Antoninus, and the Ratiscorion of Richard of Cirencester. That it was a Roman station of considerable importance is evident from the remains of a temple, supposed to have been dedicated to Janus, and from numerous tessellated pavements and other relics of Roman antiquity which have been discovered in the vicinity, and of which a beautiful specimen has been recently found in a fragment of pavement 20 feet in length, and 17 in breadth, divided into octagonal compartments of great variety, ornamented with wreaths, and formed of tesserae of exceedingly small dimensions worked into a regular pattern. By the Saxons it was, from its situation on the river Lear, now the Soar, called Legerceastre, of which its present name is simply a contraction. Under the heptarchy the place belonged to the kingdom of Mercia, and was for about two centuries the see of a bishop whose successors removed to Dorchester, and finally to Lincoln. In 874, the Danes, having overrun this part of the kingdom, seized upon Leicester, which they constituted one of the five great cities of their empire in Britain, and retained it till Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred, and widow of Ethelred, Duke of Mercia, who, after her husband's death, continued to govern the province, rescued it from their possession, after a successful encounter, in which the Danes were defeated with considerable slaughter. At the time of the Norman Conquest, the castle, which had been nearly destroyed in the Danish wars, was rebuilt, and entrusted to Hugo de Grentemaisnel, on whom William bestowed the greater part of the town; but in the disputed succession to the throne, after the death of William, Hugo, embracing the cause of Robert, Duke of Normandy, in opposition to William Rufus, the castle was demolished by the partisans of the latter, and remained for some time in ruins. In the reign of Henry I., Robert de Mellent, being created Earl of Leicester, repaired, enlarged, and fortified the castle, which he made his baronial residence; but his son, Robert le Bossu, and grandson, Robert Blanchmains, having taken part in the rebellious cabals formed against Henry II., Leicester was besieged by the king's forces under Richard de Lucy, and fell into the hands of the king. The king's forces having entered the town, set fire to it in several places, razed the walls, and destroyed the fortifications; and, having ultimately reduced the castle, which held out for a considerable time, demolished it entirely. The earl (Blanchmains) was taken prisoner at the battle of Fornham, but afterwards regained his liberty and the favour of his sovereign. His father, Robert le Bossu, founded the monastery of St. Mary de Pratis, near the town, in which, having assumed the habit of a monk, he spent the remainder of his life. A royal mint, which was established at Leicester in the reign of Athelstan, and situated near the North bridge, was maintained here till the commencement of this reign.

In the reign of John, Robert Fitz-Parnel, Earl of Leicester, obtained from that monarch a charter of incorporation and many privileges, which were afterwards extended and confirmed by Henry III., at the solicitation of Simon de Montfort, then Earl of Leicester, who, rebelling against his sovereign, and engaging in the baronial wars of that reign, was slain at the battle of Evesham. Upon the death of Montfort, Henry III. conferred the earldom of Leicester on his second son, Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, whose grandson, Henry, made this place his principal residence, and under him and his two immediate successors the castle was restored to its former strength and magnificence. After the accession of the house of Lancaster to the throne, Leicester was frequently visited by the sovereigns of that family. A parliament was held here by Henry V., and another by the Dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, during the minority of Henry VI. In the conflict between the houses of York and Lancaster, the castle is supposed to have suffered severely; and in the reign of Richard III. it had become so dilapidated, that when that monarch was at Leicester, a few evenings prior to the battle of Bosworth Field, he preferred to sleep at an inn in the town. During the parliamentary war the town suffered materially; it was taken by storm by the royal army, in May, 1645, but was retaken by the republican forces under Fairfax, in June following, prior to which orders had been issued by Charles I. to pull down what remained of the castle, and to dispose of the materials. The remains are intermixed with the various buildings that have been erected on or near the site; the most conspicuous and complete portion of them is a beautiful arched gateway tower, called the magazine, from its having been purchased by the county as a dépôt for the ammunition of the trained bands, in 1682.

The town is pleasantly situated nearly in the centre of the county, and on the banks of the river Soar, over which are four bridges, named respectively North, West, Branston, and Bow bridges; the first a handsome structure erected in 1796, the others ancient buildings, recently repaired. The principal thoroughfare, extending from south to north, is upwards of a mile in length, and there are many other spacious streets: the houses, which, within the last half century, have been much improved, are chiefly built of brick and roofed with slate; the town is paved, lighted with gas, and supplied with water from a public conduit in the market-place, and from wells in various parts. A promenade, called the New Walk, which extends nearly three-quarters of a mile in length, in a south-eastern direction, was formed about the year 1785; the ground was given by the corporation, and laid out by subscription; it affords, in many parts, some pleasing views of the town, and of the hills of Charnwood Forest, which abound with beautiful scenery. In the environs several handsome villas have been recently erected. The town library, established by the corporation in 1632, consists chiefly of theological works. The public rooms, in Wellington-street, consist of a hall, a room used as a mechanics' institute, a newsroom, and other apartments. A new theatre was erected in 1837; and assemblies are held, during the winter, in a suite of rooms in a building originally erected for an hotel, and purchased by the county for the accommodation of the judges of the assize, and for the meetings of the county magistrates: the ball-room is elegantly painted by Reinagle, and lighted on assembly nights by eight splendid lustres, and branches held by statues, after designs by Bacon. A very handsome edifice has been recently erected in Belvoir-street as a general newsroom and library, at an expense of about £6000, from the designs of Mr. Flint; it contains a gallery used for the library, and committee-rooms, and apartments for the librarians. Races are held in September, on the south-east side of Leicester, where a grand stand has been erected, and every means adopted for the improvement of the course; and on the north-east side of the town is an extensive inclosed cricket-ground. An agricultural society, which has been established for many years, holds its meetings in October.

The staple manufacture, that of worsted and cotton hosiery, has been established for more than two centuries; the number of frames in the town and county is about 14,000, and the number of persons employed in the frame-work knitting, worsted-spinning, wool-combing, and dyeing, about 30,000. In addition to the manufacture of hose, of which a great quantity is exported, there are manufacturers of lace, cotton, thread, ropes, and twine, stocking-frames, needles, and pipes, and several woolstaplers. Situated on a great northern road, Leicester has every facility of land carriage to London, Manchester, Nottingham, Derby, and other towns; and in 1791 an act of parliament was obtained for opening a communication with the Loughborough canal, and through that with the various lines of navigation connected with the Trent, the effect of which has been to introduce the coal of Derbyshire by the cheaper conveyance of water carriage. The Leicester and Swannington Railway, principally for the conveyance of coal, granite, paving stones, and other articles from the collieries and quarries near Ashby-de-la-Zouch to Leicester, whence they are sent to London and other places, and also for a few passengers, was commenced under an act of parliament in 1830, empowering the company to raise a joint-stock capital of £140,000, and £35,000 by loan; the line was completed at an expense of £175,000, and was opened to the public in July, 1832. The most important means of communication, however, is that derived from one of the principal intermediate stations on the Midland-Counties' railway, established here on a very extensive scale with the waiting-rooms for passengers detached from the main line. The market, which is on Saturday, is particularly celebrated for the quality of the butchers' meat: the fairs, principally for horses, cattle, sheep, and cheese, are on Jan. 4th, March 2nd, the Saturday before Easter, May 12th, which lasts for three days, June 1st, July 5th, Aug. 1st, Sept. 13th, Oct. 10th (for three days), November 2nd, and December 8th.

Leicester is a BOROUGH by prescription. King John, in the first year of his reign, granted a charter, which was extended by succeeding sovereigns, and renewed, with all former privileges and immunities, in the 41st of Elizabeth, and by which the government was vested in a mayor, 24 aldermen, and 48 common-councilmen, assisted by a recorder, town-clerk, high bailiff, steward, chamberlain, and subordinate officers. The corporation, however, by the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, now consists of a mayor, 14 aldermen, and 42 councillors; the borough, which comprises 2126 acres, is divided into seven wards, the municipal and parliamentary boundaries being co-extensive, and the number of magistrates is 24. The freedom is inherited by all the sons of a freeman born after the father has taken up or been admitted to his freedom, and acquired by servitude: among the privileges are, exemption from toll in all the fairs of England, and the liberty of depasturing cattle in certain grounds near the town. The elective franchise was first exercised in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time the borough has returned two members to parliament; the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session for offences not capital; and a court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount, was formerly held by prescription, confirmed by charters of Elizabeth and James I.; the recorder is sole judge, but no court has been held for some years. There are petty-sessions at the Exchange every Monday and Friday; and one of the magistrates attends at the guildhall every morning for hearing night cases. This being the county town, the assizes and general quarter-sessions are held in it; and it is also the place of election for the southern division of the county. The guildhall is a building of rude character, of which the hall is embellished with portraits of Sir Thomas White, lord mayor of London, and founder of St. John's College, Oxford; and Sir John Vaughan, Knt., one of the judges of Her Majesty's court of exchequer, and late recorder of the borough. The county rooms, appropriated as the judges' lodgings, and to the weekly meetings of the county magistrates, were originally built by subscription as an hotel, and were purchased in 1819, under an act of parliament, for the use of the county; the building contains an elegant and spacious assembly-room. The court-house, for holding the assizes and quarter-sessions for the county, was formerly the great hall of the ancient castle. The borough gaol, nearly in the centre of the town, was originally the gaol for the county, but, on the erection of a new county gaol, was purchased by the borough magistrates, who have made considerable alterations and improvements. The county gaol, situated on a commanding eminence near the entrance to the town from Welford, was erected at an expense of £50,000; and the county house of correction was built about thirty years since.

The old borough, which comprised 325 acres, consisted of the PARISHES of All Saints, containing 4608;

St. Leonard, 466; St. Martin, 2889; and St. Nicholas, 1501; and parts of the parishes of St. Margaret and St. Mary, the former wholly containing 31,249, and the latter 8406 inhabitants. The living of All Saints is a discharged vicarage, with those of St. Clement's, St. Michael's, and St. Peter's united, the churches of which are demolished, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 5., St. Clement's and St. Michael's being not in charge; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the net income is £148. The church is an ancient structure, combining various styles, with a tower on the north side of the north aisle; the chancel is modern, but in various parts of the church are some fine old portions intermixed with later insertions; the interior contains a font of curious device, and some fine carving in wood. The living of St. Leonard's is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £23. 8. 6½.; net income, £40. The church was demolished during the parliamentary war, in 1645. The living of St. Margaret's is a vicarage, with the chapelry of Knighton; net income, £440; patron and appropriator, Prebendary of St. Margaret's in the Cathedral of Lincoln. The church is a beautiful structure, combining portions in the early, decorated, and later English styles, with a tower; the interior contains some wooden stalls and seats richly carved, and among the monuments is an alabaster tomb of Bishop Penny, previously abbot of the neighbouring monastery of St. Mary de Pratis, from which it was removed at the period of the Dissolution. In the churchyard is the tomb of Andrew, Lord Rollo, decorated with military trophies. The living of St. Martin's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £140. The church is a venerable cruciform structure, partly in the Anglo-Norman, early English, and later styles, with a tower rising from the centre, supported on four semi-circular arches, opening into the nave, chancel, and transepts; the lower part of the tower is in the Norman style, surmounted by a spire of later date. The interior was despoiled of its ornaments by the parliamentary troops, who converted it into barracks during their occupation of the town, but it has been restored with due regard to its ancient character; the chancel is decorated with three stone stalls under the south-east window, and it has a noble organ, built by Snetzler, and a fine painting of the Ascension, by Francesco Vanni, presented by Sir William Skeffington, Bart. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £221. The church is an ancient structure, combining almost every variety of style, from, perhaps, the Saxon to the worst period of the debased English; the tower, which is surmounted by a lofty spire, is situated at the west end of the south aisle, and detached from it; the spire was erected in 1783, at the expense of £300, in the place of one destroyed by lightning. On the south side of the old chancel are three fine Norman stalls, with double shafts and enriched mouldings; and on the south side of the Hungerford chantry, or present chancel, are three early English stalls, highly ornamented; the font is of curious and beautiful design, and the oak roofs, which are exquisitely carved, are in good preservation. The living of St. Nicholas is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £115. The church is in the early Norman style, with a tower between the nave and the chancel, and is said to have been partly built with the materials of a Roman temple, of which a considerable fragment still remains in a wall adjoining the churchyard. A district chapel, dedicated to St. George, was erected in the parish of St. Margaret, by grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, in 1826, at an expense of £14,964, from the designs of Mr. Parsons; it is a handsome edifice, in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire, the view of which from one of the principal streets has been obstructed by the injudicious erection of a schoolroom in the churchyard. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £160; patron, Vicar of St. Margaret's. Trinity church, erected at the expense of F. Turner, Esq., after a design by Mr. Sydney Smirke, is a neat structure: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Margaret's. Christchurch, recently built by subscription, is also a handsome edifice, and was consecrated in July, 1839. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Huntingdonians, Independents, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, and Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel; the last a good edifice, in the early English style.

The Free Grammar school was founded by Thomas Wigston, and was refounded, and a new school-house erected by the corporation, in 1575. There are two exhibitions of £6 per annum to Lincoln College, Oxford, established by Mr. Thomas Hayne, for boys of the school; an annuity of £4 per annum to be paid to two poor boys so long as they should continue in the school; and an exhibition of £6 per annum to Oxford or Cambridge, tenable for five years, founded by Henry, Earl of Huntingdon. Two proprietary schools, one called the Collegiate, and the other the Leicester Proprietary School, have been erected by subscription; the Collegiate, in the English style, is supported by members of the Established Church, and the Proprietary, of the Tuscan order, with a very fine portico, belongs to dissenters. A Green-coat charity school was founded by Gabriel Newton, alderman, and was rebuilt in 1808; and there are several national and other schools. The Old Trinity Hospital was founded in 1330, by Henry, Earl of Leicester and Lancaster, who endowed it originally for 50 infirm and aged men, and five women to attend on them, also for a master, four chaplains, and two clerks. In 1354, the foundation was greatly augmented by his son, Henry, Duke of Lancaster, who engrafted on it a collegiate church, or Collegium Novi Operis; and it was further extended by John of Gaunt, son-in-law of Duke Henry. The establishment eventually consisted of a dean, twelve prebendaries, thirteen vicars-choral, three clerks, six choristers, one verger, one hundred poor men, and ten nurses and other attendants. There are at present in it about ninety men and women. An hospital for a master, confrater, twelve aged men, and twelve aged women, all unmarried, was founded and dedicated to St. Ursula, in the latter part of the fifteenth century, by William Wigston, merchant-stapler, and mayor of Leicester, and others. The hospital of St. John the Baptist, founded in 1235, for a master, brethren, and sisters, was given by Queen Elizabeth to the corporation, it having been previously converted into a hall for wool; in the reign of James I. they placed in it six poor widows. An hospital for five aged widows was founded in 1703, by Mr. Bent, alderman of the borough; and in 1710, another was founded by Mr. Matthew Simons, for six aged widows. Almshouses in Vauxhall-street, founded and endowed by Miss Mason, for four women, were recently erected, at an expense of £363. The late John Johnson, Esq., erected, in 1792, five neat houses, which he called the Consanguinitarium, and intended as a residence for five of his needy relatives, assigning for its support an income of more than £60 per annum. The female asylum, in the New Works, was established in 1800, by the exertions of the late Rev. Thomas Robinson, for the maintenance, and instruction in household business, of sixteen orphan girls. The infirmary, at the southern extremity of the town, was erected in 1771, and is supported by subscription; the building, which is plain, consists of a centre and two wings; attached is a house of recovery from fever, or other contagious diseases, added in 1820. Adjoining the infirmary was formerly the county lunatic asylum, towards the erection and support of which Mrs. Topp bequeathed £1000, and Mrs. Ann Wigley £200; but this institution having become inadequate to the purpose for which it was established, a more capacious structure has been recently built by the county magistrates, on an eminence to the south-east of the town; it will accommodate about 100 patients, and the expense was defrayed, partly by subscription, and partly out of the county rates. Sir Thomas White bequeathed a portion of the rents of certain estates, which have since accumulated to upwards of £16,000, to be lent for nine years, without interest, in sums of £50, subsequently enlarged to £100, to the inhabitants of Leicester; and there are various other charitable bequests for distribution among the poor, amongst which is the produce of a grant, by Charles I., of 40 acres of land in the forest of Leicester. The union of Leicester comprises the whole of the town parishes, and the townships of New Works and Castle-View, and contains a population of 50,932.

Among the Monastic Establishments anciently existing here, was a collegiate church, founded long before the Conquest, within the precincts of the castle, and which was, with the city and the castle, destroyed in the wars during the reign of the Conqueror, and refounded in 1107, by Robert de Mellent, Earl of Leicester; the greater portion of its revenue was transferred to the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, but it continued, under the designation of St. Mary the Less, till the Dissolution, when the remaining part of it was valued at £24. 13. 11. The abbey of St. Mary de Pratis was founded in the year 1143, by Robert le Bossu, Earl of Leicester, for regular canons of the Augustine order, and dedicated to St. Mary; here that earl ended his days, and the establishment became possessed of great wealth, and was frequently visited by several of the kings of England and other illustrious personages, among whom was Cardinal Wolsey, who, lodging here on his route to London, after his disgrace, died within its walls, and was buried in the church: at the Dissolution its gross revenue was £1062. 0. 4 $\frac{3}{4}$; the remains consist chiefly of the outer walls, on which is an inscription curiously worked in bricks of different colours. In the north part of the town was an hospital for lepers, founded in the reign of Richard I., by William, son of Robert Blanchmains, Earl of Leicester. In the north-western part was a convent of Franciscan or Grey friars, founded in 1265, by Simon de Montfort, in the church of which was interred the body of Richard III., after his death at the battle of Bosworth Field. In an island in the Soar was a house of Black friars, founded in the reign of Henry III., and dedicated to St. Clement, by one of the earls of Leicester; and here was also a priory for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, dedicated to St. Catherine, which remained till the Dissolution. Of the Roman relics the most curious are, a tessellated pavement, found in a cellar nearly opposite the town prison, in 1675; another, discovered a few years since, in Jewry-Wall-street; and a millary, or Roman mile-stone, discovered in the year 1771, on the side of the Fosse-road leading from Leicester to Newark, in Nottinghamshire, and about two miles from the town. This stone, which has given rise to much archæological research, was removed to the town by the corporation, and is placed in Belgrave Gate, on a square pedestal, with a column above it, surmounted by a cross; from the inscription on it, it appears to have been erected in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian, and it is said to be the oldest that has been discovered in this country. About a quarter of a mile south of the infirmary are the ancient artificial embankments, called the Rawdykes, supposed also to be of Roman origin; and among smaller remains is an abundance of coins, of which it is supposed that a complete series might have been formed from Nero to Valentinian. Dr. Richard Farmer, the learned author of an essay on the learning and genius of Shakspeare, was a native of the town. Leicester gives the inferior title of Earl to Marquess Townsend; and the late T. W. Coke, Esq., of Holkham, in the county of Norfolk, was raised to the peerage by the title of Viscount Coke and Earl of Leicester, by patent of creation, dated August 12th, 1837.

LEICESTER-ABBEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 1 mile (N.) from Leicester; containing 22 inhabitants. It takes its name from the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, which was founded within its limits, and which is described in the article on LEICESTER.

LEICESTER-FOREST, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of BLABY, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER; containing 106 inhabitants.

LEICESTERSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the north-west by that of Derby, on the north by that of Nottingham, on the east by Lincoln and Rutland, on the south-east by Northampton, and on the south-west by Warwick. It lies between 52° 23' and 52° 58' (N. Lat.), and 0° 40' and 1° 37' (W. Lon.), and includes 804 square miles, or 514,560 statute acres. Within its limits are 44,774 inhabited houses, 3273 uninhabited, and 449 in the course of erection; and the population amounts to 215,867, of whom 105,616 are males, and 110,251 females. The county, which derives its name from the principal town, formed part of the territory of the Coritani, and, subsequently, of the Roman division of Britain called Flavia Cesariensis; under the Anglo-Saxons, it was a central portion of the powerful kingdom of Mercia. It suffered severely from the incursions of the Danes, who, landing on the eastern coast, laid waste the whole county as far as Leicester, which town, having finally fallen into their possession, became, on their peaceable establishment in this part of the kingdom, one of their five principal cities in England. Leicestershire was formerly included in the diocese of Lincoln, but under the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 77, it has been transferred to the diocese of Peterborough, in the province of Canterbury. It forms, exclusively of some peculiar jurisdictions, an arch-deaconry, comprising the deaneries of Akeley, Christianity, Framland, Gartree, Goscote, Guthlaxton, and Sparkenhoe, and containing 213 parishes. For civil purposes it is divided into the hundreds of Framland, Gartree, East Goscote, West Goscote, Guthlaxton, and Sparkenhoe. It contains the borough and market-town of Leicester; and the market-towns of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Market-Bosworth, Market-Harborough, Hinckley, Loughborough, Lutterworth, Melton-Mowbray, and Mountsorrel. Under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the county was formed into the northern and southern divisions, each sending two representatives to parliament; and two members are returned for the borough of Leicester. The county is included in the midland circuit, and the assizes and quarter-sessions are held at Leicester, where stands the county gaol.

The general SURFACE is a continuance of gently rising hills, with a few precipitous declivities, so that almost the whole is available for cultivation. The highest grounds are some of the summits of the Charnwood Forest hills, which consist of barren rocks, projecting abruptly above the surface, and composed of a kind of granite; and these peaks, though their elevation is not more than 800 or 900 feet above the level of the sea, command some of the most extensive and beautiful views in the kingdom. About 240,000 acres of land are under occasional tillage. A considerable quantity of wheat is grown, but barley is the favourite grain crop; and oats are cultivated to a great extent, on account of the number of horses bred and kept in the county. About half the inclosed land consists of permanent grass, and the natural meadows on the banks of the rivers and brooks are very numerous and extensive, and frequently of excellent quality. In various parts are good dairies which produce large quantities of cheese; and Stilton cheese, the richest and highest-priced thick cheese produced in Great Britain, is made in most of the villages about Melton-Mowbray: it obtained its name from the first maker of it, resident at Wymondham, near Melton-Mowbray, having supplied an inn at Stilton, where it first became generally known and esteemed. The county has long been distinguished for the improvement of every species of live stock. The Mineral Productions are, iron-stone, which is plentifully found on Ashby Wolds, and has been smelted and cast into pigs and utensils for various purposes, at the works by the side of the Ashby canal; lead-ore, which is found of a rich nature in the fissures of the limestone obtained at Staunton-Harold, and is smelted; coal, of which there are mines at Cole-Orton, the Lount, and Ashby Wolds; slate, which is raised in large quantities of a rather thick and heavy, but firm and durable, quality, at Swithland, to the east of Charnwood Forest; limestone, of which the Bredon quarries are excavated in an isolated rock of considerable extent, having a slight covering of earth, and of which there is some in extremely high request at Barrow-upon-Soar, producing the famous Barrow-lime; and freestone, which exists in most parts, as does also clay suitable for bricks. The red granite from the rocks at Mountsorrel furnishes a valuable material for macadamizing the roads. The principal Manufactures are those of woollen-yarn, worsted, and stockings, which prevail not only in Leicester, Hinckley, and other towns, but also in the principal villages throughout most parts of the county; indeed, the number of persons employed in trade here is to the agricultural class nearly as seven to four, and of these a very large proportion are employed in the manufacture of wool into stockings, principally at Leicester, Hinckley, and Loughborough, both for the London market and exportation. At Loughborough, Hinckley, and Ashby, hats are manufactured. The making of machine lace, introduced of late years, is carried on to a considerable extent, principally in the towns and neighbourhoods of Loughborough, Leicester, and Ashby; and at the two first are several malt-kilns. Cheese is a considerable article of exportation, it being computed that not less than 1500 tons are annually conveyed down the Trent, for the consumption of the metropolis and the navy.

The principal River is the Soar, which, with the aid of different artificial cuts, has been made navigable from the Trent, into which river it empties itself near Sawley in Derbyshire, up to several miles above Leicester, a distance of above twenty miles. The Ashby canal was first designed to communicate with the navigable channel of the Trent, below Burton, and with that view was constructed so as to be navigable for barges of sixty tons' burthen; but the money subscribed, amounting to £180,000, having been expended, the line from Ashby to the Trent, on which are a tunnel and several locks, was abandoned, and railways substituted on the high grounds. The canal is navigable from Ashby Wolds to the Coventry canal, in which it terminates, for boats of 24 tons' burthen, being such only as can float on the Coventry canal. The line of the Leicester navigation is down the valley of the Soar, to the Trent, being sometimes along the channel of the Soar, and at others carried from it by means of locks into a new channel, as before stated. The Melton canal is carried from the Leicester Soar navigation along the valley of the Wreke, to Melton-Mowbray, whence it has been continued to Oakham: the Grantham canal, from the Trent below Nottingham to Grantham, passes through the north-easternmost part of the county; and the Union canal, from the navigable channel of the Soar, near Leicester, was designed to pass by way of Market-Harborough, and join the Nene at Northampton, and also to communicate with the Grand Junction canal; but its progress towards its completion was arrested by unfavourable circumstances. The iron railways attached to the Ashby canal extend about twelve miles from that navigation, by the town of Ashby, to the Lount colliery, Cole-Orton, Ticknall, and the Cloud hill lime-works; they were constructed at an expense of £30,000, and along the line are various embankments and deep excavations, for the purpose of preserving the level, or an uniform ascent or descent, besides a tunnel about a quarter of a mile in length. The Midland-Counties' railway proceeds in a direct course nearly north from Rugby, and enters this county near Great Claybrook, whence it passes by the town of Leicester, near which is a small tunnel; after passing through another tunnel at Redhill, it is carried over the Trent by a beautiful viaduct of three iron arches, each 100 feet span, and branches off to Derby and Nottingham. The Leicester and Swannington railway is noticed in the article on Leicester, which see.

The Roman stations within or close to the limits of the county were, Rate at Leicester; Vernometum, on the northern border, supposed to have been at Willoughby; and Venones, near High Cross; besides which there was the celebrated station of Manduessedum, at Mancetter, on the borders of this county and Warwickshire. The principal remains of Roman buildings have been found at Leicester; and other miscellaneous Roman remains have been discovered at Rothley, Wanlip, Harborough, Burrow, and Catthorpe. The ancient Watling-street first touches Leicestershire at Dove bridge, on the Avon, whence it proceeds in a north-easterly direction towards the Anker, near Mancetter, where it quits for Warwickshire, after having formed the south-western boundary of the county for a distance of upwards of 20 miles. The Fosse-road from Lincolnshire, enters near the Roman station Vernometum, and joins the Watling-street at High Cross; its course may be distinctly traced, more particularly on the eastern side of the county, and near the village of Narborough. The Via Devana, from Colchester to Chester, enters near Cottingham, and joins the Fosse at Leicester, which, however, it soon leaves for Grooby, whence it proceeds by Ashby to Burton-upon-Trent; it is visible on a hill between the parishes of Cranoe and Glooston, and in different other parts of its course. Another ancient road, which the Rev. T. Leman, in his account of the Roman roads and stations in Leicestershire, calls the "Salt Way," and considers of British origin, entered the county from Lincolnshire, in its way to the salt-works at Droitwich, and is visible in some parts of its course over Charnwood Forest. The number of Religious houses, prior to the Dissolution, was thirty-one, including three colleges, six hospitals, three commanderies of the Knights Hospitallers, and one alien priory; the principal remains are those of the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, near Leicester, of Ulverscroft priory, and of Grace Dieu nunnery. There are but few remains of ancient castles; the chief are the picturesque ruins of the castellated mansion of Ashby, the most ancient portions of which are of the reign of Edward IV., and of Kirby Castle. Among the numerous elegant seats that adorn the county, the most distinguished are, Belvoir Castle, the seat of the Duke of Rutland, and Donnington Park, that of the Marquess of Hastings. There are medicinal springs at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Burton-Lazars, Dalby-on-the-Wolds, Gumley, Neville-Holt, Leicester, and Sapcote.

LEIGH, a tything, in the parish of WIMBORNE-MINSTER, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of BADBURY, Wimborne division of DORSET, 1 mile (E.) from Wimborne-Minster; containing 574 inhabitants. There was anciently a chapel here.

LEIGH, a chapelry, in the parish and hundred of YET-MINSTER, union of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Sherborne; containing 396 inhabitants.

LEIGH (ST. CLEMENT), a parish and sea-port, in the union and hundred of ROCHFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Rochford; containing 1271 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the bank of the river Thames, and includes an island called Leigh Marsh, and the eastern extremity of Canvey island; the grounds rise gradually from the river to a considerable elevation, commanding beautiful views of the surrounding country; and the variety of the scenery, and the numerous pleasant rides and walks, render the place a favourite resort during the summer for the company visiting Southend, in its immediate neighbourhood. A considerable trade in shrimps employs about 200 persons and nearly 100 boats; and a fair is held on the second Tuesday in May. A small port is formed here by a channel from the Thames towards South Benfleet; a custom-house has been erected, and vessels of 180 tons come up with coal to the quay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15; net income, £284; patron, Bishop of London. The church, situated on the summit of a hill, is a spacious and handsome structure, with a lofty tower, and contains some ancient monuments. Here is a meeting-house for Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by Lady Olivia B. Sparrow.

LEIGH (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of TEWKESBURY, partly in the Lower division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, but chiefly in the Lower division of that of DEERHURST, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Cheltenham; containing, with the hamlet of Evington, 489 inhabitants. The parish is situated in the vale of Gloucester; the surface is nearly level, but richly embellished with timber, of which oak and elm are the prevailing kinds; the soil is a blue clay, and the chief crops are wheat and beans; the pastures are rich, and the lands are watered by the river Severn, and intersected by the Coombe hill canal. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 3.; the patronage and impropriation belong to the Crown, and the net income of the incumbent is £247. The church is an ancient structure. A British and Foreign school has been established; and there are several bequests for distribution among the poor.

LEIGH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of SEVEN-OAKS, partly in the hundred of SOMERDEN, but chiefly in that of Codsheath, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Tonbridge; containing, with the hamlet of Hollanden, 1245 inhabitants. The parish, from various ancient records, appears to have been formerly of considerable importance, and to have included a portion of that of Penshurst. It comprises 4659a. 3r. 15p.; the soil is a retentive clay, with a substratum of sandstone rock; the prevailing timber is oak; about 150 acres are hop plantation, and about 70 orchard grounds. The manufacture of gunpowder is carried on in some mills belonging to Messrs. Burton. The river Medway flows through the parish, and the South-Eastern railway nearly bisects it, passing through an excavation to the extent of 513,420 cubic yards, cut through a stratum of hard marl, in the removal of every 1000 yards of which 100 lb. of gunpowder were employed; the soil has been used in forming the embankment of the river. The village is situated on the road from London to Penshurst; and a fair, chiefly for pleasure and pedlery, is held there on the 16th of June. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 9.; patron and incumbent, Rev. T. May; impropriators, Sir J. S. Sidney, Bart., and others. The great tithes have been commuted for £555, and the vicarial for £510. 15.; the glebe comprises three acres. The church, which contains some ancient tablets, had formerly a chantry, but it was suppressed by Edward VI. A national school is supported by subscription. There is a mineral spring possessing properties similar to, and even more powerful than, the water of Tonbridge Wells.

LEIGH (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 46 miles (S. S. E.) from Lancaster, and 197 (N. W.) from London; containing 22,229 inhabitants, and comprising the chapelries of Astley and Atherton, and the townships of Bedford, Pennington, Tyldesley with Shakerley, and West Leigh. The name of this place is pure Saxon, and synonymous with the English word Lea, a field or pasture. The manufactures of Lancashire are eminently indebted to the ingenuity of Thomas Highs, a reed-maker at this place, who, in 1764, constructed the first spinning-jenny, and, in 1767, invented the water-frame, afterwards improved and extensively introduced by Sir Richard Arkwright. The manufacture of cambrics, muslins, and fustians, is carried on, that of the first being the most considerable; and the general trade of the place has much improved of late years, chiefly in consequence of advantages derived from a branch of the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, which here forms a junction with the Leeds and Liverpool canal. One of the principal intermediate stations on the line of the Bolton and Leigh, and the Kenyon and Leigh Junction, railways, is also situated here. Coal and limestone are found, the latter of which, when burnt, is used in making a very excellent cement, impervious to water. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on April 24th and 25th, and on December 7th and 8th, for cattle, pigs, pedlery, &c. A court baron for the manor of Pennington, and a court for the manor of West Leigh, are held annually by their respective lords; and the petty-sessions for the Warrington division of the hundred of West Derby take place here. The parish comprises 11,969 acres, of which 2767 are arable, 8304 pasture, and 150 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9; net income, £271; patron, Lord Lilford. The church is an ancient stone edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and two side aisles, terminating in sepulchral chapels. There are chapels of ease at Astley and Atherton: in 1825, a church was erected by subscription, aided by a grant of the Commissioners, at Tyldesley, a handsome structure of stone, with a spire; and in 1840, a church was erected at Bedford. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, Swedenborgians, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school was endowed in 1655, by Piers Rancars, with a rent-charge of £5, which, with subsequent grants, produces an annual income of £25. The poor law union of Leigh comprises eight chapelries or townships, and contains a population of 26,588.

LEIGH, a hamlet, in the parish of ASTHALL, union of WITNEY, hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD; containing 191 inhabitants.

LEIGH, a tything, in the parish of PITMINSTER, union of TAUNTON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (S. S. W.)

from Taunton. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LEIGH, a tything, in the parish, liberty, and union of HAVANT, Fareham and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 547 inhabitants.

LEIGH (All Saints), a parish, in the union of UTTOXETER, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Uttoxeter; containing 1012 inhabitants. The parish, including the township of Field, comprises 7037a. 39p., of which about one-third is arable, and very little wood, though hedge-row timber is abundant; the surface is varied, the soil clay, and the scenery generally of pleasing character. It is intersected by the river Blithe. Park Hall, an ancient mansion, is surrounded by a moat. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 0. 5., and in the gift of Lord Bagot: the tithes have been commuted for £688. 15., and the glebe comprises $69\frac{1}{2}$ acres, with a house. The church is an ancient cruciform structure, mostly in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower rising from the centre; the south aisle has three monuments to the Ashenhurst family, and an altar-tomb, of the date 1523, to Sir John and Lady Aston, with their recumbent effigies. A free school was endowed by Stephen Spencer, in 1620, with lands now producing about £72. 15. per annum; and other schools are supported by W. Evans, Esq.

LEIGH (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union, and First division of the hundred, of REIGATE, E. division of SURREY, 3 miles (S. W.) from Reigate; containing 495 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 2988a. 1r. 23p., of which 1965 acres are arable, 504 meadow and pasture, and 116 woodland. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Dendy family; net income, £146. The church is in the early English style; on the floor of the chancel are several figures, scrolls, and shields in brass, principally memorials of the Arderne family.

LEIGH, a chapelry, in the parish of ASHTON-KEYNES, union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Cricklade and N. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Cricklade; containing 299 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £280, and there is a glebe of above 45 acres.

LEIGH, a township, in the parish and hundred of WESTBURY, union of WESTBURY and WHORLWELSDOWN, Westbury and S. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS; containing 1380 inhabitants.

LEIGH (St. Edburgh), a parish, in the union of MARTLEY, Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Worcester; containing, with the chapelry of Bransford, 2011 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 6180 acres, of which the surface is finely varied; it is situated on the right bank of the river Teame, and intersected by the road from Worcester to Hereford. The living is a rectory and vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 9. 4½.; patron and impropiator (except of one hamlet), Earl Somers: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £695, and the rectorial for £330, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is an ancient structure, chiefly in the Norman style, with later details, and contains a monument to Sir Walter Devereux. There is a chapel of ease at Bransford. The Huntingtonians and Wesleyans have places of worship; and an income of £59, arising from bequests, is appropriated to the support of a school, and other charitable purposes.

LEIGH, ABBOT'S (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of PORTBURY, E. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Bristol; containing 366 inhabitants. This place formerly belonged to the abbot of St. Augustine in Bristol, from which circumstance it derived its name. After the battle of Worcester, Charles II. was concealed in the old manor-house, which has since been replaced by an elegant mansion called Leigh Court, commanding fine views of the Bristol Channel, Gloucestershire, and the Welsh hills. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Bedminster: the great tithes, which belong to St. Mary's College, Winchester, have been commuted for £75, and the small tithes for a like sum. A girls' school is supported by Mrs. Miles.

LEIGH-DE-LA-MERE (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM; Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Chippenham; containing 113 inhabitants, and consisting of 1400 acres by computation. At this place Alfred encamped on the night before his attack upon the Danes at Edindon; and near a field, called Courtfield, is a garden surrounded by a moat, supposed to be the site of a palace of one of the Saxon kings. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of Joseph Neild, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £236, and the glebe comprises 47 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice. The living was held by a brother of Bishop Latimer.

LEIGH, HIGH, CHESTER.—See LEGH, HIGH.

LEIGH, LITTLE, a chapelry, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of NORTHWICH, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Northwich; containing 387 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes in the vicinity. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £125; patron, Vicar of Great Budworth. Rent-charges, as commutations for the tithes, have been awarded, amounting to £131. 10., of which £1. 10. are payable to an impropiator, £10 to the vicar, and £120 to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford. The chapel is an ancient building, repaired in 1664. Here is a place of worship for Baptists.

LEIGH, NORTH, a parish, in the union of HONITON, hundred of COLYTON, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Colyton; containing 252 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 9. 7., and in the gift of James Jenkins, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £169. 10. A small Sunday school was endowed by the late Rev. Mr. How.

LEIGH, NORTH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of WITNEY, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Witney; containing 617 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 2., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £147; impropiators, Governors of Bridewell Hospital. The church, an ancient structure, contains a chantry chapel with some fragments of painted glass, and a monument to William Lenthall, Esq., who was father of the speaker of the house of commons in the reign of Charles I., and died in 1596; also two recumbent figures in alabaster, the one a knight, in complete armour, and the other a female sumptuously attired, the effigies of Sir William Wilcote and his lady. There are, besides, many handsome monuments to the Perrot family, of whose mansion near the church only the dove-cote and some of the offices are remaining, mantled with ivy. About half a mile to the south of the Akeman-street, which passes by the northern boundary of the parish, the remains of a Roman villa were found in 1813.

LEIGH, SOUTH (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of HONITON, hundred of COLYTON, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Colyton; containing 357 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 8. 9., and in the gift of Charles Gordon, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £220, and there are 30 acres of glebe. The Rev. James How, in 1816, gave £100 stock towards the support of a Sunday school; and the Rev. Thomas How gave the same sum for providing clothing for the poor. Near Wiscombe House is Blackbury Castle, one of the most perfect Roman encampments in the county; and immediately opposite to it is a long line of intrenchments, called Kingsdown. There are also numerous barrows.

LEIGH, SOUTH, a chapelry, in the parish of STANTON-HARCOURT, union of WITNEY, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Witney; containing 326 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. James.

LEIGH-UPON-MENDIP (ST. GILES), a parish, in the union of FROME, hundred of MELLS and LEIGH, E. division of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Frome; containing 619 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the rectory of Mells.

LEIGH, WEST (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of FREMINGTON, Braunton and N. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Bideford; containing 526 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road to Barnstaple, comprises by computation 2300 acres. Many of the females are employed in glove-making, for the manufacturers of Torrington. Stone of excellent quality for building is quarried extensively, and can be conveyed by the river Torridge, which flows in a direction parallel with the road, and is navigable for vessels of 300 tons' burthen to Bideford. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 1.; net income, £159; patrons, Dean and Chapter of Exeter; impropiator, R. N. Incedon, Esq.: the glebe comprises 45 acres. The church is an ancient structure, containing some handsome marble monuments to the Cleveland and Willett families; many of the old oak seats, elaborately carved, are still preserved. A school is supported by the vicar and others.

LEIGH, WEST, a township, in the parish and union of LEIGH, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Leigh, near the road to the town of Wigan; containing 3005 inhabitants.

LEIGH-WOOLEY a tything, in the parish of GREAT BRADFORD, union and hundred of BRADFORD, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS; containing 1511 inhabitants.

LEIGHLAND, a chapelry, in the parish of OLD CLEEVE, union of WILLITON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, W. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Watchet. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £40; patron, Vicar of Old Cleeve. The chapel is dedicated to St. Giles.

LEIGHS, GREAT (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CHELMSFORD, partly in the hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division, and partly in that of WITTHAM, N. division, of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Braintree; containing, with the hamlet of Chatley, 765 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road from London to Norwich, and comprises about 3000 acres of land, formerly in pasture, from which circumstance it is supposed to have derived its name; the soil is various, consisting in some parts of hard gravel, and in others of a sandy loam of tolerable fertility. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 7. 1., and in the patronage of Lincoln College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £865. The church is a very ancient edifice, with a round tower of flint and stone, surmounted by an octangular spire of wood. Various benefactions have been made for the benefit of the poor. On the side of the road from Braintree to Chelmsford was formerly a hermitage, now converted into an inn.

LEIGHS, LITTLE (St. John the Evangelist), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Braintree; containing 182 inhabitants. A priory of Black canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. John the Evangelist, was founded here in the reign of Henry III., the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was estimated at £141. 14. 8.: the gate-house, which still remains, is in the later English style. The parish comprises about 500 acres of land, of which the soil is various, but the predominating character a sandy loam resting on a substratum of clay, in many parts very fertile. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the gift of Sir S. Stewart: the tithes have been commuted for £380, and the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church, which is about half a mile from the road to Braintree, is a small edifice with a shingled spire, and contains some ancient monuments.

LEIGHTERTON, with Boxwell, a parish, in the union of TETBURY, Upper division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S-ASH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Tetbury; containing 334 inhabitants. There are parochial churches at Leighton and Boxwell, but the two places are consolidated both as regards ecclesiastical and civil affairs.

LEIGHTON, a township, in the parish, union, and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Nantwich; containing 237 inhabitants.

LEIGHTON, a township, in the parish of NESTON, union, and Higher division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 1 mile (N. E.) from Parkgate; containing 374 inhabitants.

LEIGHTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, union and county of HUNTINGDON, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Huntingdon; containing 448 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 3000 acres, of which about one-half is arable, and the remainder, with the exception of 30 acres of woodland, meadow and pasture; the soil is chiefly a stiff clay. A cattle-fair is held on the 1st of May. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Leighton in the Cathedral of Lincoln, valued in the king's books at £7; net income, £90: the glebe comprises 70 acres. The church, which had fallen into a state of ruinous dilapidation, was rebuilt in 1626, by the patron, and is a neat edifice, containing 300 sittings, of which nearly all are free. A national school-house has been built by the proprietor of the parish. Some remains exist of an ancient mansion belonging to the Clifton family. There is a chalybeate spring, formerly in high repute, but now not much noticed.

LEIGHTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Much Wenlock; containing 403 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 6.; net income, £218; patron and incumbent, Rev. Robert Maddock; impropiator, Thomas Kennerley, Esq., by whom a small girls' school is supported.

LEIGHTON-BUZZARD (All Saints), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD; comprising the chapelrys of Billington, Eggington, Heath with Reach, and Standbridge; and containing 6053 inhabitants, of whom 3965 are in the town, 20 miles (W. S. W.) from Bedford, and 42 (N. W.) from London. The adjunct to the name is either derived from Bosard, the name of a family in the county, who were knights of the shire in the reign of Edward III., or from Beau desert, the prevailing opinion being in favour of the latter. It is believed to be the Lygean burgh of the Saxon Chronicle, which was taken from the ancient Britons in 571, by Cuthwulph, the brother of Ceawlin, King of Wessex. The town is situated on the eastern bank of the river Ouse, and consists of one wide street, branching off to the right and left at its upper extremity; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. Near the market-house is an elegant cross of pentagonal form, in the later English style, said to have been erected more than 500 years; the entire height, from the base to the top of the vane, is 38 feet; the upper story is divided into five niches, each of which contains a statue. A considerable trade is carried on in timber, iron, lime, brick, corn, &c.; and several females are employed in making lace and straw-plat. The Grand Junction canal, which passes near the town, and is navigable for vessels of 80 tons, affords the means of communication with the northern counties; and at a short distance on the western side of the Ouse is a station of the London and Birmingham railway, which here runs through a slightly curved tunnel 272 yards in length. The market, which is one of the oldest in the county, is on Tuesday, and is amply supplied with cattle, corn (which is toll free), lace, straw-plat, &c. Fairs are held on February 5th, the second Tuesday in April, Whit-Tuesday, July 26th, October 24th, and the second Tuesday in December, the first of which is remarkable for an extensive sale of horses. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who meet on the market-day, in a room over the market-house; and courts leet and baron are held at Whitsuntide and Michaelmas, by the lessee of the manor, under the Dean and Canons of Windsor.

The parish comprises about 8990 acres, of which 2355*a.* 2*r.* 28*p.* are in the township of Leighton, including 170 common or waste: an act for inclosing lands was passed in 1843. The LIVING is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Standbridge annexed, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Leighton-Buzzard in the Cathedral of Lincoln (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £15; net income of the two, £193. The church, which was formerly collegiate, is a large cruciform structure, principally in the early English style, with various additions and insertions of a later character, and has north, south, and west porches, together with a fine massive tower, surmounted by an octagonal stone spire, rising from the intersection; the western door is a curious specimen of iron-work; within the edifice are several ancient monuments, and a portion of good screen-work. There are chapels in each of the four hamlets of the parish; and the Baptists, Society of Friends, and Wesleyans, have meeting-houses. A Lancasterian school is supported by subscription, and a smaller one by the lord of the manor. In 1630, almshouses for eight women were founded and endowed by Edward Wilkes, Esq., and an additional endowment was bequeathed by Matthew Wilkes, Esq., in 1692; the estates belonging to the charity produce about £200 per annum. The poor law union of Leighton-Buzzard comprises 15 parishes or places, 10 of which are in the county of Buckingham, and 5 in that of Bedford; and contains a population of 13,945. In the time of Henry II. there was an alien priory at Grovebury, in the parish, subordinate to the abbey of Fontevrault, in Normandy; also a house of Cistercian monks, a cell to Woburn Abbey. About half a mile from the town are the remains of an extensive circular camp.

LEINTHALL, EARLS, a chapelry, in the parish of AYMESTREY, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (S. W.) from Ludlow; containing 170 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £64; patron, Vicar of Aymestrey. The chapel is dedicated to St. Andrew. A charity school has a small endowment; and there is an almshouse.

LEINTHALL-STARKES (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of LUDLOW, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Ludlow; containing 147 inhabitants. The parish consists of 993 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron, Sir W. R. Boughton, Bart.; appropriator, Bishop of Hereford. A school is endowed with £14 per annum, the bequest of Thomas Allen, Esq., in 1704.

LEINTWARDINE (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of LUDLOW, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD; including the townships of Brakes, Heath with Jay, Kington, Leintwardine, Marlow, Walford with Letton and Newton, Whitton with Tripleton, and Adforton with Stanway, Paytoe, and Grange; and containing 1568 inhabitants, of whom 454 are in the township of Leintwardine, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Ludlow. The parish is situated at the northern extremity of the county, where it borders on Shropshire, and near the confluence of the Teme and the Clun; and, from the quantity of fine fish, particularly graylings, with which these rivers abound, it is much resorted to as a fishing-place. It comprises about 8000 acres, and is intersected by the road from Presteign to Ludlow. There are quarries of limestone. A fair is held on the 4th of April. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 15. 8.; net income, £180; patron and impropiator, Earl of Oxford. The church is a large structure, once famous for a profusion of stained glass, of which the windows still display some beautiful fragments, representing crowns, lions, fleurs-de-lis, the arms of Mortimer, &c. The Right Hon. Robert Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, founded a free school, in the reign of Anne, and endowed it with land now producing about £36 per annum; and Salwey Cockram, Esq., in 1774, bequeathed the interest on £100, for instruction. The ancient forest of Mocktree, which has long been disafforested, is in the parish, and forms part of the demesne of Downton Castle.

LEIRE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Lutterworth; containing 406 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1074*a.* 2*r.* 18*p.*; the soil is loamy; about two-thirds are pasture, and the remainder arable, and the lands are watered by a small rivulet called the Soar. The Midland-Counties' railway passes through the parish, in which an excavation has been made, to facilitate its progress, of more than 600,000 yards in length, and 62 feet in depth, and also an embankment 40 feet in height, and containing 430,000 cubic yards; 3700 men, 370 horses, two locomotive engines, and one fixed engine, were all employed in the construction at the same time. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 9½.; net income, £292; patron, Lord de Grey. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1779; the glebe comprises 143 acres. The church is a neat ancient structure. The school-house was built in 1814, in commemoration of the peace, and the rent of a small meadow is paid to the master; from the same fund £6. 10. are distributed in clothing, and £10. 10. in blankets, to the poor.

LEISTON (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Saxmundham; containing, with the hamlet of Sizewell, 1177 inhabitants. This place was the seat of a monastery of Præmonstratensian canons, founded in 1182, and endowed by Ranulph de Glanville, in honour of the Virgin Mary; the establishment continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £181. 17. 1½.; there are considerable remains. The parish is bounded on the east by the North Sea, and comprises 4893 acres; the surface is varied, and the scenery of pleasing character. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the alternate patronage of Christ's Hospital and the Haberdashers' Company, London; net income, £376. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £435, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. Two schools are supported by private charity.

LELANT, UNY (ST. EWNY), a parish, in the union of PENZANCE, W. division of the hundred of PENWITH and of the county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (S. E.) from St. Ives; containing 2012 inhabitants. This place is bounded on the north by St. Ives' bay, and on the east by Hayle harbour and river; and nearly opposite to the church, when the tide is out, carriages can cross to St. Ives, by Hayle, from Truro and the east, thus saving a distance of several miles. The parish comprises by computation 3274 acres; the soil near the sea-shore is sand, resting upon a substratum of granite, which abounds throughout, and forms the substance of the various hills. Tin is abundant, and within the parish are the mines of Wheal Reeth and Wheal Speed, both in operation; a species of fine yellow clay, also, is found. A fair for cattle is held on August 15th. The living is a vicarage, with those of St. Ives and Towednack annexed, valued in the king's books at £22. 11. 10½.; net income, £441; patron, Bishop of Exeter; impropiator, W. Praed, Esq. The impropriate tithes of Uny-Lelant have been commuted for £250, and the vicarial for £205; there are 9 acres of glebe. The church is surrounded by banks of sand: in the churchyard, and on the outside of it, are ancient crosses. There are two places of worship for Wesleyans, and a national school.

LELLEY, a township, in the parish of PRESTON, union of SKIRLAUGH, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Hull; containing 136 inhabitants. This place has always been attached to the seignior of Holderness, as a member of the manor of Burstwick. It comprises about 800 acres, belonging to several proprietors: the hamlet is situated on the road between Preston and Humbleton, and about two miles to the north-east of the former village. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1769.

LEMINGTON, a village, chiefly in the township of SUGLEY, but partly in that of NEWBURN-HALL, parish of NEWBURN, union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (W.) from Newcastle. It is a populous place, situated on the north bank of the Tyne river, and contains the extensive works of the Tyne Iron Company for the manufacture of pig and bar iron, castings of all kinds, &c.; also the large crown-glass works of Messrs. Joseph Lamb and Company; and three staiths where coal from the Wylam and Walbottle collieries is put into keels, to be shipped at Newcastle and Shields. Vessels of 40 or 50 tons' burthen can lie alongside, and every facility is afforded for the conveyance of merchandise. Lemington House stands at the foot of a fine eminence on the west side of the village, and is the residence of Harrison Colbeck, Esq.

LEMINGTON, LOWER, a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Upper division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Moreton-in-the-Marsh; containing 53 inhabitants. The parish comprises 786a. 3r. 24p.: the railway from Moreton to Stratford passes through it. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £45; patron and impropiator, Lord Redesdale. The church is a very small structure. Two closes, producing £12 per annum, bequeathed by Dr. Juxon, Archbishop of Canterbury, and £146. 3. 1. three per cents., by his descendant, Susanna, Dowager Countess Fane, producing £4. 6. 2. per annum, are appropriated to the poor. The ancient Fosse-way passes through this place, which, from the coins frequently discovered, seems to have been a Roman station.

LEMMINGTON, a township, in the parish of EDLINGHAM, union of ALNWICK, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Alnwick; containing 125 inhabitants. It comprises about 2060 acres, the whole of which, with the exception of 300 acres of moor, and 70 of wood, are arable land, the property of William Pawson, Esq., of Shawdon; the surface is undulated, and the scenery very pleasing, embracing a fine view of the rich vale of Whittingham, watered by the Lemmington burn. Good freestone is wrought, and there is a land-sale colliery, of which the produce is of middling quality. The Hall, a fine modern mansion of hewn freestone, is beautifully situated, and surrounded by plantations.

LENBOROUGH, a hamlet, in the parish, union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (S.) from Buckingham; containing 56 inhabitants.

LENCH, ATCH, a hamlet, in the parish of CHURCH-LENCH, union of EVESHAM, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 5½ miles (N.) from Evesham; containing 82 inhabitants. It is situated on the borders of Warwickshire, and comprises 656 acres.

LENCH, CHURCH, a parish, in the union of EVESHAM, partly in the Lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, and partly in the Upper division of that of HALFESHIRE, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Evesham; containing, with the hamlets of Atch-Lench, and Sheriff's-Lench, 393 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the borders of Warwickshire, and comprises 2530 acres, of which 757 are in the township of Church-Lench. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £117. 1. 6.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 75 acres. The Baptists have a place of worship.

LENCH, ROUSE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of EVESHAM, Middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Evesham; containing, with the hamlet of Radford, 280 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the borders of Warwickshire, and comprises 1431a. 2r. 6p.; the surface is varied; the soil in the higher grounds is a rich loam, and in the lower a marl; the substratum is clay, used for brick-making, for which there is a kiln. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 0. 5.; net income, £346; patron, Sir W. E. R. Boughton, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1778; the glebe comprises 299 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the Norman style, of which it displays some interesting details; it contains some monuments to the Rouse family.

LENCH, SHERIFF'S, a hamlet, in the parish of CHURCH-LENCH, union of EVESHAM, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 4½ miles (N. by W.) from Evesham; containing 83 inhabitants. It consists of 1117 acres of rather an inferior quality of soil, lying on the borders of Warwickshire.

LENCH-WICK, a chapelry, in the parish of NORTON, union of EVESHAM, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 2½ miles (N.) from Evesham; containing 162 inhabitants. The chapel, which was dedicated to St. Michael, has been demolished.

LENHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBORNE, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Maidstone; containing 2214 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from London to Folkestone, and comprises 6948a. 2r. 1p., of which 3497 acres are arable, 1825 pasture, 800 woodland, 160 hop plantations, and 46 garden-ground. There are quarries of Kentish rag-stone, which is burnt as a substitute for lime, and is also used for building, and repairing the roads. Fairs for horses and cattle are held on the 6th of June and 23rd of October. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 15. 2½.; patron, T. F. Best, Esq.; impropriator, G. Douglas, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £1205, and the vicarial for £670; the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church is a handsome structure, with a western tower, and contains sixteen ancient stalls, a stone confessional, and other relics of antiquity. There is a place of worship for Independents. John Foord, in 1766, founded a school, and endowed it with £300, now applied in aid of a national school. In 1622, Anthony Honeywood, Esq., erected and endowed six almshouses for widows.

LENTON (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of RADFORD, S. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Nottingham; containing 4467 inhabitants. This place was granted by William the Conqueror to his son William Peveril, who, in the reign of Henry I., founded a Cluniac priory here, in honour of the Holy Trinity, which, being subordinate to the abbey of Cluny, was, on the suppression of the alien priories, made denizen, and continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £417. 19. 3., and in the 5th of Elizabeth the site and remains were granted to John Harrington. The parish, which takes its name from the small river Leen, is beautifully situated in the vale of that river, near its confluence with the Trent, and comprises 5970 acres, of which 3409 are in Bestwood Park, the property of the Duke of St. Alban's, a detached portion of the parish five miles distant from the village of Lenton, and 261 at Isen-Green, nearly two miles distant; the two last portions are chiefly arable, and the lands in Lenton are principally rich meadows, with some good corn land, and several acres of garden-ground. The substratum contains coal of good quality, of which a seam five feet in thickness is now being worked by Lord Middleton, whose handsome seat, Wolaton Hall, is in the parish.

The village is spacious and well built, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of lace, but there are also a large bleaching establishment, a starch manufactory, a leather factory, two steam flour-mills, two others driven by water, and two extensive malting establishments. The Nottingham and Cromford canal passes through the village, and is here joined by a cut called the Trent navigation, on which are some small wharfs; and the Midland-Counties' railway runs for nearly a mile and a half through the parish. Fairs for cattle are held on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week, and November 11th. The Peveril court, of which the jurisdiction extends over parts of the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Stafford, and which was granted by charter of William the Conqueror, and confirmed by charters of Charles II. and Queen Anne, is held here every Tuesday, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £50, under the superintendence of a steward, deputy steward, judge, prothonotary, and capital bailiff; and attached to it is a prison for the confinement of debtors. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 2. 5½.; net income, £150, chiefly from land commuted for tithes in 1767 and 1796; patron and impropriator, the Crown. The church, a very ancient structure, formerly belonging to an hospital dedicated to St. Anthony, contains 200 sittings. An additional church, of which the first stone was laid in June, 1841, has been erected at an expense of £5000, principally contributed by Francis Wright, Esq., of Lenton Hall, a handsome seat in the parish, and his family; it is a noble structure in the later English style, and has 900 sittings. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. A commodious national school has been built at a cost of £2000, almost exclusively by Mr. Wright; and an infant school has been erected, and is supported by the Misses Wright, of Lenton Firs. There are scarcely any vestiges of the ancient priory, but several stone coffins, a curious Norman font, a crucifix, and some other relics have been dug out of the ruins.

LEOMINSTER (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD; comprising the borough of Leominster, which has separate jurisdiction; and containing, with the townships of Brierley, Broadward, Cholstrey, Eaton, Hide with Wintercott, Ivington, Newtown, Stagbatch, Stretford with Henner, and Wharton, 4916 inhabitants, of whom 3892 are in the borough, 13½ miles (N.) from Hereford, and 137 (W. N. W.) from London. This place, according to Leland, partly derives its name from a minster, or monastery, founded here about 660, by Merwald, King of West Mercia, who is also said to have had a castle, or palace, about half a mile eastward of the town. A fortress was standing on the same spot in 1055, when it was seized by the Welsh chieftains, and fortified. At the time of the Norman survey, the manor, with its appurtenances, was assigned by Edward the Confessor to his queen, Editha; and in the reign of William Rufus, the fortifications were strengthened, to secure it against the incursions of the Welsh. In the reign of John, the town, priory, and church, were plundered and burned by William de Breos, Lord of Brecknock; and in the time of Henry IV. it was in the possession of Owain Glyndwr, after he had defeated the Earl of March. In the next century, the inhabitants of the town took a decisive part in the establishment of Mary on the throne, for which service she granted them a charter of incorporation, in the year 1554. The monastery founded by Merwald having been destroyed by the Danes, a college of prebendaries, and, subsequently, an abbey of nuns, were established; but these institutions were destroyed previously to the time of Edward I., who endowed the abbey of Reading with the monastery of Leominster, to which it afterwards became a cell: its revenue, at the Dissolution, was £660. 16. 8.

The town is situated in a rich and fertile valley on the banks of the river Lugg, which bounds it on the north and east; the Kenwater and Pinsley, two smaller streams, pass through the town itself, and three other rivulets within half a mile. The streets are paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water from springs; several of the houses are in the ancient style of timber and brick, the beams being painted black, and ornamented with grotesque carvings. There are a public reading-room, or subscription library, and a theatre. Near the town is a good race-course, where races take place about the end of August, and an agricultural society holds its meetings here. The manufactures chiefly consist of gloves and flannel, both on the decline: the wool produced in the neighbourhood is excellent, and the cider and hops are in high estimation. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on Feb. 13th, the Tuesday after Mid-Lent Sunday, May 2nd, July 10th, Sept. 4th, and Nov. 8th; besides which, there is a great market on the Friday after Dec. 11th. A neat market-house, for the sale of grain, was erected in 1803. The CHARTER of incorporation granted by Queen Mary was confirmed and extended by several subsequent sovereigns, who vested the government in a bailiff, chief steward, recorder, and 24 capital burgesses, with a chamberlain, town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and other officers. The borough is now, however, under the controul of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, elected agreeably to the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, and the number of magistrates is six. The town has sent two members to parliament since the 23rd of Edward I.: the right of election was formerly vested in the bailiff, capital burgesses, and other inhabitants paying scot and lot, in number about 734; but, by the act of the 2nd and 3rd of William IV., cap. 64, the limits of the ancient borough were enlarged, so as to include, for elective purposes, the £10 householders of the entire parish. The mayor is returning officer. A court of record is held for the trial of causes every Monday, the proceedings in which have been assimilated to those of the superior courts at Westminster. Petty-sessions for the Lower division of the hundred of Wolphy take place here; and there is a court leet annually. The town-hall, or butter-cross, was built in 1633, and is a singular edifice of timber and brick, supported by curiously carved pillars of oak. A gaol was erected in 1750.

The parish extends over 7284 acres, of which 784 are in the ancient borough. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £230. The church is a spacious and irregular structure, exhibiting specimens of every style of Norman and English architecture; the tower at the north-west angle, is of Norman character at the base, and of a later style in the upper stages; the western doorway, which is extremely beautiful, is ornamented with pillars and receding arch mouldings. The windows are in the decorated and later English styles; the massive pillars in the north aisle, supporting round arches surmounted by Norman arcades, are particularly curious. The south side, which is modern, is appropriated to the performance of divine service; the altar-piece is a painting of the Last Supper, from Rubens. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Moravians, and Unitarians. A free grammar school, founded by Queen Mary, is partly supported by an endowment of £20 per annum; and there is a national school. An almshouse for four widows was founded and endowed by Hester Clark, in 1735. The poor law union of Leominster comprises 25 parishes or places, and contains a population of 14,393. This place confers the title of baron upon the Earl of Pomfret, who is styled Baron Lempster, that having been the ancient name of the town.

LEOMINSTER (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the hundred of POLING, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Arundel; containing, with the tything of Warningcamp, anciently a chapelry, 785 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Worthing to Portsmouth, viâ Arundel, and bounded on the west by the river Arun, was the seat of a priory of Benedictine nuns, established by Roger de Mortimer, Earl of Arundel, in the reign of William the Conqueror, which, on the suppression of alien priories, was granted to Eton College; and at Pynham de Calceto, or the Causeway, a priory of Black canons was founded by Adeliza, second wife of Henry I., which continued till the Dissolution, when its revenues, amounting to £43, were given to Cardinal Wolsey, for the endowment of his intended colleges. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College (to whom the impropriation belongs), on the nomination of the Bishop of Chichester: the great tithes have been commuted for £375, and the vicarial for £350; the impropriate glebe comprises 5 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, with a lofty square embattled tower. Richard Wyatt, Esq., of Court Wyche, in 1822, bequeathed £5000 three per cents., to be applied to the erection and endowment of a school after the death of his lady, which took place in 1839. There is a chalybeate spring on the Causeway Hill.

LEONARD, ST., a chapelry, in the parish of ASTON-CLINTON, union and hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Wendover; containing 178 inhabitants. The living is a donative; net income, £38; patrons and impropiators, Sir J. D. King, Bart., and others, as trustees. The chapel is endowed with lands producing £170 per annum.

LEONARD, ST., a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of WONFORD, Wonford and S. divisions of DEVON, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S. E.) from Exeter; containing 1129 inhabitants. Here is an institution for deaf and dumb children for the four western counties. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 19. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Sir Thomas Baring, Bart.; the tithes have been commuted for £162, and the glebe contains 2 acres. In the churchyard was formerly a hermitage. The mansion called Mount Radford, erected in the sixteenth century, was garrisoned during the parliamentary war.

LEONARD'S, ST., ON SEA, a parish, in the union of HASTINGS, chiefly in the hundred of BALDSLOW, but having a detached portion adjoining the town of WINCHELSEA, in the hundred of GUESTLING, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Hastings, and 62 (S. E. by S.) from London; containing 768 inhabitants. This place is situated on a most beautiful bay on the south coast, screened from the northern and eastern gales by lofty cliffs, of which parts have been cut away at an incredible expense, to allow for the site of this interesting town, which was commenced in 1828, by the late James Burton, Esq., and since that period has become a fashionable and well-frequented watering-place. A range of buildings facing the sea, called the Marino, in a simple style of Grecian architecture, extends for nearly three-quarters of a mile, with a sea-wall and fine esplanade in front, along which is continued the high road from Dover, through Hastings, to Eastbourne and Brighton. In the centre of the esplanade is an elegant edifice, containing the Royal-baths, with refreshment-rooms, and a library with a reading and news room, a post-office, and a bank; and opposite to this range, is the Royal Victoria and St. Leonard's hotel, which has a handsome frontage of nearly 200 yards in length, commanding a fine view of the sea, and containing hot and cold baths, with every accommodation for families and visitors. There are also the Conqueror's and the Harold hotels, both liberally patronised. In addition to the lines of building, are numerous pleasing villas in detached situations; and in a natural ravine of considerable extent are the subscription gardens, tastefully laid out, and abounding with shrubs and plants of luxurious vegetation; in the grounds is a large flat stone, called the Conqueror's table, on which William I. is said to have dined, on his landing near Pevensey. Between the subscription gardens and the hotel are the assembly-rooms, a handsome structure, with a portico of the Grecian-Doric order at each extremity; the ball-room is nearly 70 feet in length, of proportionate breadth, and 30 feet high, and attached to it are card and billiard rooms. A society for the practice of archery, designated the Queen's St. Leonard's Archers, hold occasional meetings on a ground tastefully embellished, and on the 17th of August contest for a prize given by Her Majesty. At the eastern entrance of the town is an elegant archway of the Doric order, and near it are some good houses, recently erected, named the Grand Parade, with an hotel, called the Saxon hotel. The Hastings and St. Leonard's races take place at the latter end of September, on a race-course about a mile to the west of the town, and are generally well attended.

The town is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water, under an act of parliament obtained in 1832, for its general improvement. A convenient market-place has been erected; and it is proposed to form a line of railway to this place by a branch from the London and Brighton railway, through Lewes. The mildness and softness of the air and its equability of temperature, combined with the influence of a marine atmosphere, render the place a desirable residence for invalids affected with pulmonary disease; and the advantages of a bracing atmosphere, found in the more elevated portions, and equally exempt from the bleakness of the eastern, and the humidity of the western, coasts, are equally favourable in cases of debility. Her Majesty, with the Duchess of Kent, passed the winter of 1834-5 at the place, and occupied a residence since named Victoria House; the Princess Sophia Matilda also occupied the house now called Gloucester Lodge, and in 1837 Her Majesty the Queen Dowager passed the winter here. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage and incumbency of the Rev. C. W. Leslie. The church, of which the first stone was laid by the Princess Sophia in 1831, is a handsome structure, in the early English style, most picturesquely situated on the cliff; it contains 700 sittings, without galleries, of which 200 are free. The windows are embellished with stained glass, in which the arms of the Princess Sophia and other contributors are emblazoned; and there are some good monuments, among which is one to Mr. Burton, the founder of the town, with his profile in white marble inserted in a slab of dove marble. Here are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A national school was built in 1834.

LEPPINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of SCRAYINGHAM, union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Malton; containing 110 inhabitants. The Carey family formerly possessed a castellated mansion here, and a member of it was created Baron Carey, of Leppington, in 1622, but the title became extinct about the period of the Restoration. The township comprises by computation 1210 acres, the property and manor of Earl de Grey. Gypsum is obtained near the Derwent; and about eighteen inches below the surface, is a stratum of petrified shells and other marine productions four inches in thickness. In the village is a chapel of ease to the church of Scrayingham; and the Wesleyans have a place of worship. Foundations of the old mansion still remain; and many Roman coins have been found in the neighbourhood.

LEPTON, a township, in the parish of KIRK-HEATON, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Huddersfield; containing 3875 inhabitants. This township, which is on the Wakefield road, comprises 1578a. 3r. 7p. The villages of Great and Little Lepton are pleasantly situated, and neatly built, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of woollen-cloths and fancy goods, which is carried on also in the different hamlets of the township. Richard Beaumont, Esq., in 1703, left £10 for apprenticing children.

LESBURY (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of ALNWICK, partly in the S. division of BAMBOURGH ward, and partly in the E. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Alnmouth, Bilton, Hawkhill, and Wooden, 1108 inhabitants, of whom 404 are in the township of Lesbury, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Alnmouth, on the road to Warkworth. This parish, which is on the river Aln, and bounded on the east by the sea, comprises by computation 3947 acres; it contains good quarries of lime and freestone. Lesbury House is the picturesque residence of Edward Thew, Esq. The village is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Aln, over which is a neat bridge, and the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified; about two miles below the village, the river falls into the ocean at Alnmouth, where considerable quantities of grain are shipped for the London and other markets. There is a very extensive flour-mill. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £326; impropiators, S. Ilderton and J. Cookson, Esqrs. The tithes for the townships of Alnmouth, Hawkhill, and Lesbury, have been commuted for £727. 18. 11., of which £484. 4. 5. are payable to the impropiators, and £298. to the vicar; there are about 5 acres of glebe. The church is a very ancient structure. At Alnmouth is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is endowed with land producing £6 per annum. Perceval Stockdale, author of several volumes of poetry, and the intimate friend and associate of Johnson, Garrick, and Goldsmith, was vicar of the parish.

LESNEWTH (St. KNET), a parish, in the union of CAMELFORD, hundred of LESNEWTH, E. division of CORNWALL, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Camelford; containing 137 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 2700 acres; the soil is fertile, and well adapted both for arable and pasture; the surface is hilly, and the lower lands are watered by several brooks. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £190; patron, Sir John Yarde Buller, Bart.

LESSINGHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of HAPPING, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N.E.) from Stalham; containing 241 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and in the reign of William Rufus a priory was founded here, as a cell to the abbey of Okeburn, in Wiltshire, at that time the chief of the alien priories dependent on the abbey of Bec, in Normandy; on the suppression, it was granted to Eton College, and subsequently to King's College, Cambridge. The parish comprises 639*a.* 2*r.* 2*p.*, of which 567 acres are arable, and 57 pasture. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Hempstead, and valued in the king's books at £6: the tithes have been commuted for £235, and the glebe contains upwards of 21 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains a Norman font, and part of an ancient carved screen, separating the chancel from the nave. A national school is supported by subscription.

LESSNESS, a chapelry, in the parish of ERITH, union of DARTFORD, hundred of LESSNESS, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Crayford. There is a place of worship for Baptists on Lessness-heath. An abbey for Black canons, in honour of St. Mary and St. Thomas the Martyr, was founded here in 1178, by Richard de Lucy, chief justice of England, and some time regent of the kingdom, who assumed the habit, and shortly after died in the house; its revenue at the Dissolution was estimated at £186. 9., and was granted to Cardinal Wolsey, towards the endowment of his colleges.

LETCHWORTH, a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hitchin; containing 108 inhabitants. It comprises by computation nearly 1000 acres; the soil is a strong clay, in some parts inclining to loam; the surface is hilly, and the surrounding scenery pleasingly diversified. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 1. 10½., and in the gift of the Rev. J. Allington: the tithes have been commuted for £240, and the glebe comprises 42 acres.

LETCOMB-BASSETT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WANTAGE, hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wantage; containing 293 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1562 acres, of which about 20 are pasture, 9 woodland, and the remainder arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 0. 2½.; net income, £215; patrons, President and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1772. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The ancient Ikeneld-street crosses the Vale of White Horse, in the parish. Dean Swift, during his residence at the rectory in 1714, wrote his pamphlet entitled Free Thoughts on the Present State of Affairs, printed in 1741.

LETCOMB-REGIS (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WANTAGE, hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Wantage; containing, with the chapelries of East and West Challow, and the township of Letcomb-Regis, 1030 inhabitants, of whom 446 are in the township. The parish comprises about 4350 acres, of which 2389*a.* 2*r.* 34*p.* are in the township; the land is chiefly arable. A branch of the river Ock, and the Wilts and Berks canal, pass through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 7.; net income, £200; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church is an ancient structure. There are chapels at East and West Challow; and here is a school endowed with £8 per annum. On the summit of the chalk hills to the south of the village, is a very large quadrangular intrenchment, called Letcomb Castle, with singular earth-works; about a mile north of it, the Roman Ikeneld-street crosses the Vale of White Horse.

LEATHERINGHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of PLOMESGATE, hundred of LOES, E. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (N. W.) from Wickham-Market; containing 164 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the river Deben, and comprises 1143*a.* 9*p.*; the soil is various, in some parts light, and in others a rich loam; there are some fertile tracts of meadow on the banks of the river. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rev. O. S. Reynolds, with a net income of £42: the tithes have been commuted for £122. 3. The church consists of a nave and tower; the former, being in a ruinous condition, was restored about 60 years since; there are some slight remains of the chancel, which once contained numerous handsome monuments of the families of Wingfield and Naunton. A national school has been established. Here was a small priory of Black canons, a cell to the monastery of St. Peter, in Ipswich; it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £26. 18. 5. Sir Robert Naunton, author of the Fragmenta Regalia, on obtaining possession of the abbey, built a large house near its site, of which part has since been pulled down, and the rest converted into a farmhouse.

LEATHERINGSETT (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of HOLT, W. division of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by N.) from Holt; containing 273 inhabitants. This parish comprises 853*a.* 2*r.* 12*p.*, of which 686 acres are arable, 43 meadow and pasture, and 125 woodland: the village is pleasantly situated in the deep and well-wooded vale of the Glavin, and on the road from Fakenham to Holt. On the bank of the river is an extensive brewery. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £12; patron and incumbent, the Rev. C. Codd: the tithes have been commuted for £245, and the glebe comprises 27 acres. The church is an ancient structure, chiefly in the decorated English style, with a circular tower, and contains a Norman font and other interesting details.

LETTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of WEOBLEY, partly in the hundred of STRETFORD, and partly in that of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD; containing, with the township of Hurstley, 224 inhabitants, of whom 119 are in the township of Letton, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Weobley. This parish, which is situated on the left bank of the river Wye, and intersected by the road from Hereford to Hay, comprises 1196 acres of a fertile soil. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 15. 7½.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Henry Blissett: the tithes have been commuted for £230, and the glebe contains 20 acres.

LETTON, a township, in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, union of KNIGHTON, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Knigh-ton; containing, with the townships of Newton and Walford, 213 inhabitants. Here is a national school.

LETTON (All Saints), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (S. E. by E.) from Ship-dham; containing 154 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1255a. 27p., of which 735 acres are arable, 435 meadow and pasture, and 77 woodland; the soil is extremely rich, and the dairy-farms have long been celebrated for excellent butter; the surface is varied, and the prevailing scenery of pleasing character. Let-ton Hall, the seat of T. T. Gurdon, Esq., lord of the manor, is a handsome mansion of white brick, beautifully situated in a well-wooded park abounding with oaks of venerable growth; within the grounds are the ruins of the parish church, the site of which is inclosed with a plantation of thorn; near the entrance lodge is the source of one of the tributaries of the river Yare. The living is a rectory, consolidated with that of Cran-worth, valued in the king's books at £7. 14. 7., and in the patronage of Mr. Gurdon: the tithes have been commuted for £198. 14.

LETWELL, a chapelry, in the parish of LAUGHTON-EN-LE-MORTHEN, union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of UPPER STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Tick-hill; containing 129 inhabitants. This chapelry comprises 1100 acres, the property of H. Gally Knight, Esq., M.P., who is lord of the manor; the surface is pleasingly diversified, and the scenery embellished with timber of luxuriant growth, of which some groups in the hamlet of Langold are noticed by Repton as the most beautiful in the country. The family seat of the Knights, an ancient house, was taken down by the present proprietor, when he removed his residence, a few years since, to the mansion at Firbeck; but the offices, with the gardens and pleasure-grounds, in the latter of which is an extensive lake, are still remaining, and retain their character as one of the most agreeable demesnes in this part of Yorkshire. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, originally a small structure, erected in the early part of the 16th century, has been greatly improved and embellished at the expense of Mr. Knight, who, in 1841, inclosed the chapelyard with a substantial wall, and gave it to the parishioners as a burying-ground, for which purpose it was consecrated by the Archbishop of York. The living, a perpetual curacy, was in 1841 annexed to that of Firbeck; net income, £60; patron and appropriator, the Chancellor of the Cathedral of York, under whom the tithes, which have been commuted for £220, are held on lease by Mr. Knight. This gentleman, after his travels in Spain, Sicily, Greece, Egypt, and Syria, published a volume of poems on various subjects, an "Architectural Tour in Normandy," "Hannibal in Bithynia," the "Normans in Sicily," and recently a work on the "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy," splendidly illustrated.

LEVAN, ST., a parish, in the union of PENZANCE, W. division of the hundred of PENWITH and of the county of CORNWALL, 9 miles (S. W.) from Penzance; containing 531 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2100 acres, of which 700 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, united, with that of Sennen, to the rectory of St. Burian: the tithes have been commuted for £250. The church is situated in a secluded dell, opening at the lower extremity to the sea; the interior contains specimens of curious carved work, and there are some ancient crosses in the churchyard. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by subscription. Overhanging the sea, at the western extremity of the parish, are the celebrated rocks, or lofty piles of granite, called Castle Treryn, on the summit of one of which the remarkable block termed the Logan, or Rocking Stone, supposed to weigh about 90 tons, is so nicely balanced as to be moved to and fro by a single individual. In 1820, though considered almost the greatest curiosity in Cornwall, some sailors dislodged the mass; but this mischievous act exciting a general feeling of indignation, steps were shortly afterwards taken to replace it in its old position, secured by chains. About a mile and a half to the east of Castle Treryn is Cape Tolpedn-Penwith, separated from the main land by an old stone wall; and in it is the Funnel Rock, which is excavated nearly perpendicularly, and resembling an inverted cone. There is a well, called St. Levan's; and an ancient oratory remains in the parish.

LEVEN (St. Faith), a parish, in the union of BEVERLEY, N. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Hempholme, 999 inhabitants, of whom 890 are in the township of Leven, 7 miles (N. E.) from Beverley. This place is of considerable antiquity, a church being mentioned as existing here at the time of the Norman survey, when the manor was in the possession of the church of St. John de Beverley, which establishment retained it till the Dissolution. The parish is situated on the road from Hull to Bridlington, and comprises 5525 acres, of which about 4500 are arable, 20 wood, and the remainder pasture; the land has been improved by draining, and is in profitable cultivation. The village, which is large and well built, consists of two streets crossing at right angles, with several detached houses. A canal to the river Hull, three miles and a half in length, and navigable for vessels of sixty tons' burthen, was opened in 1802, and has a considerable traffic in corn, lime, coal, &c. Petty-sessions are held every Thursday. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 13. 4.; net income, £1190; patron, Rev. G. Wray: at the inclosure, in 1791, a yearly modus and 136 acres of land were given in lieu of part of the tithes, and there is a handsome parsonage-house. A new church, in the centre of the village, was erected in 1844, and the old edifice has been taken down. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Primitive Methodists; and a good parochial school is supported by subscription. The ancient stone rood was dug up in the churchyard in 1836; it is in fine preservation, and is probably of the time of the 15th century.

LEVEN-BRIDGE, a hamlet, in the parish of STAINTON, union of STOCKTON, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 2 miles (E.) from Yarm. It is situated on the road from Stokesley to Yarm; the surface of the land is elevated, and the soil a good clay, producing fine wheat; the river Leven passes through the hamlet, in which is a corn-mill.

LEVENS, a chapelry, in the parish, union, and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from KENDAL; containing 993 inhabitants. On the eastern bank of the river Kent, which is crossed by a bridge on the Kendal road, is Levens Hall, the venerable mansion of the Howards, embosomed in a fine park, and crowned with towers, which, overtopping the highest trees, command extensive prospects on every side. The entrance hall contains various relics of ancient armour; one of the apartments is hung with splendid Gobeline tapestry, and most of the other rooms are decorated with oak wainscoting exquisitely carved, and costly hangings of the richest colours. In the park are the ruins of a circular edifice, called Kirkstead, said to have been a Roman temple dedicated to Diana. There is also a petrifying spring, termed the Dropping Well; and above the park is Levens Force, a picturesque waterfall of the river Kent, formed by the dam erected to work the powder-mills at Sedgwick. A handsome chapel, with a low tower surmounted by an octagonal spire, has been erected and endowed by the Hon. Col. and Mrs. Howard, who have also built a parsonage-house: the patronage is vested in Mrs. Howard. A school for girls was established by that lady, who pays for their education; and another school, erected in 1825, by Col. Howard, is supported at his expense.

LEVENS HULME, a township, in the parish of MANCHESTER, union of CHORLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Manchester; containing 1231 inhabitants.

LEVER, DARCY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Great Bolton; containing 1700 inhabitants. There is an aqueduct of three arches across the Irwell at this place. Coal is obtained.

LEVER, GREAT, a township, in the parish of MIDDLETON, union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Great Bolton; containing 657 inhabitants.

LEVER, LITTLE, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Great Bolton; containing 2580 inhabitants. Coal is obtained here. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron, Vicar of Bolton; net income, £141. The chapel is dedicated to St. Matthew the Evangelist. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Lever Hall, an ancient building, was formerly occupied by Bishop Bridgeman.

LEVERINGTON (ST. LEONARD AND ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union and hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 2 miles (N. W.) from Wisbech; containing, with the chapelry of Parson-Drove, 1954 inhabitants. It comprises 7871 acres, of which 329 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 0. 7½; net income, £2099; patron, Bishop of Ely. A school is endowed with £40 per annum from the town lands. An act for inclosing waste was passed in 1841.

LEVERSDALE, a township, in the parish of IRTHINGTON, union of BRAMPTON, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 7 miles (N. E.) from Carlisle; containing 438 inhabitants. A school is partly supported by endowment.

LEVERTON, NORTH and SOUTH (ST. HELEN), a parish, in the union of BOSTON, wapentake of SKIRBECK, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Boston; containing 687 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 6., and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Executors of the late Incumbent; net income, £759: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1810. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Sixty-one acres and a half of land in the parish produce £100 per annum, distributed among the poor, but by whom given is not known.

LEVERTON, a hamlet, in the parish of CHILTON-FOLIATT, union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, though locally in the hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 1 mile (N.) from Hungerford; containing 30 inhabitants.

LEVERTON, NORTH (ST. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from East Retford; containing 344 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the river Trent, which here separates the counties of Nottingham and Lincoln; and comprises 1513a. 1r. 12p., whereof 881 acres are arable, 600 meadow and pasture, and 32 wood. Its surface is level, and the soil chiefly clay, with some rich meadow land on the margin of the river. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of North Leverton in the Collegiate Church of Southwell, valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £200. The tithes were commuted for land in 1795; the glebe comprises 80 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a square embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LEVERTON, SOUTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from East Retford; containing, with the chapelry of Cottam, 451 inhabitants, of whom 362 are in the township. This parish, which is situated on the river Trent, comprises by computation 2500 acres; the soil is chiefly clay, and towards the river a loam alternated with sand; the surface on the western side rises gradually to a considerable eminence, commanding some fine views over Lincolnshire, and embracing its town and cathedral. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £134; patron, Dean of Lincoln; impropiator, G. V. Vernon, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1795, when 57 acres were allotted to the vicar, in addition to an old glebe of 10 acres. The church is an ancient structure, and at Cottam is a chapel of ease. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A grammar school was founded in 1691, by John Simpson, Esq., and endowed with a rent-charge of £20.

LEVESDON, a hamlet, in the parish and union of WATFORD, partly in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN's, and partly in the hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (N.) from Watford; containing, with the hamlet of Cashio, 1548 inhabitants.

LEVINGTON, county of CUMBERLAND.—See LINTON, WEST.

LEVINGTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of COLNEIS, E. division of SUFFOLK, 5½ miles (S. E.) from Ipswich; containing 214 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the navigable river Orwell, comprises 1033a. 2r. 4p. The village is pleasantly situated; and there is a small hamlet called Stratton Hall. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Nacton, and valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 8. Almshouses for six persons were founded and endowed agreeably with the will of Sir Robert Hitcham, Knt., and are under the superintendence of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. Sir Robert, who was attorney-general to James I., was born here.

LEVISHAM, a parish, in the union and lythe of PICKERING, N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Pickering; containing 168 inhabitants. The surface is a remarkably hilly moorland, and the soil of much variety, and some of it very good; it is red and sandy for the most part, with a little clay in the romantic valley of Newton-Dale, situated to the north-west. The substratum is limestone, of which, and of freestone, some of excellent quality is worked for building and for lime, and was used on the Whitby and Pickering railway, which runs for three miles through the parish, and at a distance of about three-quarters of a mile from the village. There is a flour-mill in operation. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 8. 1½.; net income, £120; patron, incumbent, and impropiator, the Rev. Robert Skelton, who is also lord of the manor, and owner of most of the soil. The church, a neat edifice, in a secluded part, was rebuilt in 1802; and a chapel in the village is about to be rebuilt. A free school was built by subscription, about 1799, and is aided by £11 per annum, bequeathed by John Poad, in 1785, and now paid out of certain lands in Normanby township. The poor have about three acres of woodland, replanted in 1820, when the old timber was sold for £84. St. John's well is a sulphureous spring of petrifying power, reputed to be good in scorbutic complaints.

LEVNS, county of WESTMORLAND.—See LEVENS.

LEW, a hamlet, in the parish and union of WITNEY, hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Witney; containing 195 inhabitants. A chapel has been erected.

LEW, NORTH (ST. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, Black Torrington and Shebbear, and N. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Hather-leigh; containing 1051 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £27. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £342. Two schools are supported by subscription. At Redcliffe or Rutleigh, within the parish, are the remains of an ancient chapel; and near it a quarry of excellent freestone.

LEWANNICK (ST. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Launceston; containing 733 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north and north-east by the river Inny, comprises by measurement 4000 acres, whereof 176 are common or waste; the surface is hilly, and the scenery in many parts interesting. The soil is various, in some places a rich loam, and in others lighter; a considerable portion is in pasture, and large herds of cattle, chiefly of the North Devon breed, are reared. The substratum abounds with stone of superior quality for building and other uses; at Pollyfont is a valuable quarry of remarkably fine freestone, which is also used for mantel-pieces, and, when polished, is of a rich green colour with black veins; there is also a quarry of exceedingly hard slate. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 18. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown: the impropriate tithes, belonging to Miss Hockin, have been commuted for £225, and the vicarial for £185, and the glebe is valued at £60 per annum. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles. There are places of worship for Baptists, Bryanites, Independents, and Wesleyans; and a national school.

LEWES, a borough and market-town, and the head of a union, in the rape of LEWES, E. division of SUSSEX, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Brighton, 38 (E. by N.) from Chichester, and 50 (S. by E.) from London; containing 9199 inhabitants. This place, which occupies the eastern extremity of the South Downs, is supposed to have derived its name from the Saxon Leswa, signifying pasture, and by some antiquaries is thought to have been the Mutuantorris, or Mantuantorris of the Romans; an opinion resting more on the presumed necessity for an intermediate station between those of Anderida Portus, in Pevensy, and Ad Decimum, near Bignor, than upon any conclusive evidence. Numerous remains of Roman antiquity have at various times been discovered, consisting of rings, pateræ, urns, fibulæ, and coins, forming a regular series from the reign of Tiberius to the time of Constantine; and at the village of Glynd, about three miles from the town, the vestiges of a Roman ford may still be traced. During the time of the Saxons, the spot was regarded, from its elevated and commanding situation, by the inhabitants of the adjacent country, as a place of refuge from the frequent incursions of the Danes, and at a very early period formed a part of the royal demesnes. A castle was built about the year 890, by Alfred, and in the reign of Athelstan, the town, which was strongly fortified, had attained to such consideration, that two of the royal mints were established here by order of that monarch. From this period, it steadily advanced in importance; in the reign of Edward the Confessor, it obtained the privileges of a borough, and had a merchants' guild, and it continued to increase in prosperity till the Conquest, when it was granted by William I. to William de Warren, who had married his daughter Gundreda, and who rebuilt the castle, which he made his principal residence. This splendid structure occupied an area of 790 feet in length and 396 in width, inclosed with lofty walls, of which those on the north side formed part of the fortifications of the town; it had within the area two strong keeps raised on artificial mounds, of which the western has been preserved, and is of quadrangular form, with hexagonal turrets at the angles; the principal gateway, affording an entrance from the high street, is still remaining, and displays features both of Norman and of later styles of architecture.

A Cluniac priory was founded here in 1078, by William de Warren and his wife, which became the principal establishment of that order in England, and of which the prior was high chamberlain of the abbot of Cluny, and his vicar-general in England, Scotland, and Ireland; the establishment, which was dedicated to St. Pancras, flourished till the Dissolution, when its revenue was valued at £1091. 9. 6.; there are but very trifling remains of the structure, the chief portions having been removed to make room for the erection of the street and crescent to which it has transferred its name. An hospital, dedicated to St. Nicholas, was erected in 1085, by the same founder, who endowed it for 13 poor brethren and sisters; a portion of the wall only is remaining. In 1264, a sanguinary battle took place here, between Henry III., assisted by his brother Richard, Earl of Cornwall, and the confederated barons under Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, in which the royal forces were at first victorious. Prince Edward, the king's son, having broken the enemy's line, threw them into disorder; but confident of victory, pursuing the fugitives too far, the forces of the barons rallied, and, making a fresh charge, entirely defeated the royal army; took the King and the Earl of Cornwall prisoners, whom they confined in the castle; and compelled the king to sue for peace, and to deliver his son as a hostage for the fulfilment of the conditions, which were concluded on an eminence adjoining the town, distinguished by the appellation of the "Mise of Lewes." Not less than 5000 men are said to have fallen in this battle, most of whom were buried on the spot, and over whose remains were raised several of the tumuli on the downs. The town had the honour of a visit, in 1830, from His Majesty William IV. and his queen, Adelaide, who, attended by the Duke of Cambridge and the Princess Augusta, were entertained at the Friars, the residence of Nehemiah Wimble, Esq.

The town is principally situated on an acclivity, rising from the western bank of the river Ouse, over which is a stone bridge of one arch, erected in 1727, to replace a bridge of wood that had been destroyed by a flood, and widened in 1829 by the addition of a footpath on each side. This bridge forms a communication with the vill of Cliffe, so called from its position under an impending cliff of chalk, and of which the site is supposed to have been anciently covered by the sea. The streets are regular and well built, containing many handsome houses; and the town is paved, lighted with gas, and watched, under a local act obtained in 1806, and supplied with water under an act passed in 1833. About the year 1821, considerable improvement was made in the White Hill road, which passes through a valley near the town, by lowering the hill on each side, and filling up the valley with the materials, thus forming a causeway between 30 and 40 feet high; and the principal street in the vill of Cliffe was widened in 1828, and greatly improved under an act for lighting and watching this part. On the south side of the town is Southover; and the environs extend to the South Downs, a chain of chalk hills, rising like an amphitheatre to the mean elevation of about 500 feet, and covered with the rich herbage which gives to the South Down mutton its admired flavour. Assemblies take place occasionally in the town-hall, and races are held on Easter-Monday, and in the month of August; the former, called Hunter's races, were established in 1829. The race-course, formerly one of the finest four-mile courses in the kingdom, has been reduced in extent to $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles; it has a commodious stand, erected in 1772. A book society was established in 1785, and now possesses a library of several thousand volumes, many of them scarce works; the society consists of 100 members, admitted by ballot, on paying £6. 6. towards the general fund, and an annual subscription of £1. 5. A mechanics' institute was founded in 1825, and the building formerly the theatre has been appropriated to its use. The trade consists principally in grain and malt; there are several large breweries and iron-foundries, a paper manufactory, and a yard for building ships. The river is navigable from a distance of some miles above the town to the sea, and greatly facilitates the trade of the district. A market for corn is held every Tuesday, and for live stock every Tuesday fortnight: the present market-house for provisions was completed in 1793. There are fairs on May 6th for cattle and pedlery, July 26th for wool, Whit-Tuesday for cattle, and September 21st and October 2nd for sheep, the number of which brought for sale at each of these fairs exceeds 50,000. A show of fat cattle takes place about Christmas.

Lewes is a BOROUGH by prescription, and was formerly a county of itself; the government is vested in two constables and two headboroughs, who are chosen annually, by a jury of burgesses, at the court leet of the lord of the manor. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty-sessions every Tuesday; the spring and summer assizes for the county are held here, and also the general quarter-sessions for the eastern division of the county, which comprises the rapes of Lewes, Pevensey, and Hastings; and there are likewise intermediate sessions for the trial of prisoners. The county court for the recovery of debts under 40s. is held alternately here and at Chichester. The borough sends two members to parliament; the boundaries of the elective borough comprise an area of 738 acres, and the constables are the returning officers. In 1812, a handsome assize hall was erected, the expense of which, including the purchase of the ground and other property, was £15,500; it comprises an extensive entrance hall, with record-rooms, a room for the petty-sessions, two courts of judicature, and a room for the judges and magistrates; above these are, a spacious and elegant apartment for the grand jury, a council chamber, &c. In 1793, a house of correction for the eastern district was built, on Mr. Howard's plan, to which a southern wing was added in 1817, and very considerable additions have been recently made, to adapt it to the improved system of prison discipline. The town is the place of election for the eastern division of the county.

The borough anciently comprised ten or eleven parishes, but these have been reduced to four. In the 37th of Henry VIII., the parishes of St. Andrew, St. Mary in Foro, St. Martin, and St. Michael, were united, and now form the parish of St. Michael, containing 988 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the rectory of St. Andrew's annexed, valued together in the king's books at £17. 5. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £116. The church, which was partially rebuilt and modernised in 1755, retains some good portions of later English architecture; a gallery has been erected, and 87 free sittings provided, towards which the Incorporated Society granted £80; among others, there is a splendid mural monument to the memory of Sir Nicholas Pelham, Knt., and Anne, his wife. The parish of St. Anne consists of the united parishes of St. Peter Within and St. Mary West-out, the latter being without the ancient borough, and contains 777 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued for both in the king's books at £19. 13. 6½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £193. 10., and the rectorial for £130. The church, formerly that of St. Mary's, is partly Norman, and partly of the early English architecture; it contains a curious font; the boundary line of the ancient borough passes through the chancel. The parish of St. John under the Castle is of very considerable extent, but a small part of it only is within the borough, the remainder lying principally in the hundred of Swanborough; it contains 2502 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, to which that of St. Mary Magdalene's was annexed in 1539, valued in the king's books at £3. 11. 3.; net income, £250; patron and incumbent, Rev. Peter G. Crofts. The church was of considerable antiquity, but, being much too small, was taken down, and rebuilt in 1840, chiefly by subscription, aided by grants from the Incorporated Society and the Chichester Diocesan Association; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, and contains 1013 sittings, of which 602 are free. On the outer wall of the new church have been placed the remains of a monument formerly in the churchyard, assigned to Magnus, son of Harold II., with an inscription mostly in Anglo-Saxon characters. The parish of All Saints was anciently formed from a union of the parishes of the Holy Trinity, St. Peter the Less, and St. Nicholas, and contains 2123 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7; net income, £206; patron, Charles Goring, Esq. The church, with the exception of the old tower, was rebuilt in the year 1805. The precinct of the castle is extra-parochial, and is not rateable within the borough, nor subject to any ecclesiastical jurisdiction. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians.

The parishes of St. Thomas in the Cliffe, with 1545, and St. John Southover, with 1229 inhabitants, although without the limits of the ancient borough, may be considered as forming part of the town of Lewes; they are included in the present parliamentary boundary, as is also part of the parish of South Malling. Southover parish comprises 550 acres, of which 400 are meadow, 122 arable, and 28 houses and gardens. A constable and two headboroughs for the hundred of Ringmer, of which the Cliffe is the most populous part, are chosen annually at the court leet of Earl De la Warr. The living of St. Thomas is a discharged rectory, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, valued in the king's books at £5. 12. 6.; net income, £130. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, contains a fine altar-piece, and an organ, formerly in the chapel of the Duke of Chandos, at Canons. There are places of worship for Independents and Huntingdonians, the founder of which latter sect, William Huntington, was interred here. The living of the parish of Southover is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 12., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £30, with a glebe-house and 4 acres of land. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is chiefly in the decorated English style, and contains the tomb of Gundreda, daughter of William the Conqueror, and wife to the first Earl de Warren, which is of black marble, finely sculptured with foliage, and bears around its edge a laudatory inscription in Norman characters. In ancient records Southover is called a borough, and it still has its distinct high constable and other officers. The manor was an appendage of the monastery, on the dissolution of which it came into the possession of the crown, and was given to Lord Essex: after his attainder it again reverted to the Crown, and was granted by Henry VIII. to his divorced queen, Anne of Cleves, who, according to tradition, took up her residence here, in a very ancient building situated on the south side of the street.

The free grammar school was founded originally at Southover, in 1512, by Agnes Morley, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £20, together with a house and garden, for a master and an usher; and this endowment was subsequently increased by various legacies, particularly that of Mrs. Mary Jenkins, in 1709, who left a house, gardens, and appurtenances for the master, and the sum of £1533. 16. 1. Belonging to the borough is an exhibition to either university for four years, left by the Rev. George Steere, "to a poor scholar, the son of parents residing in or near Lewes," the annual value of which is about £35. Evelyn, author of Sylva, and John Pell, the celebrated mathematician, were educated here. The poor law union of Lewes is limited to the six parishes above enumerated, with the addition of South Malling, and contains a population of 9552. There are many interesting antiquities in and near Lewes. The Castra, or earthworks, on the summits of the Downs, of remote date, are still remaining; and tumuli are scattered in various parts, in which have been found skeletons, urns, ashes, amber beads, and occasionally warlike instruments. Of the ancient castle, the principal feature is the gateway, which has an inner arch of Anglo-Norman masonry, of the thirteenth century, and was defended by two machicolated towers and two portcullises. Of the once extensive priory of St. Pancras, said to have covered an area of 40 acres, only a very small portion remains, the chief parts having been removed in the recent improvements of the town. A portion of the walls of St.

Nicholas' hospital is yet standing; and also part of the exterior walls of an hospital dedicated to St. James, which has been converted into a barn. Here was also a monastery of Grey friars, of which the memorial alone is preserved in the name of a modern mansion on the site, called the Friars. The town walls were erected during the residence of the Earls of Warren and Surrey, and may still be accurately traced; a part of the western portion is standing, and vestiges of other parts are visible. In Southover is an ancient mansion, erected in 1572, with part of the materials of the priory, and in which are preserved three of the beautifully inlaid doors once belonging to that establishment. Among the natives of Lewes may be mentioned Richard Russel, Esq., M. D. and F.R.S., who, by his writings on the efficacy of the sea water at Brighton, laid the foundation of the prosperity of that fashionable bathing-place. Many varieties of vegetable and animal organic remains have been found in the chalk formation of the vicinity, and are fully illustrated by Gideon Mantell, Esq., in several geological publications.

LEWISHAM (St. Mary), a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of BLACKHEATH, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from London, on the road to Tonbridge; containing 12,276 inhabitants. The name is a slight corruption of the Saxon Lewesham, "the dwelling among the meadows," anciently written Levesham. The parish, including the greater portion of the hamlet of Blackheath, the whole of Sydenham, Forest Hill, Brockley, Loampit Hill, and Loat's Pit, comprises by computation 5500 acres; the soil is extremely rich, and the surface pleasingly varied. Its convenient distance from the metropolis, and its beautiful situation, have rendered it a favourite place of residence; and the neighbourhood is thickly studded with gentlemen's seats, many of which are splendid mansions, and with numerous handsome villas, the country residences of opulent merchants. The village, which is on the river Ravensbourn, extends about a mile along the high road, and consists principally of one street; the inhabitants are supplied with water from a stream rising at the upper end of the village, and flowing through it. The Surrey canal passes through the parish. The county magistrates hold a weekly session on Monday; and the parish is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests at Greenwich, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £23. 19. 2.; net income, £946; patron, Earl of Dartmouth. The church, rebuilt in 1774, is a handsome edifice, with a square tower at the west end; a portico on the south side is supported on four Corinthian columns; the altar is placed in a circular recess. It sustained considerable injury from a fire, but has been restored. Two episcopal chapels have been erected on that part of Blackheath which is in the parish, viz. Dartmouth chapel, partly rebuilt and enlarged by Lord Dartmouth in 1839, and Dartmouth-Place chapel; the former in the patronage of the vicar of Lewisham, and the latter in that of his lordship. There are also episcopal chapels at Southend and Sydenham, the latter of which was formerly a meeting-house for Presbyterians, of which Dr. John Williams, author of the Greek Concordance, was many years minister; and a district church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, was recently erected at Sydenham by subscription, aided by a parliamentary grant:

the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The Rev. Abraham Colfe, in 1656, devised certain estates in trust to the Leathersellers' Company, for the foundation of two schools, one for the classical instruction of 31 sons of the laity in the hundred, and one son of each incumbent in this and the hundred of Chiselhurst; the other for the education of 31 boys of Lewisham. According to the Charities' Commissioners' report in 1818, the income was £342, out of which the company pay £50 per annum to six alms-women, agreeably to the will of the donor. A school for girls was instituted in 1699, to which Dr. George Stanhope, Dean of Canterbury, bequeathed £150, and Mrs. Stanhope £50, which sums, with subsequent benefactions, produce a salary for the mistress of £20 per annum; the school is conducted on the national system. Two national schools, one in the village, and the other at the north end of the parish, are maintained by subscription, and two infants' schools at the expense of the vicar. The poor law union of Lewisham comprises 7 parishes or places, and contains a population of 23,013. Here was formerly a Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of St. Peter, at Ghent; it was suppressed in the time of Henry V., and the site granted to the prior and convent of Sheen. Dr. Stanhope, who distinguished himself as a theological writer, was presented to the vicarage in 1689, and was buried here in 1728. Lewisham confers the inferior title of Viscount on the Earl of Dartmouth.

LEWKNOR (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of THAME, partly in the hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, but chiefly in that of LEWKNOR, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Tetsworth; containing, with the chapelry of Postcombe, 847 inhabitants, of whom 221 are in Lewknor Uphill. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 17.; net income, £320; patrons and impropriators, Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the Norman style, and contains some interesting monuments and a beautiful effigy in stone; it is the burial-place of the Scroop family, and also of the Fanes, whose mansion and estate of Wormesley are partly in the parish. There is a chapel of ease at Ashampstead; and a national school is supported.

LEWSTON, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of DORSET, 4 miles (S.) from Sherborne; containing 7 inhabitants.

LEWTRENCHARD (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Lifton and S. divisions of DEVON, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Launceston; containing 527 inhabitants. It comprises 2500 acres, of which 244 are common or waste. Quarries of slate and limestone of good quality are worked. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 9., and in the gift of W. Baring Gould, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £265, and the glebe consists of 56 acres. The Rev. W. Romaine, author of the Life, Walk, and Triumph of Faith, was minister of the parish.

LEXDEN (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union and liberties of COLCHESTER, N. division of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Colchester; containing 1454 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Maldon to Colchester, and comprises 2312a. 10p., of which 1767 acres are arable, 443 pasture, and 37 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Executors of the late Rev. J. R. Papillon: the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £660, and the glebe comprises 29 acres of land. The church was rebuilt in 1820, and 330 free sittings were provided, towards which the Incorporated Society granted the sum of £500. A national school, erected in 1817, is supported by a bequest of £20 per annum by the late Mrs. Rawstorn, and by subscriptions. Roman antiquities of various kinds are frequently discovered; and before the inclosure of the heath, in 1820, evident traces of an encampment, supposed to have been Danish, might be seen. The great rampart from the marshes to the river Stour passed obliquely through the parish, and considerable remains of it are still visible.

LEXHAM, EAST (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Swaffham; containing 236 inhabitants. It comprises 1190 acres, of which 866 are arable, 257 pasture and meadow, and 67 woodland. The Hall is a handsome mansion, situated in a small well-wooded park. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Litcham in the year 1742, and valued in the king's books at £8. 6.: the tithes have been commuted for £205. The church is an ancient structure, with a circular tower, overspread with ivy, and contains a piscina of beautiful workmanship, on the south side of the chancel. A school on the British and Foreign system is supported.

LEXHAM, WEST (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Rougham; containing 124 inhabitants. It comprises about 1200 acres, of which 1114 are arable, and 76 meadow and pasture, with some woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 11. 8., and in the gift of Lord Wodehouse: the tithes have been commuted for £188, and the glebe comprises 58 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a circular tower, and appears to have been originally larger than at present; on the south side of the chancel a double piscina was discovered in 1842, which had been long concealed under a coat of plaster.

LEYBOURNE (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of MALLING, hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Maidstone; containing 255 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Sir Joseph Henry Hawley, Bart., of Leybourne Grange: the tithes have been commuted for £275, and there are 180 acres of glebe. The Rev. James Holmes, in 1775, conveyed to trustees a schoolroom and a dwelling-house in the parish, with the interest of £1000 four per cent. consols., for the education of children. Here are considerable remains of an ancient castle, consisting of a gateway, flanked by circular towers, various arches, walls, &c., and traces of the moat by which it was surrounded; part of the ruins has long been converted into a dwelling-house.

LEYBURN, a market-town, and the head of a union, in the parish of WENSLEY, wapentake of HANGWEST, N. riding of YORK, 46 miles (N. W. by W.) from York, and 236 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 829 inhabitants. The town is pleasantly situated in a fertile and picturesque district, and consists principally of one long and well-built street, the houses of which are of a superior and durable stone, and of modern appearance, many of them having been erected in the present century. There are a circulating and a subscription library. A large elm-tree formerly stood in the centre of the town, and served as a market-cross, but it was cut down in 1821. Leyburn attracts many visitors on their way to the lakes of Westmorland and Cumberland. The surface towards the north-west rises in bold undulations to the lofty moors of Wensleydale and Swaledale, and in the midst of the beautiful scenery surrounding the town, is the striking and celebrated walk called Leyburn Sparol, a magnificent natural terrace, commanding, among many others, fine views of the ruins of Middleham and Bolton Castles, the former of which places is now connected with Leyburn by a suspension bridge across the Ure, on the site of the old ferry. The soil in the vicinity comprises stiff clay and gravelly loam, but consists principally of a light limestone, having in some parts deposits of lead and coal. Petty-sessions are held on the last Friday in every month. The market is on Friday; and there are fairs on the second Fridays in February, May, October, and December, noted for large sales of cattle. A small chapel of ease was erected in 1836, at the cost of the Hon. T. O. Powlett; a national school is supported by subscription, and various benefactions have been made for apprenticing children, and other purposes. The poor law union of Leyburn comprises 41 parishes or places, containing a population of 9957.

LEYLAND (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of CHORLEY, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; consisting of the chapelries of Euxton, Heapey, and Hoghton, and the townships of Clayton-le-Woods, Cuerden, Leyland, Wheelton, Whittle-le-Woods, and Withnell; and containing 14,032 inhabitants, of whom 3569 are in the township of Leyland, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Chorley. The parish comprises about 17,950 acres, of which 3533 are in Leyland township; of the latter number, 371 are common or waste. A considerable manufacture of cotton is carried on. At Golden-Hill is one of the intermediate stations on the line of the North-Union railway. The petty-sessions for the division are held once in five weeks, on Monday. Shawe Hall, the seat of William Farington, Esq., contains a choice museum of natural curiosities, and a collection of valuable paintings, some of which were found in the ruins of Herculaneum. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £400; patron, T. J. Baldwin, Esq.; impropiators, several proprietors of land. The church, originally erected without a single pillar, was rebuilt and enlarged in 1817, and contains several marble monuments; adjoining the chancel is an ancient chapel belonging to the Faringtons. A place of worship for Wesleyans was erected in 1814. Near the churchyard, a free grammar school was founded by Queen Elizabeth, with an endowment of £3. 18. per annum, in aid of which the Rev. Thomas Armetriding, in 1718, bequeathed £250; the annual income, with subsequent benefactions, amounts to about £30. Another school is endowed with £13 per annum; and there is also a school, erected in 1785, by the late Mr. Balshaw, and endowed by him with lands now producing an income of £230; it is in union with the National Society. An almshouse for six persons was founded in the year 1607, by William Farington, Esq., and further endowed in 1665, by John Osbaldeston, Esq.

LEYSDOWN (St. CLEMENT), a parish, in the union, and liberty of the Isle, of SHEPPY, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAX, E. division of KENT, 9 miles (E. by S.) from Queenborough; containing 310 inhabitants. It comprises 2182*a.* 2*r.* 31*p.*, of which 816 acres are arable, 1357 pasture, and 9 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 10.; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of Canterbury. The great tithes have been commuted for £394, and the vicarial for £265; the appropriate glebe contains 15 acres, and the vicarial 5. The church is a neat modern edifice, erected near the site of a more ancient and spacious one, the ruins of which are still visible. Here is a national school.

LEYTON, LOW (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WEST HAM, hundred of BECONTREE, S. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (N. E.) from London; containing 3274 inhabitants. This place derives its name, which appears to be a contraction of Lee town, from its situation on the river Lea. It is supposed by Camden and others to be the site of the ancient Durolitum; but whether or not, it is evident that here was a Roman station; various pavements, foundations of buildings, consular and imperial coins, and other Roman antiquities, having been repeatedly discovered, particularly near the manor-house. The parish contains, in the rural district, about 1700 acres, of which 150 are marsh, about 250 waste, and nearly the same number in the occupation of nursery-men and market-gardeners; the remainder is good profitable land in a high state of cultivation; the soil is gravelly, and the grounds abound with fine springs of water. The village, which consists of one single street, extending nearly from the forest to Stratford, and lighted with gas, is situated on a gentle ascent, rising gradually from the western bank of the river Lea; the hamlet of Leytonstone now comprises nearly one-half of the inhabitants of the parish. The Northern and Eastern railway passes through this place, and at the Lea-Bridge road is one of the intermediate stations on its line; the booking-offices and other arrangements form a handsome elevation in the Italian style.

The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 12.; net income, £534; patron, and impropiator of one-third of the rectorial tithes, J. Pardoe, Esq.; impropiators of the remaining two-thirds of the rectorial tithes, Executors of R. James, Esq. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £369. 14. 6., and the vicarial for £399. 15. The church, a plain brick edifice, with a tower at the west end, was repaired and enlarged in the seventeenth century, and again in 1822: the chancel contains some elegant monuments of the family of Hickes, and of that of Sir Robert Becheroff, lord mayor of London in 1721; also one of Mr. John Wood, who travelled over several parts of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; and one to the memory of the antiquary and biographer, the Rev. John Strype, who was vicar of Leyton from 1669 till his death, which took place in 1737, at the age of 94; he rebuilt the vicarage-house, and was a liberal contributor to the church and parish. A chapel of ease was erected at Leytonstone, in 1750, by subscription; and another has also been built, in which are 350 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £500 in aid of the expense. Within the parish are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. In 1697, Robert Ozler bequeathed £300 for the erection, and a rent-charge of £12 for the endowment, of a free school for a certain number of children of Leyton and Walthamstow; and there are national schools at Low Leyton and Leytonstone. Almshouses for eight widows were founded in 1653, by John Smith, who endowed them with £20 per annum, to which subsequent benefactions have been added. Sir Thomas Rowe, or Roe, an able statesman and ambassador, was born at Low Leyton about the year 1580; and Edward Rowe Mores, Esq., a distinguished antiquary, lived long in a house called Ethloe Place.

LEZANT (St. BREOCK), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 4½ miles (S. by E.) from Launceston; containing, with the hamlet of Trewarlet, 905 inhabitants. This place formerly belonged to the Manaton family, of Trecarrell House, of whom Ambrose Manaton had the honour to entertain Charles I. on his entrance into Cornwall, on the 1st of August, 1644. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Tamar, and on the south by its tributary the Inney, and comprises 3892 acres, of which about 400 are woodland, 233 common or waste, and the remainder chiefly arable. The surface is varied, and the scenery beautifully picturesque, especially on the banks of the Inney, at Trecarrell and Carthamartha; the substratum abounds with mineral wealth, and near Landew is a lead-mine in operation. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £32; net income, £406; patron, Bishop of Exeter. The church contains several ancient monuments. There were formerly chapels at Trecarrell and Landew; the former, of which there are some remains, was dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and the latter to St. Bridget, near the site of which is an old well. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is supported by subscription, for the instruction of the children of the poor.

LEZIATE, a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (E.) from Lynn; containing 172 inhabitants. It comprises 1469*a.* 2*r.* 29*p.*, of which 670 acres are arable, 462 meadow and pasture, 67 woodland, and 104 common or waste. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of Ashwicken: the tithes have been commuted for £280, and the glebe contains two acres. There are some slight remains of the ancient church of Leziate.

LIBBERSTON, or LEBBERSTON, a township, in the parish of FILEY, union of SCARBOROUGH, PICKERING lythe, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N.) from Hunmanby; containing 153 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1480 acres, the property of various families: the village, which is small and straggling, is on the road from Filey to Cayton, and about two miles and a half westward of the former place.

LICHFIELD, a city and county of itself, and the head of a union, in the S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 16½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Stafford, and 118 (N. W. by N.) from London; containing 6761 inhabitants. This place, called by Bede Licidfeld, and by Ingulphus and Henry of Huntingdon Lichfeld, both implying "the field of the dead," is supposed to have derived its name from the traditionary martyrdom of more than 1000 Christians, who are said to have been massacred here in the reign of the Emperor Diocletian: an allusion to this event appears in the corporation seal of the city; and a spot within its precincts, in which they are said to have been interred, still retains the appellation of the Christian field. During the heptarchy, it appears to have been distinguished by the kings of Mercia, of whom Peada, son-in-law of Osweo, King of Northumbria, having been converted by the preaching of Cedd, a hermit, who had a cell near the site of St. Chad's church, is said to have erected the first Christian church here in honour of that recluse, who had been assiduous in his efforts to convert the Mercians to Christianity, and afterwards became their bishop. In the reign of Offa, this see not only obtained the precedence of all the Mercian bishoprics, but through the interest of Offa with Pope Adrian, was made the archiepiscopal see, and invested with the greater part of the jurisdiction of Canterbury. Eadulph was appointed archbishop of Lichfield in 789, and had for his suffragans the Bishops of Worcester, Hereford, Leicester, Sidnacester, Elmham, and Dunwich; but, in 803, Leo succeeding to the pontificate, restored the primacy to Canterbury, and Eadulph, stripped of his supremacy, died in 812. At the time of the Conquest, Lichfield, notwithstanding the distinction which it enjoyed under the Saxon kings, was but an inconsiderable place; and in 1075, when the council decreed that episcopal sees should no longer remain in obscure towns, Peter, Bishop of Licedfeld, transferred his see to Chester, where it continued till it was removed by his successor, Robert de Limsey, to Coventry, whence it was, in 1148, restored to Lichfield, by Roger de Clinton, who began the church and fortified the castle, of which latter there is not the slightest vestige. At what time, or by whom, the castle was originally built, has not been clearly ascertained; but it is, upon very good authority, asserted that Richard II., after his deposition from the throne, was detained here as a prisoner, on his route to the tower of London. During the parliamentary war, Lichfield embraced the royal cause, and Charles I., after the battle of Naseby, slept for one night in the Cathedral Close, which, in 1643, Sir Richard Dyott, with some of the principal gentlemen of the county, under the command of the Earl of Chesterfield, fortified against the republican forces by which the town was besieged, under Lord Brooke and Sir John Gell, the former of whom, having stationed himself in the porch of an adjoining house, was shot, by a member of the Dyott family, from the battlements of the cathedral. The attack being continued by Sir John Gell, the garrison surrendered on honourable terms, and the parliamentarians retired, leaving a body of troops, who, in the following month, were repulsed by Prince Rupert: and the royalists kept possession of the town till its final surrender to the parliament. During these conflicts the cathedral suffered material injury; its rich sculptures were destroyed, it was converted into stables by the parliamentary troops, and, in 1651, it was set on fire, and, by order of parliament, left to neglect and decay.

The CITY is built in a pleasant and fertile vale, within two miles of the Roman station Etoctum, and about the same distance from Offlow Mount; another station at Swinfen. The houses in the principal thoroughfares are handsome and commodious; the streets in general are well paved, and the town is well lighted, and amply supplied with water. Certain property, called the Conduit Lands, was granted in 1546 to trustees, by the brethren of the guild of the Blessed Mary, in Lichfield, "for the common wealth of the city and town," and for keeping in repair the conduit pipes and pumps, providing fire-engines, and defraying other charges incidental to supplying the city with water from the springs at Aldershaw, which are about one mile and a half from the city: the property consists of about 340 acres of land, and produces nearly £600 per annum. In the environs are numerous elegant seats and villas. A mechanics' institute was established a few years since, and is held in a room of the guildhall; the Rev. Mr. Law, the president, has endowed it with books and natural curiosities, and also contributes liberally towards its support. A permanent library is maintained by subscription, and there is also a newsroom. A small theatre, in which Mrs. Siddons made her first appearance after her marriage, is open during the races, and occasionally at other times; and an amateur concert, called the Cecilian Society, has been established nearly a century. The races take place in September, when a queen's plate of 100 guineas is run for on the first day; the course is on the road to Tamworth, about two miles from the city. Lichfield is not a place of much trade; there are extensive coach and harness manufactories, and two factories for spinning worsted thread. The Wyrley and Essington canal runs within a quarter of a mile, and joins the Fazeley and Birmingham line about three miles distant. The railway from Manchester, viâ Stone, to Rugby, passes by Pows-mill, three-quarters of a mile distant, where is a principal station, with a new approach direct to the market-place. The market is on Friday, and there are cattle-markets on the first Monday in every month, for cattle, sheep, bacon, and cheese; the charter fairs are on Shrove-Tuesday and Ash-Wednesday, and there are others on the 10th of January, and first Tuesday in November. The market-house is a commodious building, occupying the site of the ancient market-cross; in the centre is a colossal statue in stone of Dr. Samuel Johnson, erected in 1838, and presented by the Rev. J. T. Law, chancellor of the diocese.

The city was anciently GOVERNED by a guild, at the head of which were a master and four wardens, assisted by a council of twenty-four brethren. This guild, established in 1387, was dissolved in the 2nd of Edward VI., who granted to the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, which was confirmed and enlarged by Mary and Elizabeth, the former of whom erected the city into a county of itself. Subsequent charters were conferred by James I. in 1623, and by Charles II. in the 16th of his reign, under the latter of which the corporation consisted of two bailiffs and twenty-one brethren, assisted by a recorder, steward, town-clerk and coroner, sheriff, and two serjeants-at-mace. The government is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the city is divided into two wards, the municipal and parliamentary boundaries being co-extensive; a sheriff is appointed by the council, and the number of magistrates is seven. Two chief constables are chosen by a jury of burgage tenants, at their court leet, held on St. George's day; and several petty constables at the great portmote court on the 22nd of July. The freedom of the city is inherited only by the eldest sons of freemen, and acquired by servitude in one of the seven trading companies of the Cordwainers, Smiths, Saddlers, Bakers, Weavers, Tailors, and Butchers. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 33rd of Edward I., and continued to make regular returns till the 27th of Edward III., from which period it ceased till the time of its incorporation by Edward VI., who restored the privilege; two members are sent to parliament, and the sheriff is the returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session, and also a court of record weekly, for the recovery of debts to any amount above 40s.; there is a sheriff's court every month, for the recovery of debts under that amount, and the justices preside at a petty-session weekly. The guildhall is a neat edifice of stone, ornamented with a pediment in front, in the tympanum of which are the city arms; the hall is spacious, and well adapted to the purposes of the several courts, and underneath is the common gaol for the city. Formerly an annual fête, called the Court of Array, took place on Whit-Monday in the guildhall, whence it was immediately adjourned to an eminence named Greenhill, where a temporary bower was erected; the expense was defrayed by the corporation. This ceremony is supposed by some to have been instituted by King Osweo, to commemorate a victory obtained by him over Penda; but others, with more probability, ascribe it to an act passed originally in the reign of Henry II., ordaining the high constable in each town frequently to inspect the arms of the inhabitants. It is still kept up with some difference, but the expense is now defrayed by subscription. The town is the place of election for the southern division of the county.

Lichfield was an EPISCOPAL SEE jointly with Coventry, and after the demolition of the abbey and conventual buildings at Coventry, became the sole seat of the diocese: the jurisdiction extends over the counties of Derby and Stafford, and a considerable part of the county of Salop, and comprehends 491 benefices. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, the archdeacons of Salop, Stafford, and Derby, fifteen prebendaries, five minor canons, an organist, six choristers, and other officers. The bishop has the patronage of the archdeacons, the chancellorship, the canonries, and twenty-one benefices, with an income of £4500 per annum. The Dean and Chapter, consisting of the precentor and fifteen prebendaries, have the patronage of the minor canonries, nine benefices, with an income of £1311, of which one-fifth part is paid to the dean, and the remainder divided equally among the canons. The minor canons form a corporation of twelve members, including five minor canons, an organist, and six choristers, with an income of £770, equally divided among them, with the exception of the choristers, who have each £2 per annum less than the minor canons. The Cathedral, which had been reduced during the parliamentary war to a state of extreme dilapidation, was restored by Dr. Hacket, on his preferment to the united sees of Lichfield and Coventry in 1661, to its original state of splendour and magnificence; various improvements have subsequently been made, and the choir has been greatly enlarged, under the superintendence of Mr. Wyatt, by the removal of the screen in front of the Lady chapel. The prevailing character of the edifice is that of the early English, approaching very nearly to the decorated style of English architecture; the west front is magnificently rich, and the spires of the western towers are in beautiful combination with the lofty central spire; the east end is hexagonal, and the whole exterior is highly ornamented in various parts with statuary and sculpture of exquisite design and elaborate execution; the interior presents various styles, with several later insertions. The transepts display considerable portions in the Norman character, and the choir, which deviates from the line of the nave, is in the decorated English style; it is richly ornamented, and lighted with windows of beautiful tracery: the bishop's throne, and the prebendal stalls, are fine specimens of tabernacle-work. St. Mary's chapel, built by Bishop Langton, is an edifice of elegant design, lighted with nine lofty windows, of which the three at the east end are more rich in their tracery, and are ornamented with stained glass brought by Sir Brooke Boothby from the dissolved abbey of Herckenrode, in the bishopric of Liege; in the central window on one side is a painting of the Resurrection, by Egginton, from a design by Sir Joshua Reynolds: in this chapel was the rich shrine of St. Chad, which was demolished at the Dissolution. Among the monuments that escaped the ravages of the parliamentary troops are those of Bishops Langton and Pattishull. There are, also, a monument to Dr. Johnson; a bust of Garrick; a mutilated statue of Captain Stanley, and a monument of exquisite beauty, by Chantrey, to the memory of the infant children of Mrs. Robinson, considered as a master-piece of sculpture, and which is unrivalled for beauty of design, intensity of feeling, and force of expression. A passage from the north aisle leads to the chapter-house, a decagonal building of great elegance, of which the finely-vaulted roof is supported on a clustered central column. Above it is the library, instituted by Dean Heywood, in which are the gospels of St. Chad, a Koran taken at the siege of Buda, and a folio edition of Chaucer, richly illuminated. The bishop's palace, on the north-east side of the Close, is a spacious edifice.

The city comprises portions of the PARISHES of St. Mary, of which that part in the borough contains 2634 inhabitants; St. Chad, containing 2036; and St. Michael, containing 1887; and the liberty of the Cathedral Close, which is extra-parochial, with 190 inhabitants. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, with Statfold annexed, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £458; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The church is a modern edifice, erected on the site of an ancient structure described by Leland as "right beautiful." The whole parish of St. Chad, including the villages of Elmhurst and Curborough, comprises by measurement 2488 acres; the rural portion of it is in general land of good quality, and in a state of profitable cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron, Vicar of St. Mary's; net income, £179. The church, by far the oldest in Lichfield, was rebuilt on the site of an ancient one erected by Bishop Headda, in honour of St. Chad, and near his hermitage. The parish of St. Michael comprises by computation 10,400 acres, of which by far the greater portion is arable; about 2000 acres are common, a part of which has been recently inclosed, and the remainder, with the exception of a little woodland, is meadow and pasture. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Mary's, with a net income of £154; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The church, a plain edifice in the later English style, situated on Greenhill, contains a tablet, with an inscription by Dr. Johnson, to the memory of his parents; the churchyard comprises from six to seven acres, and is the principal cemetery of the city. At Burntwood and Wall, in this parish, are chapels of ease, both erected by subscription. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Kilhamites, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school appears, from a small endowment payable out of the exchequer, to have been founded by Edward VI.; the school-house was erected in 1692, at the joint expense of the corporation and the feoffees of the Conduit Lands. The master receives from the latter £35 per annum, and the usher £10, from funds devised by Henry Beane, in 1546, for this and other purposes; the premises are also kept in repair by the feoffees. There are only six free scholars on the foundation, each of whom receives an annuity of £1. 6. 8., granted by Dean Walker to six scholars of the former school, in St. John's hospital, now transferred to this school. An English free school was founded in 1677, by Mr. Thomas Minors, who endowed it with a messuage for the school-house, and rents amounting to about £30 per annum. Andrew Newton, Esq., in 1801, bequeathed in aid of this charity the reversion of the dividends on £3333. 6. 8. three per cent. consols.; and the annual income is now upwards of £135. Humphrey Terrick, Esq., in 1652, left a messuage, the rental of which, amounting to £9 per annum, is appropriated in aid of a national school.

St. John's hospital was founded in the reign of Henry III., by one of the bishops of the diocese; and, in 1252, Randolph de Lacock, canon of Lichfield, endowed it with lands at Elmhurst and Stichbrook, for the maintenance of a priest, and the support of the poor and infirm. It was visited by the bishops of Lichfield for many years, but fell into neglect and decay, from which it was retrieved by Bishop Smyth, who was translated to the see in the reign of Henry VII.; that prelate rebuilt the premises in 1495, and formed the statutes by which it is at present governed. There are thirteen almshouses, apartments for the master and other officers, and a chapel; the last was enlarged in 1829, by the erection of a gallery and north wing, at the expense of the master of the hospital, and an organ was purchased by subscription; it has now a numerous and respectable congregation. An hospital for women was originally founded in 1424, by Bishop Hayworth, and endowed in 1504 by Thomas Milley, one of the canons residentiary, with lands, producing, with subsequent benefactions, an income of about £390, for the maintenance of fifteen aged women and a few out-pensioners. An institution for the benefit of widows or unmarried daughters of clergymen of the Church of England in the diocese, was founded by the above-named Mr. Newton, who endowed it with £43,333. 6. 8. consols., the dividends on which, amounting to £1238. 13. 8., are distributed in annual pensions of £50 each, among 20 individuals, who must be upwards of 50 years of age: the buildings of the institution, situated in the Close, contain apartments for 16 persons. There are also donations and bequests, amounting to £1000 per annum, for distribution among the poor. The union of Lichfield comprises 29 parishes or places, with a population of 24,127. Among the monastic establishments was a convent of Grey friars, founded in 1229, by Alexander, Bishop of Lichfield; it was burnt down in 1291, and being rebuilt, subsisted till the Dissolution; the remains are now let on lease, and the rents appropriated to charitable uses. Several relics of antiquity are preserved in Mr. Green's museum, among which is the wooden lintel or doorway, pierced by a ball which killed Lord Brooke, the parliamentary officer, during the siege of the cathedral. There is a chalybeate spring; and some good specimens of agate, in a state of decomposition, are found in the vicinity, where a fine sort of clay for pottery is also met with. Elias Ashmole, the antiquary, and founder of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford; Dr. George Smalridge, and Dr. Thomas Newton, both distinguished as theological writers; and the celebrated Dr. Samuel Johnson, were natives of this place: and among the residents were Garrick, Dr. Darwin, author of The Botanic Garden, and his ingenious biographer, Miss Seward. Lichfield gives the title of Earl to the family of Anson, created in 1831.

LIDBROOK, a hamlet, in the parish of NEWLAND, union of MONMOUTH, hundred of ST. BRIAVELL'S, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 42 inhabitants. Iron and tin works, said to have been the first established in the kingdom, furnish employment to a part of the population. Coal and timber are brought from the Forest of Dean, by means of a railroad constructed from the Wye to the Severn. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LIDDIARD-MILLICENT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Wootton-Basset; containing 564 inhabitants. The road from Cricklade to Wootton-Bassett passes through the parish. The land is pasture, with the exception of a small portion of arable and wood; the surface is in general flat, and the soil rich. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 4. 4½.; net income, £495; patrons, Master and Fellows of Pembroke College, Oxford. The church is in the later English style.

LIDDIARD-TREGOOZE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Swindon; containing 960 inhabitants. This place has, from the time of the Conquest, been the property of the family of St. John, viscounts Bolingbroke, whose mansion and park are near the church. The parish is situated on the road from Oxford to Bath, and comprises by admeasurement 5400 acres, of which 300 are arable, 350 woodland, and the remainder pasture. The Wilts and Berks canal and the Great Western railway pass through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 5. 5., and in the gift of Lord Bolingbroke: the tithes have been commuted for £603. 18. 5., and the glebe comprises 90 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the later English style, partly erected or rebuilt in 1653, by the St. John family, to whom it contains several splendid monuments. A parochial school is supported by Lord Bolingbroke and the rector.

LIDDINGTON (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Uppingham; containing 589 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 2240 acres; the soil is various, but the greater portion a dark stiff clay, and tolerably fertile: the surface is diversified with hills. The village is pleasantly situated in a valley watered by the river Welland, near which are some rich meadows. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 2., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Liddington in the Cathedral of Lincoln, the appropriator. The great tithes have been commuted for £216. 11., and the vicarial for £221. At Caldecott is a chapel of ease. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. In 1721, Mary Parnham bequeathed £200, to be laid out in land, and the rental applied in educating children. A palace formerly belonging to the bishops of Lincoln, a fine structure in the early English style, consisting of a large hall with painted windows, has been converted into an hospital for a warden, twelve brethren, and two nurses; the charity was founded in 1600, by Sir Thomas Cecil, Knt., Lord Burghley, and is called Jesus' Hospital.

LIDDINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Swindon; containing, with the tything of Coate, 454 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2736 acres, and is traversed by the road from London to Newbury and Hungerford: there are several chalk quarries. The living is a discharged vicarage, with a sinecure rectory, the former valued in the king's books at £14, and the latter at £17; the Duke of Marlborough presents to the rectory, and the Rector to the vicarage. The tithes were commuted for land, under an act of inclosure, in 1776; and a commutation has taken place under the recent Tithe act, for a rent-charge of £221: the glebe contains 60 acres, and an excellent house was built by the vicar, in 1833. The church is very ancient, with a tower, and has a roof, in the interior of timber-frame work. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. In this parish, romantically situated in a dell, and encompassed by a moat, is an old mansion, an interesting specimen of the Elizabethan style; and on Beacon Hill was a large circular work, called Liddington Castle.

LIDGATE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWMARKET, hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Newmarket; containing 450 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 5.; net income, £473; patron, Duke of Rutland. Near the church is a spacious and lofty mount, with some remains of extensive intrenchments, probably the site of a strong castle, of unknown origin. Lydgate, the poet, was born at this place, from which he took his name.

LIDLINGTON, or LITLINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of AMPTHILL, hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, 3½ miles (W. by N.) from Ampthill; containing 926 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £88; patron and impropiator, Duke of Bedford. The church contains an ancient tomb, with a brass effigy, in armour, of one of the Goldingtons, who possessed the manor of Goldington, in the parish, in the 15th century. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school for boys has a small endowment.

LIDNEY, or LYDNEY (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, hundred of BLEDISLOE, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 20 miles (S. W. by W.) from Gloucester, and 123 (W. by N.) from London; containing, with the chapelry of Aylburton, 1885 inhabitants, of whom 1146 are in the town. This place, which is situated on the road from Gloucester to Swansea, is by some writers supposed to have been the Roman station Abona; and though it may not be satisfactorily identified with that particular station, there are positive evidences of its occupation by the Romans. In Lydney Park are the remains of a Roman villa, and of two camps; near the western border of the larger camp is a Roman bath, still tolerably perfect; and fragments of tessellated pavement, urns, statues, coins of Adrian and Antoninus, and a silver coin of Galba, have been found near the spot. An ancient mansion called Whitecross, erected by Sir William Winter, vice-admiral of England in the reign of Elizabeth, was, in the civil war of the 17th century, fortified and garrisoned by Sir John Winter, a distinguished royalist, who defended it against repeated attacks by detachments from the parliamentary forces stationed at Gloucester, but at last set fire to and deserted it, having first despoiled the forest. The manufacture of tin plates is carried on to a great extent, and in connexion with it are iron-works. Limestone is quarried. The trade of the town is principally in the export of coal, and is greatly facilitated by the river Severn, which forms the eastern boundary of the parish; the Severn and Wye railroad terminates here, and a canal with a basin connects it by means of locks with the river. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs are held on May 4th and November 8th. The living is a vicarage, with St. Bri-avell's and Hewelsfield annexed, valued in the king's books at £24. 6. 8.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The great tithes have been commuted for £420, and the vicarial for £680; the glebe comprises 2 acres. The church is a spacious plain structure, with a beautiful spire. At Aylburton is a chapel of ease; and the Baptists have a place of worship. There are some chalybeate springs.

LIDSEY, a hamlet, in the parish of ALDINGBOURN, union of WESTHAMNETT, hundred of BOX and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Chichester; containing 772 inhabitants. It is situated on the Portsmouth and Arundel canal.

LIDSING, or LIDGEN, a vill, in the parish of GILLINGHAM, union of MEDWAY, hundred of CHATHAM and GILLINGHAM, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Chatham; containing 44 inhabitants. Here is a chapel of ease. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £100, and there is a glebe of 10 acres.

LIDSTONE, a hamlet, in the parish of CHURCH-ENSTONE, union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. N. W.) from Neat-Enstone; containing 161 inhabitants.

LIFTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Lifton and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Launceston; containing 1784 inhabitants. The manor and lordship were, by original grant of Edward VI., vested in the ancestors of W. A. H. Arundell, Esq., the present proprietor. The parish is watered by the rivers Tamar, Cary, and Lyd, of which the last flows into the Tamar, a little below Lifton park; the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified. Mines of manganese are worked. Fairs are held on the 14th of Feb., the first Thursday in June, and October 28th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £31. 2. 11.; net income, £423; patron, Mr. Arundell. The church has been embellished with a new altar-piece and with the royal arms, both presented in 1831, by the patron, at an expense of £200; it contains some rich monuments to the family of Harris, of Hayne. Two schools are partly supported by charity.

LIGHTCLIFFE, a chapelry, in the parish and union of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Halifax. This chapelry, which is included in the township of Hipperholme cum Brighouse, and in the manor of Wakefield, is on the road from Halifax to Leeds. Mr. Lamplugh Wickham, and Messrs. Ripley and Holland, have each a neat residence. There are some quarries of good stone for building. The chapel, dedicated to St. Matthew, is a neat edifice with a campanile turret, situated on an eminence, and has been rebuilt since its original foundation in 1529: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patron, the Vicar of Halifax. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and a Sunday school is supported by subscription. In 1829, in a gravel-pit near the chapel, were found several consular and imperial silver coins, and some gold British coins of Boadicea, in excellent preservation, and many of them extremely rare.

LIGHTGRAVE, or LEEGRAVE, a hamlet, in the parish and union of LUTON, hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Luton; containing 411 inhabitants.

LIGHTHORNE (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of SOUTHAM, Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Kington; containing 384 inhabitants. It is intersected by the road from Warwick to Banbury, and comprises 2025 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 17. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Lord Willoughby de Broke, who supports two schools: the tithes have been commuted for £327; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 118a. 2r. 33p.

LILBOURN (All Saints), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Rugby; containing 279 inhabitants. The parish is situated in the eastern part of the county, on the confines of the counties of Warwick and Leicester, and comprises 1667a. 3r. 28p. The village is on the line of the ancient Watling-street, and is supposed to have been the Tripontium of the Romans; vestiges of a castle may still be traced. The inhabitants are partly employed in the stocking manufacture. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6, and has a net income of £127, arising from 65 acres of glebe, allotted at the inclosure in commutation of tithes; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the impropriation belongs to Miss Downes, the Misses Arnold, and J. Arnold, Esq. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a parochial school is supported partly by the proceeds of land allotted at the inclosure. At Roundhill, about half a mile from the village, bones and skulls have been found.

LILBURN, EAST, a township, in the parish of EGLINGHAM, union of GLENDALE, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wooler; containing 80 inhabitants. The township is bounded on the east by the river Till, and comprises about 900 acres of land, of a dry gravelly soil; about two-thirds are arable, and the remainder pasture and moor; the surface is hilly and undulated; and an inferior kind of stone is quarried. This place is the property of A. J. Baker Cresswell, Esq., of Cresswell, and is in the occupation of John Gray, Esq. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £55. 7. 6., with a glebe of 28 acres, and the impropriate for £122. 12. 4. In 1768, on the removal of a heap of stones, the base and fragments of a cross, with four rows of steps, were discovered beneath.

LILBURN, WEST, a township, in the parish of EGLINGHAM, union of GLENDALE, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wooler; containing 226 inhabitants. It is situated on the Newcastle and Wooler road to Edinburgh, and comprises about 2000 acres, mostly arable, including 200 of woodland; the soil is rich, producing excellent and abundant crops; and the scenery embraces the Cheviot hills on the west, and on the east those of Chillingham. The Lill river runs through the township, and abounds in trout. With the exception of 26 acres belonging to the vicar, the place is the property of Edward John Collingwood, Esq. Lilburn Tower, a fine stone mansion in the Elizabethan style, was built in 1834, near the site of a border tower, from a design of Mr. Dobson's, at a cost of £25,000. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £262. 11. 7., and the vicarial for £130. 7. At the west end of the village, near the remains of the ancient mansion, are those of a chapel of ease.

LILFORD (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, hundred of HUXLOE, though locally in that of POLEBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Oundle; containing, with the hamlet of Wigsthorpe, 133 inhabitants. It comprises 1807*a.* 1*r.* 14*p.*, and is intersected by the road from Thrapstone to Oundle, and bounded by the river Nene. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Thorpe-Achurch, and valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 3½. A school is supported by Lord Lilford, who derives his title from the place.

LILLESALL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, Newport division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Newport; containing, with the townships of Donnington-Wood and Muxton, 3851 inhabitants. A branch of the Donnington-Wood, or Marquess of Stafford's, canal terminates in the northern part of the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 11.; net income, £322; patron and impropiator, Duke of Sutherland. A school is supported by subscription, and a school for girls by the Duchess of Sutherland. About 1145, an abbey for regular canons of the order of St. Augustine was founded here, which at the Dissolution had a revenue of £327. 10.

LILLEY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Luton, containing 475 inhabitants. The village is situated on the road from Hitchin to Luton, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the platting of straw. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 8. 9.; net income, £340; patrons, Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge: there is a glebe-house, with 30 acres of land. The Wesleyans have a place of worship.

LILLINGS AMBO, or EAST and WEST, a township, in the parish of SHERIFF-HUTTON, wapentake of BULMER, union and N. riding of YORK, 9½ miles (N. N. E.) from York; containing 208 inhabitants. The township, which comprises by measurement 1530 acres, is divided into the hamlets of East and West Lillings, and is situated at the head of the Foss navigation. Lilling Hall stands to the east of East Lillings. The tithes for West Lillings were commuted for land in 1769.

LILLINGSTONE-DAYRELL (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, 4½ miles (N.) from Buckingham; containing 187 inhabitants. It comprises 2223*a.* 1*p.*, of which 200 acres are arable, about 400 woodland, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the surface in some parts is hilly, commanding extensive prospects, and the lower grounds are watered by a brook that flows through the parish; the soil is clayey and deep. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 9. 7., and in the gift of Richard Dayrell, Esq., whose ancestors have been patrons upwards of 500 years, and have resided here for eighteen generations: the tithes have been commuted for £278. 8. 6., and the glebe comprises one acre.

LILLINGSTONE-LOVELL (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BUCKINGHAM, hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, though locally in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM (to which it is attached for electoral purposes), 4¾ miles (N. by E.) from Buckingham; containing 140 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1223 acres, of which 280 are arable, 827 meadow and pasture, and 108 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 9. 4½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £177, and the glebe comprises 39 acres.

LILLINGTON (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union, and hundred, of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of DORSET, 3½ miles (S. by W.) from Sherborne; containing 191 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 3½.; patrons, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon.

LILLINGTON (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of WARWICK, Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 1 mile (N.) from Leamington; containing 272 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1381 acres: sandstone of soft texture is found, and is quarried for building purposes. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 13. 4.; patron and impropiator, the Rev. Henry Wise: the tithes have been commuted for £167, and the glebe consists of 40 acres. The church is an ancient structure, combining various styles of English architecture. A parochial school, conducted upon the national system, is supported by subscription.

LILLISDON, a tything, in the parish and hundred of NORTH CURRY, union of TAUNTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Taunton; containing 238 inhabitants.

LILLY, a hamlet, in the parish of CATMERE, union of WANTAGE, hundred of COMPTON, county of BERKS, 5 miles (W. by S.) from East Ilsley; containing 74 inhabitants.

LILSTOCK (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANERS, W. division of SOMERSET, 11¼ miles (N. W.) from Bridgwater; containing 48 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by Bridgwater bay, in the Bristol Channel, and contains limestone of excellent quality for building, which is extensively quarried. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Stogursey: the tithes were commuted for land in 1803.

LILWALL, with PEMBERS-OAK and CHICKWARD, a township, in the parish and union of KINGTON, hundred of HUNTINGTON, county of HEREFORD; containing 380 inhabitants.

LIMBER MAGNA (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, E. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5¼ miles (N. by E.) from Caistor; containing 480 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5026*a.* 3*r.* 19*p.*; the substratum is chiefly chalk of hard texture, which is quarried for dressing the arable lands before frost, and also burnt into lime for manure. A statute fair is held on the first Monday in May. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £623; impropiator, the Earl of Yarborough: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1812. The church was given, in the time of Henry II., by Richard de Humet, constable of Normandy, to the Cistercian abbey of Aulnay or Aveny, in Normandy, the abbot and convent of which established a cell here; this cell at the suppression of alien priories, was sold to the Carthusians of St. Anne, near Coventry. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Robert Smith, Esq., in 1626, bequeathed property now producing £10 per annum, for distribution among the poor. The mausoleum of the Earl of Yarborough is in the parish.

LIMBER PARVA, a hamlet, in the parish of BROCKLESBY, union of CAISTOR, E. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N.) from Caistor; containing 49 inhabitants.

LIMBURY CUM BISCOTT, a hamlet, in the parish and union of LUTON, hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD, 2½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Luton; containing 316 inhabitants.

LIMEBROOK, a township, in the parish and hundred of WIGMORE, union of LUDLOW, county of HEREFORD; containing 178 inhabitants.

LIMEHOUSE (St. ANNE), a parish, in the union of STEPNEY, Tower division of the hundred of OSSLUSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 2 miles (E. by S.) from London; containing, with part of Ratcliffe hamlet, 21,121 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the north bank of the Thames, was formerly a hamlet belonging to Stepney, from which parish it was separated in 1730. It consists principally of a number of narrow streets and irregular buildings, diverging from the principal thoroughfare. There are several respectable houses; and among the numerous shops, warehouses, and manufactories, are some spacious and well-built structures, though many of the buildings are of an inferior description. The streets are partly paved, and lighted with gas. Here are a manufactory for sail-cloth and ropes, an extensive bleaching-ground, and large manufactories for articles in iron, particularly chain-cables, anchors, tanks, and all kinds of machinery. Ship-blocks are also made, and there are various other trades connected with shipping; ship-building is carried on at Limehouse Hole. At the eastern extremity of the parish are the West India Docks, which extend across the river to Blackwall. The northern dock, for unloading ships, covers thirty acres, and is capable of accommodating 300 West Indiamen; the southern, for unloading outward bound vessels, covers twenty-four acres, and will admit 200 ships; the former was opened in 1802, and the latter in 1805. They have extensive ranges of building in which foreign goods are deposited previous to the payment of the duty. A canal from the river Lea, called the New Cut, intersects the parish and joins the Thames, superseding the circuitous navigation round the Isle of Dogs; and the Regent's canal likewise passes through it, on the line of which, just before its junction with the Thames, is a basin capable of admitting vessels of from 200 to 300 tons' burthen. On the south side of the Commercial-road is a tram-road, from the West India Docks to Whitechapel, constructed at an expense of nearly £20,000. The London and Blackwall railway also crosses the parish. The living is a rectory not in charge; net income, £714; patrons, Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church, which is one of the fifty erected pursuant to an act passed in the reign of Queen Anne, is a massive structure, with two angular turrets at the east end, and a square tower at the west end, built after a design by Nicholas Hawksmoor, one of the pupils of Sir Christopher Wren. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A charity school for boys, a school for girls, and a national school are supported by subscription.

LIMINGTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of YEOVIL, hundred of STONE, W. division of SOMERSET, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Ilchester; containing 342 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Yeo, and comprises by measurement 1560 acres. Several of the younger females are employed in glove-making. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 6. 5½, and in the gift of Wadham College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £410, and the glebe comprises seven acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, and contains the effigy of Sir Richard Gyverney, founder of a chantry here, of which the chapel has a stone roof richly groined; on a pew in the chancel is the cipher of Cardinal Wolsey, whose first preferment was the incumbency of the parish, presented to him by the Marquess of Dorset. A national school, a handsome building, was erected in 1834, by subscription. There are some remains of an ancient camp.

LIMPENHOE, (St. BOTOLPH), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLOFIELD, E. division of NORFOLK, 5¼ miles (S.) from Acle; containing 186 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the navigable river Yare, and comprises about 1080 acres; it is intersected by the Norwich and Yarmouth railway. An act was passed in 1840, for inclosing certain portions of land. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Southwood, and valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; patron and impropiator, J. F. Leathes, Esq. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style, with a low square tower, and an enriched Norman doorway. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

LIMPLEY-STOKE.—See STOKE, LIMPLEY.

LIMPSFIELD (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of GODSTONE, First division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, E. division of SURREY, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Godstone; containing 1344 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Croydon to Maidstone, and contains some chalk-pits. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 0. 5., and in the gift of W. L. Gower, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £694. The tower of the church stands near the middle of the south aisle, and is surmounted by a wooden spire. A national school is supported by subscription.

LINACRE, with BOOTLE, a township, in the parish of WALTON-ON-THE-HILL, union and hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3½ miles (N. by W.) from Liverpool; containing 1962 inhabitants.

LINBRIGGS, a township, in the parish of ALLEN-TON, union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Rothbury; containing 62 inhabitants. This is a large township, consisting for the most part of fine green hills, and divided into stock farms. Bygate Hall, Makendon, Loungesknow, and Birdhope are all good sheep lands. The river Coquet, near the spot where the Ridlee burn joins it, is crossed by a bridge; and several fine brooks run through the glens in the neighbourhood, and join the river.

LINBY, or LYNDY (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BASFORD, N. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Nottingham; containing 271 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1474 acres: limestone of good quality is quarried for building and for burning into lime. There are two ancient crosses; one at each extremity of the village. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 9. 9½., and in the gift of R. F. Wilson, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £280, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is a neat plain structure, of small dimensions.

LINCH, a parish, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Midhurst; containing 70 inhabitants. The manor is described in the Domesday survey under the name of Lince, and at the time when that record was compiled, there were two ministers here, with a church. In the 16th century, the place was parcel of the estates of the Dukes of Norfolk; it afterwards became the property of Viscount Montague, and now belongs to the family of Poyntz. The parish may be divided into the two portions of Woodman's Green, situated in a well-wooded district on the road from Midhurst to Liphook, and Linch Farm, the latter occupying about 700 acres at the base of the downs, and consisting of a fertile soil of chalk marl. The church formerly stood at the latter place, but falling into a very dilapidated state, the present edifice was built at Woodman's Green, and there are now no remains of the old structure. Woodman's Green is within the limits of the borough of Midhurst, under the Reform act. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 12. 8½.; net income, £57; patrons, the family of Poyntz.

LINCHMERE, or LYNCHMERE, a parish, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (E.) from Liphook; containing 280 inhabitants. Linchmere was held as of the honour of Arundel, by William de Perci, at an early period, and afterwards became the property of the family of the Fitzalans; Sir William Fitzwilliam subsequently owned the place, and it has since descended as part of the Cowdray estate. No mention of Linchmere occurs in the Domesday survey. It is situated on the confines of the county, bordering upon Hampshire and Surrey, and comprises by admeasurement 2096 acres, of which 905 are woodland, 715 arable, 182 meadow and pasture, 24 gardens and orchards, and about 250 waste; the surface is varied, and the scenery finely embellished. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60; patron and impropiator, Rev. R. H. Baker. The church is chiefly in the early English style, and occupies an elevated site commanding rich prospects. The priory of Shulbrede, about half a mile from the church, in a sequestered spot, was founded by Ralph de Arderne, about the beginning of the reign of Henry III., for five canons of the order of St. Augustine; at the Dissolution the revenue was valued at £79. 15. 6.: there are some remains, now converted into a farm-house.

LINCOLN, a city and county of itself, and the head of a union, locally in the county of LINCOLN, of which it is the chief town, 132 miles (N. by W.) from London; containing within the city and ancient liberty 16,172 inhabitants, of whom 13,896 are in the city. This place was founded by the Britons, on the summit of a hill near the river Lindis, now the Arms.

Witham, from which it derived its name, and has been distinguished, from a remote period of history, as a city of considerable importance. After the invasion by the Romans, that people made it one of their principal stations in this part of the island, and established here a colony, which, in reference to the ancient British name of the place, they called Lindum Colonia, to which, through all the variations and contractions in its orthography by the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, the present appellation, Lincoln, may be distinctly traced. The Roman city was in the form of a parallelogram, defended by strong walls, and intersected at right angles by two streets, at the extremities of which were four gates, of which the northern, now called Newport gate, partly remaining, forms one of the most interesting relics of Roman architecture in the kingdom: it consisted of three archways; the central arch is formed of large rough stone apparently laid without mortar; one of the lateral arches is built up, and the other open. To the south-west of the gate is a considerable angular fragment of a Roman building, supposed to have been the mint; and there are various portions of the original fortifications, besides the remains of a bath and a sudatorium. After the departure of the Romans from Britain, Lincoln was made the capital of the kingdom of Mercia by the Saxons, in opposing whom, Vortimer, who had greatly signalized himself, was slain and interred here. During the repeated encounters which had previously taken place, the city had suffered great injury, and, for the security of its new inhabitants, it was substantially repaired: that part without the gate of Newport, which had been originally occupied by the Britons, was entirely rebuilt, and fortified with walls and a moat. In 786, the Danes took the city by assault, but it was retaken by the Saxons; and during these conflicts, which were resumed with extreme obstinacy, the northern suburb was completely destroyed. At length, on the subjugation of the Danes by Alfred the Great, tranquillity was restored; but under his successors the invaders renewed their attacks, and ultimately, in the partition of the kingdom between the contending parties, Lincoln, with the rest of the kingdom of Mercia, came into the possession of Canute.

At the time of the Conquest, a castle was erected here by William the Conqueror, which occupied nearly one-fourth part of the Roman city, and to make room for the erection of which, not less than 240 mansions were taken down. In Domesday book the city is stated to have contained 52 parishes; and it became the occasional residence of several monarchs, who contributed greatly to adorn it with a variety of splendid buildings, the numerous vestiges of which, in various parts of the town, convey but a faint idea of its former grandeur and importance. In 1140, the castle was surprised by the forces of a party in the interest of the Empress Matilda, and subsequently besieged by Stephen, aided by the inhabitants; but the Earl of Gloucester coming to its assistance with a powerful army, Stephen was made prisoner; and being afterwards exchanged for the earl, who was subsequently captured, he regained his liberty, and, after his restoration to the throne, celebrated the festival of Christmas here, in 1144. Henry II., on the death of Stephen, after being crowned king of England in London, underwent the ceremony of coronation a second time at Wigford, a little to the south of this city. John, in the third year of his reign, received here the homage of David, King of Scotland, and, during his struggle with the barons, the inhabitants remained steadily attached to his cause, and withstood the attempts of the opposing army for a considerable time; but the city was captured at last by Gilbert de Gaunt, afterwards created Earl of Lincoln. The castle was retaken by a party of royalists, after having been defended for nearly twelve months; but falling again into the hands of the barons, John, while marching to attack it with a powerful army, lost all his carriages in crossing the washes. After the death of this monarch, his son, Henry III., assisted by the inhabitants of Lincoln, who adhered firmly to the royal cause, continued the war with the barons, who, assisted by Louis, the Dauphin of France, laid siege to the city, but were vigorously repulsed by the inhabitants; many, endeavouring to escape, were drowned in the river Witham, and several others were taken prisoners. The castle, after remaining for a considerable length of time in the possession of the crown, came into that of the celebrated John of Gaunt, who made it his summer residence, and is said to have erected a palace here. Edward I. held parliaments in Lincoln, in 1301 and 1305; Edward II., in 1316 and the year following; and Edward III., in the first of his reign: it was visited by Henry VI., who held his court in the bishop's palace; and Henry VII., after the battle of Bosworth Field, spent three days here, where he made a splendid procession, and offered up public thanksgiving for his victory over Richard III. During the parliamentary war, the inhabitants embraced the royal cause, and the city was alternately in the possession of the contending parties, from both of whom it sustained considerable injury, more especially in its ecclesiastical edifices, which, during their occupation of the city, were converted into barracks by the soldiers of Cromwell's army. Among the disastrous events which have befallen Lincoln may be recorded the great storm in 701, which occasioned the destruction of 120 houses and many public buildings. In 1110, an accidental fire nearly consumed the whole city; and in 1185 it was greatly damaged by an earthquake. It may also be mentioned, that on the 27th of July, 1255, eighteen Jews were executed for the alleged crime of crucifying a child, and many more were murdered by the enraged mob.

The city is pleasantly situated on the summit and declivities of an eminence rising from the river Witham, the suburbs extending for a considerable distance along the vale to the north and south. In the upper part the streets are narrow, and the buildings, with the exception of those connected with the cathedral, are of rather mean appearance; the lower part consists principally of one spacious street, and, under an act of parliament recently obtained, many judicious alterations and improvements have been effected. It is paved and lighted with gas, and is supplied with water from three public conduits, of which that near St. Mary's church, Wigford, is an elegant building, in the later English style, decorated with a pierced parapet; and that near the High bridge is ornamented with a handsome obelisk, erected in 1763. The city library, established in 1814; the new permanent library; St. Martin's parochial library, founded in 1822; and the medical library, instituted in 1825, are well supported: and there are two newsrooms, and several book societies. The theatre is opened in September, October, and November; and assemblies are held in the city and county assembly-rooms. The races take place in September; a handsome stand has been recently erected on the course. In various parts of the town are the remains of the numerous monastic and other establishments which formerly flourished here; of these, the remains of John of Gaunt's palace are distinguished by a beautiful oriel window, and a building said to have been the stables belonging to the palace, has a finely-enriched Norman arch, with some interesting details of early English architecture. Of the castle, which occupied the south-eastern angle of the Roman city, very little remains, except part of the outer walls, which were seven feet thick, and the gateway tower: the site has been appropriated to the erection of the county gaol.

At the time of the Norman survey, Lincoln was distinguished for its COMMERCIAL importance, and Edward III. conferred a charter upon the weavers, prohibiting the exercise of that trade within twelve leagues of the city; but this decree, in 1351, was abolished by another, called "the statute of cloths," and in the following year, on the removal of the staple of wool from Flanders, it was established in this town, to which was also granted the staple of lead and leather. From the time of Edward III., however, till the commencement of the eighteenth century, the trade of the town gradually declined, and there are now no manufactures, the business being principally in corn and wool. The Fosse-dyke, a Roman work of considerable benefit to the interests of Lincoln, which Henry I. deepened, having again become unnavigable, from the accumulation of sand in its channel, the corporation in 1741 granted a lease of two-thirds of it for 999 years, at a rent of £50 per annum, and of the remaining third, for 99 years, at £25 per annum, to Mr. Ellison, of Thorne, by whose spirited exertions it was cleared from its obstructions, and reopened in 1745. It was widened and made deeper in 1826, and at present forms a line of communication, twelve miles in length, from the Witham to the Trent, completing the navigation from Boston and the eastern coast to the Humber and the Ouse, and to the several canals in the counties of Derby, Nottingham, Stafford, and York. The market, on Friday, is held for corn in a spacious square, called Corn Hill, in the parish of St. Mary; for butter and poultry, in a neat building near the church of St. Peter's-at-Arches, erected in 1736; for butcher's meat, in handsome and spacious shambles, erected by the corporation in 1774, adjoining Butchery-lane, and divided into convenient compartments; for fish, at the High bridge; and for cattle in the Beast-square, on the south of the city gaol. The spring markets are on the Thursday before the fifth Sunday in Lent, and every alternate Thursday till the April fair (which commences on the third Tuesday in that month, and continues four days); the Friday in Easter-week, July 5th, the Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday after September 12th, October 6th, and November 28th. A market for fat-cattle is held every other Wednesday; and there are statutes for hiring servants, on the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Fridays after old May-day.

Lincoln has from an early period enjoyed many privileges by prescription, and was formerly governed by a portreeve. At what period it was originally constituted a CORPORATION does not appear from any record. The oldest charter granted by the crown to the city, at this time in existence, is one by Henry II.; and numerous others were bestowed by various succeeding sovereigns prior to that of the 4th of Charles I., which until 1836, was the governing charter. In the reign of Edward IV., the city, with the parishes of Branston, Waddington, Canwick, and Bracebridge, was erected into a county, under the designation of the "City and County of the City of Lincoln;" but these four parishes, by the act 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 103, "for making temporary provision for the boundaries of certain boroughs," ceased to be liberties of the city, and were assigned to the county at large; and the parishes of St. Mary Magdalene and St. Paul, and part of the parish of St. Margaret, formerly in the wapentake of Lawress, are now included in the municipal borough. The controul is vested in a mayor, 6 aldermen, and 18 councillors, agreeably with the provisions of the Municipal Corporations' act; the borough is divided into two wards, called Minster and Bridge, and, being a county of itself, a sheriff is appointed by the council: the number of magistrates is twelve. The freedom is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, or acquired by servitude; among the privileges is that of depasturing a greater number of cattle on the common lands than a non-freeman. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 49th of Henry III., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the right of election was once vested in the freemen generally, whether resident or not, but is now in accordance with the Reform act: the sheriff is returning officer. A court of record, called the Foreign Court, at which the steward or his deputy presided, was formerly held every alternate week, for the recovery of debts to any amount, but it has nearly fallen into disuse. There is a court of quarter-sessions; and petty-sessions are held weekly in apartments adjoining the city gaol. A court of requests is held by commissioners appointed by an act passed in the 24th of George II., for the recovery of debts under 40s.; and there is a court leet twice a year. The guildhall is an ancient embattled structure, rebuilt in the reign of Richard II.; the south front consists of a fine arched gateway, flanked with two round towers. In a niche in the eastern tower is a statue of the angel Gabriel holding a scroll, and in a corresponding niche in front of the western tower is a statue of the Virgin Mary treading on a serpent; above the gateway, and in front of the towers, are the city arms and others. The sessions-house for the city is a neat brick edifice, erected in the New road, in 1809; and behind it is the city gaol and house of correction. The assizes for the county are held in the new county hall, an elegant structure, erected in 1823, after a design by Smirke, at a cost of £40,000. Petty-sessions for the parts of Kesteven are held here on the first Friday in every month, at the Rein-Deer inn; those for the parts of Lindsey are held every Friday at the "Judges' Lodgings," a handsome mansion, erected on the Castle hill, at the expense of the county. The county gaol stands on the south side of the area inclosed within the castle walls; the buildings are constructed on the plan of Mr. Howard. The city is the place of election for Lindsey.

Arms of the Bishopric.

Lincoln was erected into a SEE in the reign of William Rufus, when, in pursuance of the decree of a synod held at London, for the removal of all episcopal sees to fortified places, Remigius, Bishop of Dorchester, fixed upon this city as the seat of that diocese, and purchased lands for the erection of a church, an episcopal palace, and other requisite buildings. Having built the church, Remigius died previously to its consecration, and his successor, Robert Bloet, completed his design, beautified the cathedral, and increased the number of prebends. The diocese, which was originally very extensive, was, in the reign of Henry II., curtailed by the separation of a part, to form that of Ely; and in the reign of Henry VIII. it was further diminished by the separation of districts for the sees of Oxford and Peterborough; but it is still one of the largest in the kingdom, its jurisdiction extending over the counties of Lincoln, Buckingham, and Nottingham, and part of Hertford, and comprehending 1057 benefices. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, preceptor, chancellor, sub-dean, five archdeacons, thirty-four prebendaries, four vicars, eight vicars-choral, organist, seven poor clerks, eight choristers, seven Burg-hurst chanters, &c. The bishop has the patronage of the five archdeacons, the chancellorships of the church and diocese, the canonries, and 54 benefices, with the alternate patronage of three others, and an income of £4000. The Dean and Chapter, consisting of the dean, precentor, chancellor of the church, and sub-dean, have the patronage of the minor canonries, and 27 benefices, with the alternate patronage of one other, and an income of £6986, which is equally divided. The minor canons form a corporation, with an income of £115.

The CATHEDRAL, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is situated on the summit of the hill, near the castle. The original buildings, soon after their completion by Bishop Bloet, were greatly injured by an accidental fire, and repaired by his successor, Bishop Alexander, who, to prevent the recurrence of a similar calamity, covered the aisles with a vaulted roof of stone; the pressure of this, however, being too great for the strength of the walls, St. Hugh, a subsequent bishop, rebuilt the church in the reign of Henry II., and it has been since embellished and enlarged by various succeeding bishops. The prevailing character of this noble building is the early English style, intermixed occasionally with the decorated and later styles; the form is that of a double cross. The west front is partly Norman, intermixed with the richest character of the early English: the doorways are moulded and decorated with sculpture and statuary; over the central entrance are statues of several of the kings of England, and above is a fine window, highly enriched with tracery: the western towers are of Norman character in the lower stages, and of early English in the upper. A lofty and magnificent tower rises from the intersection of the nave and the principal transepts, and was formerly surmounted by a spire, which, in 1547, fell down and greatly damaged the roof: there were also spires on the western towers, which were taken down in 1807. The nave, of which the roof, as well as the roofs of the aisles, is vaulted, and supported on piers of peculiar richness, and arches of graceful form, is spacious, and lighted by a range of clerestory windows. At the end of the north transept is a fine circular window of the early English character; and at the extremity of the south transept is one of the most beautiful specimens of a decorated circular window extant. The choir, which is separated from the nave by an elaborately carved stone screen, is remarkably rich in its embellishments, and beautiful in its style; the east window, of eight lights, is a fine composition of flowing tracery, of the decorated character, and over the altar is a good painting of the Annunciation, by the Rev. W. Peters, R.A.; the piers and arches which support the roof are in the richest character of the early English style, and the bishop's throne and the prebendal stalls are beautiful specimens of tabernacle-work, highly ornamented. The Lady chapel, and some smaller chapels adjoining it, are peculiarly elegant. Among the numerous monuments are some of exquisite design; under an arch, to the south of the Lady chapel, and in the south aisle, are those of Bishops Russell and Longland, whose effigies are finely sculptured. In the north-west tower is the celebrated bell called Tom of Lincoln, of which the weight is nearly five tons, and the tone peculiarly excellent. Three sides of the cloisters are yet remaining in their original state, and exhibit a specimen of the decorated style; and on the fourth side is the library, of later erection, containing an extensive collection of books, and some curious Roman antiquities. In the centre of the quadrangle, and at some depth below the surface, a beautiful tessellated pavement was discovered a few years since, over which a covering has been placed, to protect it from injury. On the east side of the cloisters is a passage leading to the chapter-house, an elegant building in the form of a decagon, of which the finely-vaulted roof is supported on a single pillar in the centre. There are some remains of the episcopal palace, and of the conventual buildings connected with this extensive establishment, which, in grandeur, beauty, and antiquity, holds a prominent rank among the ecclesiastical edifices in the kingdom.

Lincoln formerly contained 52 parochial churches, of which number 34 were destroyed prior to the time of Edward VI. It comprises at present the PARISHES of St. Benedict, with 693 inhabitants; St. Botolph, 727; St. John Newport, 205; St. Margaret-in-the-Close, 330; St. Mark, 445; St. Martin, 2283; St. Mary-le-Wigford, 912; St. Mary Magdalene-in-the-Bail, 613; St. Michael-on-the-Mount, 1135; St. Nicholas Newport, 1053; St. Paul-in-the-Bail, 492; St. Peter-at-Arches, 548; St. Peter-in-Eastgate, 658; St. Peter-at-Gowts, 875; and St. Swithin, 2634. The living of St. Benedict's is a perpetual curacy; net income, £90; patron, Prebendary of North Kelsey in the Cathedral. The church is an ancient building, retaining some portions of Norman architecture. The living of St. Botolph's is a perpetual curacy; net income, £116; patron and appropriator, Prebendary of St. Botolph's in the Cathedral. St. John's Newport is a vicarage not in charge, united to that of Dunholme. The original church has long been demolished; a new one, a handsome structure of Lincoln stone, has been recently erected, and a diocesan school, for which a neat building in the Elizabethan style has also been erected, has been established in the parish. The living of St. Margaret's-in-the-Close is a perpetual curacy, united to that of St. Peter's-in-Eastgate: the church was taken down in 1778, and soon afterwards rebuilt. St. Mark's is a perpetual curacy; net income, £80; patron and appropriator, Precentor of the Cathedral. St. Martin's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4.; net income, £138; patron, Prebendary of St. Martin's in the Cathedral. St. Mary's Wigford is a discharged vicarage, valued at £5. 3. 9.; net income, £115; patron, Prebendary of Gretton in the Cathedral. The church retains considerable portions of its ancient Norman character. St. Mary Magdalene's-in-the-Bail is a discharged rectory, valued at £5; net income, £120; patrons, the Dean and Chapter. St. Michael's-on-the-Mount is a perpetual curacy; net income, £116; patron, Precentor of the Cathedral. The church is of comparatively modern erection. St. Nicholas' Newport is a vicarage not in charge; net income, £89; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The church has been demolished. St. Paul's-in-the-Bail is a discharged rectory, valued at £2. 5. 10.; net income, £68; patron, Archdeacon of Lincoln. St. Peter's-at-Arches is a discharged rectory, valued at £5. 12. 8½., and in the gift of the Crown; net income, £59. The church has been elegantly rebuilt as the corporation church, and is fitted up in an appropriate style. St. Peter's-in-Eastgate is a perpetual curacy, with that of St. Margaret-in-the-Close, united in 1778; net income, £147; patrons, the Precentor, and the Prebendary of Haydor in the Cathedral, alternately. The church has been rebuilt. St. Peter's-at-Gowts is a perpetual curacy; net income, £64; patron, the Precentor. The church is an old edifice, and has considerable vestiges of its ancient Norman character. St. Swithin's is a perpetual curacy; patron, the Precentor; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter; net income, £138. The church is of modern erection. There are places of worship for General and Particular Baptists, the Society of Friends, the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Independents, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics.

The free grammar school was founded in 1583: a school, formerly maintained by the Dean and Chapter, in the Cathedral Close, has been united to it, and is supported partly by the Dean and Chapter, who appoint the head-master, and pay two-thirds of his salary, and partly by the corporation, who pay the remainder: the premises form a portion of the old Franciscan priory, which was fitted up for use in 1583, by the founder of the school. A Blue-coat school was established in 1602, by Richard Smith, M. D., who granted lands at Potter-Hanworth for its support; a free school in the Bail was endowed with lands producing £12 per annum, by Mr. Wilkinson, under the direction of the governors of the Blue school; and a national central school was opened in 1813. The county hospital, a handsome brick building, was erected in 1769; the lying-in hospital was instituted in 1805; and the lunatic asylum, a spacious edifice, with a portico of the Ionic order, was built in 1820, at an expense of £15,000. There are various other establishments, and numerous benefactions for the relief of the poor, among which may be noticed a bequest by John Smith, Esq., of lands now producing £600 per annum; a legacy by Lady Margaret Thorold, of Marlston, in the year 1731, of £1500 South Sea annuities, for the purchase of land now yielding £60 per annum; and the great tithes of Glemham, bequeathed by Sutton, founder of the Charter-house, London. The union of Lincoln comprises eighty-seven parishes or places, with a population of 36,110. Among the many Monastic Establishments that anciently existed here, were, a unnery founded prior to the erection of the cathedral, and the site of which is occupied by the dean's house; an hospital for lepers, near the city, founded by Remigius, first bishop of Lincoln, or, according to other authorities, by Henry I., of which, in the reign of Edward III., the revenue was £30; a priory of Gilbertine canons, founded by Robert, second bishop of Lincoln, and dedicated to St. Catherine, of which, at the Dissolution, the revenue was £270. 1. 3.; a priory of Benedictine monks, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and a cell to the abbey at York, founded prior to the reign of Henry II., of which the remains, now called Monks' house, about half a mile to the east of the city, consist of the walls of several apartments and a small chapel; a house of Franciscan friars, of uncertain date; and houses of Carmelite and Augustine friars, the former founded in 1269, and the latter in 1291. Within the Close, a college of priests to officiate at the altar of St. Nicholas, in the cathedral, was founded in 1355, by Sir Nicholas de Cantelupe; and there were various other establishments, of several of which traces may be distinctly perceived in the city and its environs. The Jew's house is an ancient edifice of curious design, and belonged to Belaset de Wallingford, a Jewess, who was hanged in the reign of Edward I., for clipping the coin. Near Brayford water are some vestiges of a fort called Lucy Tower, between which and the castle was a subterraneous communication; and in the city is a chalybeate spring of considerable strength. Lincoln gives the inferior title of Earl to the Duke of Newcastle.

LINCOLNSHIRE, a maritime county, bounded on the north by the broad estuary of the Humber; on the east, by the North Sea, and by the wide arm of it called the Walsh; on the south, by the counties of Cambridge, Northampton, and Rutland; and on the west, by those of Leicester, Nottingham, and York. It extends from 52° 40' to 53° 43' (N. Lat.), and from 0° 21' (E. Lon.) to 0° 57' (W. Lon.), and contains 2748 square miles, or 1,758,720 statute acres. Within its limits are 72,964 houses inhabited, 2246 uninhabited, and 454 in progress of erection; and the population amounts to 362,602, of which number 181,758 are males, and 180,844 females. The county was anciently included in the territory of the Coritani, and, subsequently, in the Roman division of Britain called Britannia Prima; and, from the Roman remains still in existence, it is evident that those conquerors not only considered the district of importance, in the state in which they found it, but also made considerable efforts towards removing the natural disadvantages which have in a great degree disappeared before the more successful exertions of later ages. During the Anglo-Saxon era it formed a part of the kingdom of Mercia; its northern portion, the division of Lindsey, having been wrested from that kingdom by Edwin of Northumbria. Christianity seems to have been introduced here soon after the conversion of that sovereign, by the Romish missionary, Paulinus, who, according to Bede, after completing the great work of conversion in Northumbria, came into the northern part of Mercia, and converted Blecca, then governor of Lincoln, and baptized many people of this district in the river Trent. The see of Sidnacester, which is known to have comprised the district or province of Lindsey (although the site of Sidnacester itself is a subject of dispute among antiquaries), was established in 678, and continued until the latter part of the eleventh century, when St. Remigius, the nineteenth bishop, transferred it to Lincoln. This part of the English territory, owing to its locality, was particularly exposed to the incursions and ravages of the Danes, who wreaked their sanguinary fury upon it with especial frequency and violence.

Lincolnshire is included in the diocese of Lincoln, and province of Canterbury, and comprehends the arch-deaconries of Lincoln and Stow, each containing several deaneries, and together comprising 609 parishes. It is divided into three grand "Parts;" namely, Lindsey, which is by much the largest, including nearly one-half of the county; Kesteven, which forms the south-western part; and Holland, the south-eastern; and each of these districts is subdivided into several hundreds or wapentakes. The county contains the city of Lincoln; the borough and market towns of Boston, Grantham, Grimsby, and Stamford; and the market-towns of Alford, Barton-upon-Humber, Bolingbroke, Bourne, Caistor, Donington, Epworth, Falkingham, Gainsborough, Glandford-Brigg, Holbeach, Horncastle, Kirton, Louth, Market-Deeping, Market-Rasen, Sleaford, Spalding, Spilsby, Long Sutton, Swineshead, Tattershall, Wainfleet, and Wragby. Under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, four knights are returned for the shire, two being for the Parts of Lindsey, and two for the Parts of Kesteven and of Holland; two citizens are returned for the city of Lincoln, and two burgesses for each of the boroughs, except Grimsby, which sends only one. Lincolnshire is within the Midland circuit, and the assizes are held at Lincoln, where stands the county gaol. Quarter-sessions are held at Boston and Spalding, for the Parts of Holland; at Bourne and, by adjournment, Sleaford, for those of Kesteven; and at Kirton, Louth, and Spilsby, for those of Lindsey. The houses of correction are at Bourne and Falkingham, for the Parts of Kesteven; at Kirton, Louth, and Spilsby, for Lindsey; and Spalding, for Holland, with the exception of the wapentake of Kirton and Skirbeck, the house of correction for which is at Skirbeck.

The discriminative features of the SURFACE of Lincolnshire are strongly marked by nature, and consist of the lowland tracts, comprising about 776,960 acres; the heaths, about 118,400; and the Wolds, about 234,880. Contiguous to the sea, in the southern part, spreads a vast extent of low ground, much of which was once marsh, but is now become, by means of the exertions made during a period of almost 200 years, one of the richest tracts in the kingdom. The soils, besides other varieties in different situations, include clay, sand, loam, chalk, and peat, which are all found in extensive districts, and nearly all the variations extend in length from north to south. The extreme flatness of the Lincolnshire coast, together with the slight fall of the rivers in the lower part of their course, and the consequent sluggishness of their waters, which terminate in estuaries at its two extremities, occasioned the formation, in remote ages, of very large marshes, occupying the whole eastern side of the county, and forming upwards of a third of its area. The improvement of these marshes attracted even the attention of the Romans, by whom works were constructed to carry off the superabundant waters; and since that period numerous undertakings have been accomplished under legislative enactments and commissions, made in different reigns, from the Anglo-Saxon era to the present time. The effect of these, by cleansing the channels and improving the outfalls of rivers, by constructing canals, sluices, and drains, and by raising embankments, has been to convert about 180,000 acres of unprofitable fens into firm and excellent arable and grazing land, a vast portion of which may be classed amongst the richest and most productive in the kingdom. Rape is very extensively cultivated, more especially in the fens and lowlands, and is chiefly applied to the feeding of sheep. The wood grown is upon the deep rich loams, and frequently on the saline maritime levels; and as the plant thrives best on soil that has been under grass, pasture land is commonly broken up for its cultivation. The common artificial grasses are red and white clover, trefoil, lucerne, and sainfoin, with various kinds of hayseeds. Onions are cultivated in the Isle of Axholme. But the rich grazing lands of Lincolnshire are its distinguishing feature, in an agricultural point of view; they are to be found on a loamy clay, sometimes very stiff, but of uncommon fertility, and occupy a considerable portion of the county. The tides which come up the Trent, Ouse, Don, and other rivers that fall into the Humber, being exceedingly muddy, have given rise to the peculiar practice of warping, which is performed by letting in the water over the level lands on their banks, at high tide, whereby the muddy particles, provincially called warp, are deposited, and then permitting it to run off again at the ebb, by means of canals and sluices.

The two principal breeds of cattle are the Lincolnshire short-horned and the Leicestershire long-horned, the former of which is generally preferred. In the vicinity of Falkingham is a dun-coloured breed, said to have been originally brought from the Isle of Alderney; and in different parts are a few cattle of other breeds and crosses. The chief objects of the farmers being breeding and fattening, there are no dairies except for private use and the supply of the neighbouring markets with butter. The two prevailing kinds of sheep are the native Lincoln and the Leicester, the latter of which has become very general: it is computed that not less than 2,400,000 sheep are usually kept in the county. A considerable number of horses is bred, especially in Holland fen; about Normanby, Barton, &c., many saddle and coach horses are reared, and on the Wolds some of the finest blood horses in the kingdom, greater attention being paid to them here than even in Yorkshire or Durham. Many thousand acres are occupied as rabbit warrens in the county; and numerous flocks of geese are kept in the low fenny tracts, though not to the same extent as formerly. Few branches of manufacture are carried on, and those only to a limited degree. A good deal of flax, however, is spun and woven into linen in the neighbourhood of Normanby and Barton; and in Holland Fen the female population spin flax, and, about Falkingham, flax and hemp. At the port of Gainsborough, besides the ship-building, which is an important branch of business, a considerable quantity of rope and coarse hemp sacking is made.

The principal Rivers are, the Trent, the Welland, the Witham, and the Ancholme. The Trent, after having separated the tract called the Isle of Axholme from the great body of the county, unites with the Ouse in forming the large estuary of the Humber, and is navigable up to Gainsborough for merchant vessels of considerable burthen, and for barges in all the rest of its course along the border of Lincolnshire. The Welland enters the county on the south, and divides into two branches, one of which proceeds south-by-east to Wisbech, in the county of Cambridge, apparently in the natural channel of the stream; while the other continues a sluggish course through an artificial bed to Spalding, below which town, after having been enlarged by the waters of the Glen, it empties itself into Foss-dyke Wash, to the south of Boston. The Witham rises near South Witham, about ten miles north of Stamford, and falls into the ocean at Boston Deep: from Boston, upwards towards Lincoln, much of its present channel is artificial, made to improve the navigation, and the drainage of the adjacent fens. The Ancholme rises in the Wolds near Market-Rasen, and empties itself into the Humber, from which it has been rendered navigable as high as Bishop-bridge. The large bay, or estuary, called the Wash, into which the rivers passing through the immense tracts of fen land in the south-eastern parts of the county are disembogued, is for the most part extremely shallow, and full of shifting sands. An artificial navigation was cut in 1788, along the course of the Witham, from Boston to Lincoln, whence it is continued by the Foss-dyke canal to the Trent; and a canal from the river Witham, at Sleaford, to Boston, was finished in 1796. The Grant-ham canal, completed also in 1796, at an expense of about £100,000, extends from Grantham, through the north-easternmost part of Leicestershire, to the Trent, near Holme-Pierrepont, being 33 miles in length. The Ancholme cut, which drains the Ancholme level, is navigable from Bishop-bridge to the Humber, at Ferraby sluice. A navigable canal has also been formed from Horncastle to the river Witham, at Dog-dyke, near Tattershall; and another from Louth to the sea, at Tetney.

The Roman stations were, Ad Abum, supposed to have been at Winterton; Aquis, at Aukborough; Bannovalium, at Horncastle, or Ludford; Causennæ, at Ancaster, or Great Ponton; Crococolana, at Brough; Lindum, at Lincoln; and Vainona, at Wainfleet. Remains of Roman buildings, and various miscellaneous relics of that people, have been found on the sites of these different stations; and some of minor importance have also been discovered at Scampton, Torksey, Stow, Gainsborough, Caistor, Well, Gedney-Hill, Whaplode, Pinchbeck, Sleaford, Little Ponton, and Denton. The British Ermin-street, which was afterwards used by the Romans, enters the county to the west of Stamford, and about five miles to the north of Lincoln has a branch diverging from it in a north-westerly direction to Doncaster: another branch from the Ermin-street, about six miles north of Stamford, proceeded towards Ad Pontem, in its way to Southwell and Bawtry. The Fosse-way, beginning on the coast, not far from Ludborough, is visible from Ludford to Lincoln, and forward to Brough, and beyond that place in its course towards Newark. The British road called the Salt-way, branched from the Ermin-street near Ponton, and ran by Denton into Leicestershire. There are remains of other British trackways, particularly of one running from Horncastle towards Caistor and the Humber. The Old Sea Bank is supposed to have been constructed by the Romans, to protect the district of South Holland from inundation; and the large drain called the Car-dyke, signifying the "fen dyke," is also ascribed to the same people; it extends from the river Welland, on the south side of the county, to the Witham, near Lincoln, and is sixty feet wide, with a broad flat bank on each side. Prior to the Reformation, there were 108 religious houses, including five alien priories, five houses of the Knights Templars, five colleges, and fourteen hospitals; the principal remains are those of the abbeys of Bardney, Barlings, Crowland, and Swineshead, of Semperingham Priory, and of Thornton College. The most remarkable ancient castellated buildings remaining, either wholly or in part, are the castles of Tattershall, Torksey, Lincoln, and Falkingham; and there are similar remains at Horncastle, Caistor, Somerton, Stamford, Scrivelsby, Bolingbroke, Pinchbeck, and Pilham; to which may be added Moor, Kyme, and Hussey towers. Of the castles of Bourne and Sleaford, only the earthworks now exist. There are ancient encampments near Brocklesby, Hibalston, Broughton, Roxby, Winterton Cliffs, Aukborough, Yarborough, South Ormsby, Burwell, Stamford, Gainsborough, Winterringham, Humington, Ingoldsby, Castle-Charlton, Burgh, Brough, and Barrow. In the parishes of Tetney, Fulstow, and the vicinity, are some blow-wells, or flowing pits of clear water, about thirty feet in depth, the discharge of which is very powerful. The division of Lindsey gives the title of Earl to the family of Bertie; and that of Holland confers the dignity of Baron upon the family of Fox.

LINDALE, a chapelry, in the parish of CARTMEL, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Cartmel. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £71; patron, Earl of Burlington. The church has been rebuilt, and contains 115 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £125 in aid of the expense. Here is a national school for boys.

LINDEN.—See BIGGE'S-QUARTER.

LINDETH, or LINDRETH, with WARTON, a township, in the parish of WARTON, union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Burton-in-Kendal; containing 633 inhabitants.

LINDFIELD (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of CUCKFIELD, hundred of BURLEIGH-ARCHES, or BURARCHES, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Cuckfield; containing 1939 inhabitants. The parish is on the river Ouse, and comprises 5826a. 3r. 22p. The village, in which is a post-office, is pleasantly situated on the road from London to Brighton; the river is navigable for barges to Ryebridge, and the London and Brighton railway passes within a mile to the west of it. A corn-market is held on Monday; and there are fairs for sheep and cattle on the 1st of April and 12th of May, and for lambs on the 5th of August. The living is held by an impropriator, who pays a small stipend to a curate, which is augmented by subscription. About two-fifths of the parish are tithe-free; the impropriator receives about £500 per annum. The church is in the decorated and later English styles. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a school of industry, founded by William Allen, Esq., of London, for the instruction of children in the art of agriculture, and in various trades. Here are several chalybeate springs.

LINDHURST, an extra-parochial place, in the union of MANSFIELD, wapentake of BROXTOW, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM; containing 10 inhabitants.

LINDLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of HIGHAM-ON-THE-HILL, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Hinckley; containing 76 inhabitants. Here are the ruins of an ancient chapel. William Burton, the Leicestershire antiquary and historian, and his brother Robert, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, were natives of this place, the former born in 1575, and the latter in 1576.

LINDLEY CUM QUARMBY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 2 miles (N. W.) from Huddersfield; containing 2881 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises 1403a. 1r. 28p., of which about 30 acres are woodland, and the remainder, with a trifling exception, pasture; the surface is elevated, commanding views of Huddersfield and the surrounding country; the substratum abounds with good building-stone, which is extensively quarried. The village is large and well built, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the woollen manufacture, for which there are four large establishments, belonging respectively to Messrs. Sykes, Broadbent, Fox, and Hepworth. A district church, dedicated to Stephen, was erected in 1830, at an expense of £2700, granted by the Parliamentary Commissioners; it is a handsome structure, in the later English style, and contains 800 sittings, of which one-half are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150, with an excellent glebe-house in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1838, at an expense of £1200; patron, the Vicar of Huddersfield. The site for the church and cemetery was given by John Thornhill, Esq., lord of the manor. There are places of worship for Baptists, Kilhamites, and Wesleyans. A school endowed with £100 by Mr. Samuel Haigh, was rebuilt in 1817, at an expense of £130; and there is also a national boys' and girls' school, built in 1832, at a cost of £400.

LINDLEY, a township, in the parish of OTLEY, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Otley; containing 140 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1760 acres, wholly the property of F. H. Fawkes, Esq. The village consists of a few scattered houses, in the vale of the Washburn rivulet, on the banks of which are some corn-mills. Here are considerable remains of an ancient hall, the seat of the Palmes family, who are interred in Otley church, and to whom is a very ancient monument tracing their pedigree to the 13th century.

LINDRICK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ripon; containing 17 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 800 acres, divided into two well cultivated farms. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £8. 10., payable to the Dean and Chapter of Ripon.

LINDRIDGE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of TENBURY, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, though locally in the Upper division of that of DODDINGTREE, Hundred-House and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Tenbury; containing, with the chapelries of Knighton-upon-Teame and Pensax, 1815 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated at the western extremity of the county, and bounded on the west by Shropshire, and on the south by the river Teame, comprises 6168 acres, of which 2486 are in the township. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £26. 12. 11.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Worcester: the great tithes have been commuted for £479, and the vicarial for £600, and the glebe comprises 107 acres. There are chapels of ease at Knighton and Pensax.

LINDSELL, a parish, in the union and hundred of DUNMOW, N. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Thaxted; containing 393 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £134; patrons and improprators, Executors of the late S. Algar, Esq. The church, a small ancient edifice, consists of a nave and chancel, with a steeple on the south side.

LINDSEY (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of COSFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Hadleigh; containing 290 inhabitants, and comprising 1246a. 1r. 9p. The woollen manufacture was formerly carried on; and an article made here, was, for its peculiar quality, distinguished by the name of "Linsey Woolsey." The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Kersey, annexed; net income, £112; patrons and improprators, Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge, whose tithes have been commuted for £320. On a farm called the Chapel Farm, are the remains of an old chapel, dedicated to St. James, now used as a barn; and on the same estate is an ancient encampment.

LINEHAM (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Wootton-Bassett; containing 1317 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the river Avon, and on the road from Bristol and Bath to London, and comprises by measurement 4000 acres, of which one-half is arable, and the other pasture. There are some quarries of stone, used for inferior building purposes, and for the roads. The Wilts and Berks canal passes within less than half a mile, and the Great Western railway in the immediate vicinity. Fairs, chiefly for cattle, are held at Click, at Michaelmas and Lady-day. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £58; patron and improprator, G. W. Heneage, Esq.; the glebe comprises 3 acres. The church is an ancient structure. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Lady Huntingdon's Connexion; and a school is endowed with 24 acres of land, producing £32 per annum. In the neighbourhood is a farmhouse, which occupies the site of Bradenstoke priory, founded about 1142, by Walter d'Eureux, or de Saresbiria, for Augustine monks, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

LINESIDE, a township, in the parish of ARTHURET, union of LONGTOWN, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Longtown; containing 128 inhabitants. The township lies at the confluence of the Esk and Line rivers, and is intersected by the Hallburn rivulet. A school has a small endowment.

LINFORD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of RINGWOOD, N. division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, Lymington and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 24 inhabitants.

LINFORD, GREAT (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Newport-Pagnell; containing 474 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Ouse, and comprises 1787a. 2r. 6p., of which 371 acres are arable, 1185 pasture, 118 meadow, on the banks of the river, and 78 woodland. Its substratum contains limestone, which is quarried chiefly for the roads, but beneath it is a layer of firmer texture, impervious to the effect of atmospheric influence, which might be well used for building purposes. Many of the females are employed in making bobbin-lace. The Grand Junction canal, and the Newport-Pagnell branch, both pass through the parish; and the Wolverton station on the London and Birmingham railway is within two miles. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 0. 2½., and in the gift of H. A. Uthwatt, Esq., lord of the manor: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises 27½ acres. The church is a neat structure, in the later English style, with a north porch, of which the roof is elegantly groined. There is a place of worship for Independents. In 1702, Sir William Pritchard bequeathed a rent-charge of £24 in support of an almshouse for six persons, and another of £10 for instruction; and Lady Pritchard subsequently left a sum of money for apprenticing boys, and clothing the almspeople. In the clay formation on which the parish is situated, are found various fossils; and on the lands of Mr. Uthwatt, is a copious spring strongly impregnated with sulphuretted hydrogen gas, similar in its properties to the Harrogate water. Dr. Richard Sandy, otherwise Napier, presented to the rectory in 1589, was held in superstitious reverence for his skill in the sciences of physic and astrology.

LINFORD, LITTLE (ST. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Newport-Pagnell; containing 64 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Ouse, and is principally grazing land, with some rich meadows on the banks of the river. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £66; patron and impropriator, Rev. P. Knapp, lord of the manor. The church was formerly a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Newport-Pagnell: the inhabitants bury at Haversham.

LING (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of ANDERSFIELD, W. division of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Bridgwater; containing, with part of the hamlet of Boroughbridge, 422 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1409*a.* 35*p.*; the river Parret flows on the north-east, and the Tone on the south-east, over the latter of which a neat bridge has been erected. The Isle of Athelney, celebrated as having given shelter to Alfred the Great in his retreat from the Danes, but now no longer an island, is situated in the parish; and a small obelisk, with a commemorative inscription, has been erected on the spot by the owner of the land. A fair is held on the second Monday in August. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 8. 4.; patron and impropriator, Hill Dawe, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £85, and the vicarial for £36, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is an ancient structure. A church has been erected at Boroughbridge, to which a district was assigned in 1840. A national school is supported by subscription. At Athelney, about 888, Alfred founded a Benedictine abbey, which he dedicated to Our Saviour and St. Peter, and the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, amounted to £209. 0. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$.; many architectural remains, bones, and other relics have been dug up on the site of the conventual buildings, which appear to have been both extensive and magnificent.

LINGARTHS, a township, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Huddersfield; containing 801 inhabitants. The township comprises 526*a.* 36*p.*, the property of the Earl of Dartmouth, who is lord of the manor; the surface is hilly, affording good moorland pasture, and the substratum abounds with stone of excellent quality for building and paving. The village is small, the surrounding scenery pleasing, and the township contains part of the village of Slaithwaite, in which most of the population reside.

LINGEN (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of KNIGHTON, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Presteign; containing 285 inhabitants. It is situated in the northern part of the county, near the borders of Radnorshire, and comprises 2283 acres; the road from Presteign to Ludlow intersects the parish, which is also watered by a branch of the river Lug. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £70; patrons, the Trustees of the late Rev. Thomas Wynn. There are some vestiges of an ancient religious house.

LINGFIELD (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of EAST GRINSTEAD, First division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, E. division of SURREY, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Godstone; containing 1866 inhabitants. The parish is separated from the county of Kent by the river Eden, and comprises by measurement 9008 acres, of which 4000 are arable, 4000 meadow and pasture, and 1008 woodland. The living is a perpetual curacy;

net income, £150; patron and impropriator, Robert Ladbroke, Esq. The church, which was founded by Reginald, Lord Cobham, in the reign of Henry VI., consists of a nave, side aisles, and chancel, with a tower surmounted by a spire at the west end of the south aisle, and is in the early English style; in the interior are some curious monuments, and several brasses. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents; and a parochial school is chiefly supported by subscription. In the 9th of Henry VI., Reginald, Lord Cobham, had licence to found a college here, and to make the parochial church collegiate; he built the college at the west-end of the churchyard. At the Dissolution the revenue was valued at £79. 15. 10.; the buildings remained till about the time of George I., when they were pulled down, and a farm-house was built on part of the ground. At Starborough was a castle, which was fortified and embattled in the reign of Edward III. by Reginald, Lord Cobham, and was garrisoned by the parliament during the civil war, shortly after which it was demolished; the moat, which remains, forms a handsome sheet of water to the present mansion erected by Sir James Burrow, and considerably enlarged by Sir Thomas Turton. On part of the site of the castle, Sir James built a large room, over some of the ancient vaults, with the stones on the spot: from the top, which is embattled, is a fine view of the surrounding country. In Plaistow-street, near the church, is an old obelisk of stone of two stories.

LINGWOOD (St. Peter), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLOFIELD, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Acle; containing 473 inhabitants. It comprises 661 acres, of which the surface is well wooded, and the scenery of pleasing character. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £55; patron and incumbent, Rev. E. Goddard, whose tithes, as impropriator, have been commuted for £256. 15. 6. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. The population includes 102 persons in the workhouse here.

LINKENHOLT (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of PASTROW, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Great Bedwin; containing 109 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 5.; patron and incumbent, Rev. J. M. Colson, LL.B., whose tithes have been commuted for £168, and who has a glebe of 41 acres.

LINKINHORNE (St. Mellor), a parish, in the union of LISKEARD, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 4 miles (N. W.) from Callington; containing 1525 inhabitants. It comprises 6000 acres, of which 800 are common or waste. On Caernadon, or Carraton, downs, in the parish, Charles I. drew up his forces, in 1644, the day after he had entered Cornwall; and here he was joined by Prince Maurice. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13; net income, £312; patron, Rev. Mr. Kempe; impropriators, W. Cawsey and J. T. Coryton, Esqrs. Here are the remarkable rocks called the Cheese-wring and the Hurlers, and also Sharp Tor, from which is a very fine view. A free school was founded and endowed with the interest of £705, by Charles Roberts, and is conducted on the national system.

LINLEY (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of MADELEY, and within the liberty of the borough of WENLOCK, S. division of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bridgenorth; containing 111 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, united to that of Broseley.

LINMOUTH, a township, in the parish of WOODHORN, union of MORPETH, E. division of MORPETH ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Morpeth; containing 31 inhabitants. The township, which comprises about 300 acres, derives its name from its situation near the influx of the river Line into the ocean. In 1240, John, son of Robert Rue, held this place by military service; and in the 11th of Edward III. the Countess of Pembroke conveyed it to John de Denton, burgess of Newcastle; since which date possessions have been held by various families, including those of Eure, Horsley, Watson, Atkinson, and Bradford. It is now the property of Mr. Bradford Atkinson, of Angerton. In 1822, a spermaceti whale, 61 feet in length, and 37 feet in circumference, came on shore at the mouth of the river, and was harpooned; it produced 9 tuns and 158 gallons of oil, which were claimed by the admiralty as a droit of the crown.

LINOP, with INGRAM and GREENSHAW-HILL, a township, in the parish of INGRAM, union of GLENDALE, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Wooler; containing 92 inhabitants. In the township is Linop Spout, or Roughting Linn, a cataract, the precipice of which is 48 feet high, and the basin 7 feet in diameter, and 15 feet in depth. About three miles to the north-west are the Cardlaw cairns, some sepulchral monuments of the earliest inhabitants of the island. In the vicinity are foundations of an ancient British town; and a British road passes near the place, in its course to Langley ford.

LINSHEELES, a township, in the parish of HALLYSTONE, union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Rothbury; containing 98 inhabitants. It is situated on the south side of the river Coquet, at the confluence of the Redlees burn, and about a mile and a half west from Alwinton.

LINSLADE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Leighton-Buzzard; containing 883 inhabitants. This place in the reign of Henry III. belonged to William de Beauchamp, to whom, in 1251, that monarch granted the privilege of a market on Thursday, and a fair on Lady-day to continue for eight days. It was the resort of numerous pilgrims to visit a holy well, till, in 1299, they were prohibited by Oliver Sutton, Bishop of Lincoln, who summoned the vicar for having encouraged the practice for his own emolument. The parish comprises by computation 1648 acres, of which 660 are arable, 853 pasture, and 32 woodland: the Grand Junction canal and the London and Birmingham railway pass through it. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £65; patron and impropriator, W. Pulsford, Esq.

LINSTEAD (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of FAVERSHAM, hundred of TEYNHAM, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 3 miles (S. E.) from Sittingbourne; containing 1050 inhabitants. It comprises 1806a. 2r. 2p., of which about 1260 acres are arable, 200 pasture, 200 woods, and the rest orchards, gardens, &c. A fair for horses and cattle is held at Greenstreet, in the parish, on May 1st. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £216; patron and appropriator, Archdeacon of Canterbury. Bartholomew Fowle, the last prior of St. Marie Overie, was a native of this place, and received from it the additional name of Linstead.

LINSTEAD MAGNA (St. Peter), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Halesworth; containing 92 inhabitants, and comprising 1286 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with a portion of the tithes; patron, the Rev. E. Holland; impropriator, Lord Huntingfield. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £315, and those of the perpetual curate for £82. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower.

LINSTEAD PARVA, or LOWER LINSTEAD (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Halesworth; containing 205 inhabitants. It comprises 554 acres, of which 31 are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with a portion of the tithes, which have been commuted for £77. 10. payable to the impropriator, and £48 payable to the curate, whose total net income is £86; patron, the Rev. J. Sprigge; impropriator, Lord Huntingfield. The church is in the later English style, and contains a curiously sculptured font.

LINSTOCK, a township, in the parish of STANWIX, union of CARLISLE, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Carlisle; containing 220 inhabitants. Here was once a castle, which, till 1229, was the only palace of the see of Carlisle. About 1293, Bishop Halton entertained Johannes Romanus, Archbishop of York, in it, with a suite of 300 persons, during his visitation; and, in 1307, Edward I. kept his court here for six days. The edifice was repaired and modernised in 1768; the ancient square tower is still remaining. A little north-eastward of Linstock is Drawdykes Castle, originally erected with the materials of the Roman wall, which crossed its site, and partially rebuilt in the seventeenth century, by John Aglionby, Esq., recorder of Carlisle, who placed on the battlements three Roman stone busts, which yet remain: this ancient seat is now used as a farm-house.

LINTHORP, a township, in the parish of MIDDLESBOROUGH, union of STOCKTON-UPON-TEES, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. S. W.) from Middlesborough; containing 246 inhabitants. The township, which comprises 1300 acres, in the district called Cleveland, is situated on the river Tees, and includes the hamlet of Ayresham, and the modern village of Newport. It constitutes a part of the manor of Acklam, and as the lands here are not mentioned in Domesday book, they may be presumed to have been included under the survey of that place. Thomas Hustler, Esq., of Acklam Hall, is lord of the manor, and chief owner of the soil. On the river is a ferry, with a wharf having extensive granaries: the road between Stockton and Guisborough lies to the south.

LINTHWAITE, a chapelry, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Huddersfield; containing 2710 inhabitants. The chapelry consists of the chief part of the township of Linthwaite and a small portion of that of South Crossland. The township of Linthwaite is on the Huddersfield and Manchester road, and between the two branches of the river Colne, and comprises by computation 1300 acres, principally the property of Sir Joseph Radcliffe and W. Walker Battye, Esq. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the numerous mills and factories established for the manufacture of woollen-cloth, which is carried on to a great extent; and there are several large quarries of stone, of good quality for building and other purposes. Facility of conveyance is afforded by the Manchester canal, which passes through the township. The chapel, now a district church, dedicated to Christ, was erected in 1828, at an expense of £3000, raised by subscription, aided by the Parliamentary Commissioners; it is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles and surmounted by a spire, and contains 800 sittings, of which 200 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Almondbury, with a net income of £150; impropiators, the Governors of Clitheroe grammar school. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. At Milnes-Bridge, which is chiefly in this township, though not now included in the chapelry, is a national school, supported by subscription, and held in a building licensed by the bishop for divine service. The Slaithwaite baths are partly situated here.

LINTON (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of CHILFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Cambridge, and 48 (N. by E.) from London; containing 1838 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the road from Cambridge to Colechester, has been much improved of late years, and an act for inclosing waste lands was passed in 1838. The market, granted in 1245 to William de Lay, is on Thursday; and there is a fair on July 30th, for sheep. Courts leet are held occasionally by the lords of the manors. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Bishop of Ely: the appropriate tithes, belonging to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, have been commuted for £780, and the vicarial for £260; the appropriate glebe comprises 84 acres, and the vicarial 9 acres. The church has a fine embattled tower, and a gallery has been lately built, containing 120 free sittings; in the interior are several monuments. There is a place of worship for Independents. The poor law union of Linton comprises 22 parishes or places, 20 of which are in the county of Cambridge, and two in that of Essex, the whole containing a population of 12,958: the union workhouse cost £6500, and is capable of accommodating 200 paupers. An alien priory, subordinate to the abbey of St. Jacutus de Tusula, in Brittany, was founded in the time of Henry III.; at its suppression, its revenue was valued at £23. 8. 10., and it was granted by Henry VI. to Pembroke Hall. At Barham, in the parish, a priory of Crouched friars, a cell to the monastery of Welnetham, in Suffolk, was established in the reign of Edward I. Several Roman coins have been dug up.

LINTON, a township, in the parish of CHURCH-GRESLEY, union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Burton; containing 253 inhabitants. It comprises 883a. 1r. 14p., arable and pasture, in nearly equal portions; the soil is fertile, and the pastures are extremely rich; the chief produce is corn, cheese, and fat-cattle, for which the place is celebrated. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LINTON, or LYNTON (St. Mary), a parish, including the sea-port of Linmouth, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of SHERWILL, Braunton and N. divisions of DEVON, 14 miles (E. by N.) from Ilfracombe; containing 1027 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the most northerly point of the Devonshire coast, comprises two manors, the lords of which, in the time of Edward I., had the power of inflicting capital punishment. The village is on an eminence westward of an opening towards the Bristol Channel, and is separated from the adjoining parish by the river Lyn, over which is a bridge of one arch. About a mile westward from Linton is the Valley of Rocks, the bed of which is about three-quarters of a mile in length, but not above 100 yards in width; the acclivities on each side exhibit huge masses of fixed and detached rock, and at the western extremity of the vale, which is terminated by a cove, or inlet, is an isolated mass of great magnitude, in the form of a cone, partly intercepting the view of the Channel. Within a short distance to the east, by the sea-side, near the junction of the East and West Lyn rivers, is Linmouth, formerly a fishing-town of some consequence, but now possessing only about a dozen fishing-boats. Turbot, soles, cod, herrings, and oysters, are still caught upon the coast, and shipped to Bristol and elsewhere. Several sloops, of from 50 to 100 tons, are employed in the coasting trade; limestone, coal, and culm are the principal articles of importation, and bark and grain the chief exports. There is a small pier, erected by the lord of the manor, at which the steamers from Bristol to Ilfracombe call in passing. Both at Linton and Linmouth are numerous lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors; and in the neighbourhood are some elegant private residences. There is a plentiful supply of excellent water; and the river Lyn abounds with trout. The lord of the manor holds a court leet and baron at Linton soon after Easter, when a portreeve, tythingman, and ale-taster are appointed. The parish comprises by measurement 7160 acres, of which 3287 are arable and pasture, 310 woodland, and the remainder mountain and common. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Countisbury annexed; net income, £108; patron, Archdeacon of Barnstaple. The tithes of Linton have been commuted for £270, and the glebe comprises 102 acres: attached to the curacy is a glebe of three acres. The church, an ancient structure, in the early English style, with a tower, was enlarged by the addition of aisles, in 1817 and 1833, and now contains 600 sittings. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a national school is supported.

LINTON, a hamlet, in the parish of CHURCHAM, Lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county, of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W. by N.) from Gloucester; containing 31 inhabitants.

LINTON, a township, in the parish and union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (S. E.) from Bromyard; containing 610 inhabitants, including the inmates of Bromyard union workhouse in the township. The township is situated on the borders of Worcestershire, and comprises 2433 acres, of which 260 are common or waste. A court leet was formerly held, but was discontinued some time since.

LINTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWENT, hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Ross; containing 750 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2595 acres, and is situated on the borders of Gloucestershire, which bounds it on the east. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £8. 10., and in the gift of St. John's College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £525, and the glebe consists of 68 acres. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a school, endowed by Edward Goff, Esq., in 1813.

LINTON (ST. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union and hundred of MAIDSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 4 miles (S.) from Maidstone; containing 900 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1300 acres, of which 550 are arable, 420 meadow and pasture, 170 hop plantations, 100 garden and orchard, and 60 woodland; the surface is boldly undulated, and the scenery pleasing. The village is situated on the range of hills that bound the weald on the north; and within half a mile of it is Coxheath, an extensive plain, on which 15,000 soldiers were encamped, and reviewed by George III., in 1778, but which has been inclosed and cultivated, producing hops of excellent quality. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4.; patron and impropiator, Earl Cornwallis: the great tithes have been commuted for £220, and the vicarial for £325. The church contains some monuments worthy of notice, particularly one lately erected to the memory of Viscount Brome, only son of the present Earl Cornwallis: during a thunder-storm, about the end of November, 1838, the spire was struck by the electric fluid, which destroyed a part of it. In 1813, John Bowles bequeathed £200, the interest to be applied to instruction. A school-house for girls was recently erected by Lady Cornwallis; and some handsome almshouses have been built and endowed by his lordship, whose seat is in the parish. The poor-house for Maidstone union, a large brick building, calculated to hold 600 paupers, with a spacious chapel attached, is situated here.

LINTON, county of LINCOLN.—See LAVINGTON.

LINTON, a hamlet, in the parish of WINTRINGHAM, union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Malton. This place is said to have been the site of a monastic cell belonging to the monks of Scarborough: it consists of farm land the property of Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart.

LINTON, a township, in the parish of SPOFFORTH, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Wetherby; containing 169 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1030 acres, chiefly the property of the Hon. George Wyndham, who is lord of the manor. The village is situated on the north side of the vale of the Wharfe. A rent-charge of £257. 10. has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a Sunday school is in connexion with the Establishment.

LINTON (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWXCROSS, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Grassington, Hebden, and Threshfield, 2060 inhabitants, of whom 303 are in the township of Linton, 9 miles (N.) from Skipton. This parish, which is situated in the beautiful valley of the river Wharfe, comprises about 11,110 acres, divided into several manors, of which, with the exception of Hebden, the Duke of Devonshire is lord. Of the lands, a considerable portion is hilly moor, affording in some parts tolerable pasture; the substratum contains mineral produce of various kinds, of which the principal in operation is lead. The population is chiefly employed in the lead-mines of Grassington, and in the manufacture of cotton and worsted goods. The living is a rectory in mediety, each valued in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income of each, £185, exclusive of the glebes, which comprise 30 acres each. The church formerly contained two pulpits and two reading-desks: it was originally a Norman building, of which some parts remain, but it has undergone various repairs at different periods, especially in the reign of Henry VIII.; the west window is a good specimen of the decorated style. The free grammar school was founded in 1672, by the Rev. Matthew Hewitt, who endowed it with £20 per annum for the master, £10 for the usher, and £50 for four exhibitions to St. John's College, Cambridge. The hospital for six women was founded and endowed with a house, and 240 acres of land, now producing £270 per annum, by Richard Fountain, Esq., in 1721; £16 per annum are paid to each of the inmates, and £20 to the chaplain; £12 are applied to the apprenticing of children, and £70 are appropriated to relatives of the founder. There are some other small bequests for distribution among the poor.

LINTON-UPON-OUSE, a township, in the parish of NEWTON, union of EASINGWOULD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 9 miles (S. S. W.) from Easingwold; containing 299 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 2030 acres of land, chiefly the property of University College, Oxford. The village is neat, and pleasantly situated on the north side of the river Ouse, and about a mile west of the village of Newton. There is an ancient Roman Catholic chapel; also a school with a small endowment.

LINTON, WEST, a township, in the parish of KIRK-LINTON, union of LONGTOWN, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (S.) from Longtown; containing 567 inhabitants.

LINTZ-GREEN, a township, in the chapelry of TANFIELD, parish of CHESTER-LE-STREET, union of LANCHESTER, Middle division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Gateshead; containing, with the township of Beamish, 2671 inhabitants. The ancient manor or vill of Lintz appears to have included the present estates of Lintz-Green, Lintz Hall, and Lintzford, and probably other separate freeholds. Lintz-Green lies on the extreme western verge of the chapelry of Tanfield, divided from that of Medomsley by the Ponton burn; Lintz Hall is a little to the south; and Lintzford northward on the Derwent. At Low Friarside, to the west of Gibside, was formerly a small chapel, whereof some remains are still standing, in the middle of a large pasture field, near the river.

LINWOOD (St. CORNELIUS), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, S. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Market-Rasen; containing 226 inhabitants. This place was formerly the residence of the Lynwoods, of whom William, who died in 1446, was bishop of St. David's, and keeper of the privy seal under Henry VI. The parish is tolerably extensive, and includes a rabbit warren of 250 acres, and a large wood; the farm-house and cottages are of recent erection. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the family of Gordon: the tithes have been commuted for £380, and the glebe comprises 95 acres. The church is a neat structure, of which the windows are profusely ornamented with stained glass: the church land consists of 6 acres, awarded at the inclosure. A school is supported.

LINWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish of BLANKNEY, union of SLEAFORD, Second division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN; containing 55 inhabitants. It comprises about 700 acres of land, and is situated three miles to the east of the village of Blankney.

LINWOOD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of RINGWOOD, N. division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, Lymington and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 14 inhabitants.

LIPHOOK, a post-town, in the parish of BRAMSHOTT, hundred of ALTON, Petersfield and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Haslemere; containing 242 inhabitants. It is near the Sussex border, and on the London and Petersfield road.

LIPWOOD, a township, in the chapelry of HAYDON, parish of WARDEN, union of HEXHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Hexham; containing 648 inhabitants. This place, which is an ancient member of the barony of Langley, occupies an elevated situation, and is bounded on the north by the Roman Prætentura. The surface is diversified, and the scenery of pleasing character. Grindon lake, a fine sheet of water in the township, is fed by the rivulet called Knag burn, which rises to the north of the Roman wall, and in the winter greatly overflows its summer boundaries; it abounds with perch, and a boat is kept on it by the governors of Greenwich Hospital, to whom it belongs. Lipwood House is a handsome villa, erected about the year 1829, by the late Thomas Coates, Esq., whose family at that time held lands in the township.

LISCARD, a township, in the parish of WALLASEY, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 12 miles (N. by E.) from Great Neston; containing 2873 inhabitants. It comprises 896 acres, of which 260 are common or waste. The plan of a new town having recently been designed, many houses have been erected, and it has now become a place of resort for sea-bathing; the population of the township has in consequence trebled during the last ten years. Rent-charges, as commutations for the tithes, have been awarded, amounting to £115, which sum is equally divided between the rector of Wallasey and the Bishop of Chester.

LISKEARD (St. MARTIN), a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL; containing 4287 inhabitants, of whom 3001 are in the borough, 18 miles (S. S. W.) from Launceston, and 225 (W. S. W.) from London.

The ancient name of this town was Liskerrett, derived probably from two Cornish words signifying "a fortified place." It was formerly amongst the possessions of the earls of Cornwall, and was, by act of parliament, annexed to the duchy in the reign of Edward III. The castle, of which there are still some vestiges, was occasionally the residence of Richard, Earl of Cornwall and King of the Romans. In 1643, during the civil war, a battle was fought near this place, between the royalists, under Sir Ralph Hopton, and the parliamentary forces, in which the latter were defeated, and the royalist army marched into Liskeard the same night. The king, on his entrance into Cornwall, in 1646, halted here on August 2nd, and remained until the 7th. The town is one of the most ancient and considerable in the county; it is irregularly built, chiefly on steep hills at the upper extremity of a valley; the streets are well paved and lighted, the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water, and the air is very salubrious. The tanning of leather is carried on to a considerable extent. Facility for water carriage has been afforded by the canal from Liskeard towards Looe, a distance of six miles, which was recently completed, and terminates about one mile west of the town, where are coal-wharfs and lime-kilns. This is one of the four coinage or stannary towns; but no coinage has taken place for some time, the practice having been abandoned. A handsome market-house for poultry, fish, and vegetables, was erected in 1822; and there are butchers' shambles beneath the town-hall. The market, on Saturday, is abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds, and great annual markets or fairs for the sale of cattle are likewise held. The town-hall is a good structure on granite arches and columns, erected in 1707, and is surmounted with a clock.

Liskeard was made a free BOROUGH in 1240, by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, who conferred on the burgesses similar privileges to those enjoyed by the towns of Launceston and Helston; and several charters were afterwards bestowed, under the last of which, granted by Elizabeth, and dated the 26th of July, 1587, the corporation consisted of a mayor and nine capital, and an indefinite number of inferior, burgesses, aided by a recorder, town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and other officers. The government is now vested in a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, elected under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, and the number of magistrates is four, who assemble on alternate Mondays for the despatch of business. The borough, which first sent representatives to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I., formerly returned two members, but was deprived of one by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, when an enlarged district was incorporated with the borough for elective purposes; the limits, previously including 2387 acres, now extend over an area of 8115 acres, embracing the old borough and parish of Liskeard, with part of the parish of St. Clear. The mayor is returning officer. There is a small town prison. The parish is intersected by the river Looe, and comprises by measurement 7126 acres; the soil is various, but generally fertile, and in some parts a deep rich loam; the surface is very hilly, and the surrounding country strikingly diversified. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 13. 11½.; net income, £303; patron, Rev. F. J. Todd. The church stands on an eminence at the eastern entrance of the town, and is a spacious and handsome edifice of fine large slate-stone, with a low embattled tower, which was erected in 1627; it contains several monuments, among which is one raised by Captain Martyn and his brother officers, to Lieut. James Huntley, who fell in a gallant attack on a squadron of Russian gun-boats in the Gulf of Finland. An episcopal chapel was opened at Dubwalls, in 1839. Amongst other lands of smaller value, a tenement called Lanseaton, now let for £50 per annum, is vested in the wardens for the repairs of the church. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Association Methodists. A school was founded by the trustees of the Rev. St. John Eliot, who died in 1760, and was endowed by them with £5 per annum. A British and Foreign school was erected in 1835; and a diocesan classical and commercial school has been recently established. The poor law union of Liskeard comprises 26 parishes or places, with a population of 26,484: a workhouse has been built near the town for 350 persons. A great part yet remains of the conventual buildings belonging to the nunnery of Poor Clares, founded here, and endowed by Richard, Earl of Cornwall; it is called "The Great Place," and has been converted into dwelling-houses.

LISSETT, a chapelry, in the parish of BEEFORD, union of BRIDLINGTON, N. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 7½ miles (S. S. W.) from Bridlington; containing 132 inhabitants. The earliest owners of this manor on record are the family of Monceaux, and among subsequent proprietors occur the families of De la See, Boynton, Hildyard, Beverley, and Dent: the manor-house, an old brick building, is now occupied by a farmer. The township comprises about 1150 acres: the village, situated on the road to Hull, has been of late years much improved, and wears an appearance of neatness and respectability. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector of Beeford. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, is an humble edifice of ancient date, some parts being probably as old as the 12th or 13th century.

LISSINGTON (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, W. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4¼ miles (S.) from Market-Rasen; containing 186 inhabitants. The parish is on the Rasen and Wragby road, and comprises by measurement 1530 acres, including a portion of the common of Lissington Pasture, which is also in the three adjoining parishes of Buslingthorpe, Friesthorpe, and Wickenby; the surface is level, and the soil chiefly clay. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 17. 6.; patrons, Dean and Chapter of York. The vicarage is endowed with the rectorial tithes, with the exception of a small sum, payable to the Dean and Chapter; they have been commuted for a rent-charge of £350, and the glebe comprises 58 acres. The church, a small edifice, has some portions in the Norman, and others in the early English, style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LISTON, a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 2¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Sudbury; containing 80 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the river Stour, and comprises by admeasurement 628 acres; the soil, though various, is generally fertile, and in the low grounds near the river, is light and sandy. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of R. Lambert, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 18 acres. The church is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel is a handsome marble monument to one of the Clapton family.

LITCHAM (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Swaffham; containing 846 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1932a. 3r. 16p., of which 1397 acres are arable, 256 meadow and pasture, 42 woodland, and the remainder heath and common, of which a considerable portion, under an act of inclosure in 1770, was allotted to the poor for fuel. The village, which is large, consisting of several streets, had formerly a market and annual fairs, granted by Edward I. to Robert de Felton; the market has long been discontinued, but fairs are still held on Whit-Tuesday and November 1st, chiefly for pleasure. A court leet is held in October, and petty-sessions for the division take place on the first Wednesday in every alternate month. The living is a discharged rectory, with which that of East Lexham was united in 1742, valued in the king's books at £9. 2. 6., and in the gift of Lord Wodehouse: the tithes have been commuted for £441; the glebe comprises 45½ acres, and there is a glebe-house. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square tower of brick; the chancel is separated from the nave by a richly-carved oak screen. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by subscription. Near the bridge was anciently a hermitage, of which the chapel is now a farm-house.

LITCHBOROUGH (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of TOWCESTER, hundred of FAWSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 5½ miles (N. W.) from Towcester; containing 408 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and was one of the four garrisoned towns taken by the Saxons in 571. The parish comprises 1699a. 3r. 17p.; the surface is hilly, and the soil various, the greater portion red loam alternated with clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 9. 7.; patron and incumbent, Rev. W. A. Taylor: the tithes have been commuted for £547, and the glebe comprises 21 acres, with a house. A master receives £21 per annum from Lady Katherine Levison's charity, for education.

LITCHFIELD (St. James), a parish, in the union and hundred of KINGSCLERE, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N.) from Whitechurch; containing 94 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Oxford to Southampton, and comprises by computation 1806 acres, of which 494 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 19. 7., and in the gift of William Kingsmill, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £400. The church is an ancient structure. A school is supported by subscription.

LITCHURCH, a township, in the parish of ST. PETER, DERBY, union and hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E.) from Derby; containing 855 inhabitants. The hamlet contains the union workhouse.

LITHERLAND, a township, in the parish of SEFTON, union and hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Liverpool; containing 1586 inhabitants. A church dedicated to St. Thomas was built at Scoforth, in the township, in 1815, at the expense of John Gladstone, Esq.; and another, to which a district is assigned, has been erected and endowed by Adam Hodgson, Esq., and other gentlemen of the place. Two schools are supported by subscription.

LITHEWELL, or LUDWELL, a chapelry, in the parish of DAWLISH, union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of EXMINSTER, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. by W.) from Chudleigh. The chapel is in ruins.

LITTLE ABINGTON.—See ABINGTON, LITTLE. And other places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

LITTLEBOROUGH, a chapelry, in the parish and union of ROCHDALE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Rochdale. This place is supposed to have been the site of a small Roman station; the Roman road from Manchester to York skirts the village, and several relics of that people have been found in the immediate vicinity. The Manchester and Leeds railway passes a little to the east of the place, where it has an intermediate station, and at a short distance attains its summit level, 330 feet above the Manchester station, and 440 feet above the terminal station at Normanton, in Yorkshire. It proceeds through a tunnel 2869 yards in length, 24 feet wide, and 22 in height, and having 14 shafts of 10 feet in diameter, varying from 50 to 300 feet in depth, in the formation of which 1000 men were employed, and more than £251,000 expended. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £190; patron, Vicar of Rochdale. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, was licensed for mass by the abbey and convent of Whalley, in 1476; it was rebuilt about 1815, in the early English style, and a gallery has been erected. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LITTLEBOROUGH, a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from East Retford; containing 77 inhabitants. This place contains 916 acres, and is situated on the river Trent, across which is a ferry that has existed from the time of the Romans in Britain; it is supposed to have been the site of the station Segelocum, or Agelocum. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £58; patron and impropria-tor, G. Saville Foljambe, Esq.: the tithes were commuted for land in 1822. The church, a very ancient structure, was put into a state of thorough repair by the late incumbent, the Rev. Francis Hewgill, and the chancel was beautified by the patron; many Roman bricks are found in the old walls, and the masonry in some parts is of that kind called the herring-bone style.

LITTLEBOURNE (ST. VINCENT), a parish, in the union of BRIDGE, hundred of DOWNHAMFORD, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 4 miles (E.) from Canterbury; containing 819 inhabitants. The parish is on the road to Deal, and comprises 2101a. 20p., of which about 1281 acres are arable, 245 meadow, 441 wood, 66 orchards, and 41 hop-grounds: the village is situated on a branch of the river Stour, on the bank of which is an extensive corn-mill, and there are also a public brewery and a tan-yard. A fair, chiefly for pleasure, is held on the 5th of July. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £235; patrons, Dean and Chapter of Canterbury; impropriator, Charles James, Esq. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Calvinists. Schools are supported by subscription; and there are a few benefactions for the poor.

LITTLEBURY (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Saffron-Walden; containing 822 inhabitants, and comprising 3408a. 1r. 31p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 2. 1.; net income, £205; patron, the Rector. The rectory is a sinecure, valued at £26. 13. 4.; net income, £24; patron, Rev. J. H. Sparke, Prebendary of the fifth stall in the Cathedral of Ely. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1801. The church is within the area of an ancient encampment. On Chapel green was formerly a chapel of ease. In 1585, Dame Jane Bradbury bequeathed land for instruction, and a national school has accordingly been established.

LITTLECOT, a chapelry, in the parish of CHILTON-FOLIATT, union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Hungerford. A curious tessellated pavement, the largest ever found in England, was discovered in Littlecot Park, in 1730, but, unfortunately, was soon destroyed; an accurate drawing, however, was made, which was engraved at the expense of the Society of Antiquaries. Pickedfield, formerly part of Littlecot domain, was purchased by government, in 1803, for the purpose of establishing a dépôt for the interior of the country; it includes about 40 acres of ground, on which were erected three magazines and other buildings. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £140, and the vicarial for 11s., payable to the vicar of Enford. At Knyghton, a small hamlet on the north bank of the Kennet, near Littlecot Park, is an ancient encampment.

LITTLECOTE, a hamlet, in the parish of STEWKLEY, union of WINSLOW, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Winslow; containing 28 inhabitants. A chapel of ease situated here is now in ruins.

LITTLECOTT, a tything, in the parish of ENFORD, union of PEWSEY, hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, Everley and Pewsey, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 52 inhabitants.

LITTLEDALÉ, a chapelry, in the parish and union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5½ miles (E. by N.) from Lancaster; containing 115 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £48; the patronage is in dispute; improPRIATORS, the family of Rawlinson. The chapel, dedicated to St. Anne under Caton, was consecrated in 1755.

LITTLEHAM (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, Woodbury and S. divisions of DEVON; containing, with part of the town of Exmouth, 3927 inhabitants. The parish is situated at the mouth of the river Exe, and comprises 2068 acres, of which 1398 are arable, 391 meadow, 50 orchards, 165 furze and common, and 63 glebe land. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £15. 12. 6.; net income, £137. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, and contains about 600 sittings. There is a place of worship for dissenters; and a school, erected by Lord Rolle, is supported by subscription.

LITTLEHAM (St. SWITHIN), a parish, in the union of BIDEFORD, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Bideford; containing 390 inhabitants. This place, anciently a royal manor, formed part of the dower of Matilda, consort of William the Conqueror. The parish is bounded on the south by the river Yeo, which separates it from the parish of Monkleigh; the scenery is enriched with wood, and in many parts beautifully picturesque, especially on the road from Bideford to Buckland-Brewer, in a line parallel to the course of the Yeo, on the banks of which are some grounds producing hops of superior quality. Littleham Court, the seat of George Anthony, Esq., lord of the manor, is a handsome mansion. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 6. 10½., and in the gift of Mr. Anthony: the tithes have been commuted for £190, and the glebe comprises 93 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with some interesting details, among which is a wooden screen, richly carved.

LITTLEHAMPTON, a sea-port town and parish, in the hundred of POLING, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 4 miles (S.) from Arundel, and 61 (S. S. W.) from London; containing 2270 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the east bank of the river Arun, was distinguished by the landing of the Empress Matilda, in 1139, to assert her claim to the crown. For a long period it was only a very inconsiderable village, inhabited by a few fishermen, but it has recently grown into some importance as a place of trade, and, from the fineness of its sandy beach, and the salubrity of its air, has become a favourite and much frequented watering-place. Handsome lodging-houses have been built on the beach, which commands an extensive view of the coast from Brighton to the Isle of Wight, and the prospect on the land side also abounds with pleasing and interesting features. There are several inns and hotels, for the reception of visitors; baths have been erected on the beach, containing hot, cold, and shower baths, with apartments for shampooing; and a broad terrace, extending for about a mile along the carriage road, affords a delightful promenade. The town is neatly built, and amply supplied with water, and the streets are paved; there are two libraries and reading-rooms.

The trade consists principally in the export of oak timber to the west of England in great quantities, and the import of corn, coal, timber, Irish provisions, butter, cheese, fruit, wine, oil cake, and other articles, for which a number of vessels are purposely kept. The harbour is accessible to vessels drawing not more than thirteen feet water, and is formed at the influx of the Arun into the English Channel, and defended by a fort erected on the eastern bank of the river. There are two yards for ship-building, the one containing a dry dock, and the other a patent-slip; about 200 men are employed, and several vessels of considerable tonnage have been built. A good inland trade is carried on by lighters and small craft, which convey merchandise to Newbridge, near Billingshurst, and thence to the Wye and Thames rivers; and, to facilitate the communication, a canal has been formed a little to the west of the town, connecting it with Chichester, Emsworth, and Portsmouth. The parish comprises 993a. 3r. 29p., of which 650 acres are arable and 343 pasture and garden-ground. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester, with a net income of £149: rent-charges are paid, in commutation of tithes, of £105 to the bishop, £56 to Eton College, £189 to an improPRIATOR, and £93 to the vicar. The church, rebuilt in 1826, at an expense of £4000, is a handsome edifice, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains 292 free sittings, in consideration of a grant from the Incorporated Society. A school was founded by John Corney, Esq., who, in 1805, endowed it with £600 three per cent. consols.; and in 1837, Thomas Compton, Esq., erected spacious schoolrooms on the beach.

LITTLEMOOR, a liberty, in the parish of ST. MARY THE VIRGIN, union of ABINGDON, partly within the liberties of the city of OXFORD, and partly in the hundred of BULLINGDON, county of OXFORD, 2½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Oxford; containing 547 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1817. A chapel was erected in 1835, which contains 200 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £150 in aid of the expense. A priory of Benedictine nuns, founded here about the reign of Henry II., was suppressed by the papal bull given to Cardinal Wolsey, in 1524, and subsequently became part of the endowment of King's College, Oxford, until the time of the general Dissolution: at its suppression the revenue was valued at £33. 6. 8.

LITTLE-OVER, a chapelry, in the parish of MICKLE-OVER, union of SHARDLOW, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 2 miles (S. W. by S.) from Derby; containing 497 inhabitants.

LITTLEPORT (St. GEORGE), a parish, in the union, hundred, and Isle, of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Ely; containing 3365 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the Ouse, comprises by survey 15,557 acres: the village is on the road from Ely to Lynn, and a considerable traffic is carried on in corn and coal, for which the river affords great facility. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely, valued in the king's books at £8; improPRIATORS, Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £248, and the vicarial for £1931; the impropriate glebe comprises 81 acres, and the vicarial 76 acres. There are places of worship for Baptists, Huntingdonians, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by subscription.

LITTLETHORPE, a hamlet, in the parishes of COSBY and NARBOROUGH, union of BLABY, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Leicester; containing 334 inhabitants.

LITTLETON, a township, in the parish of CRISTLETON, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Chester; containing 48 inhabitants, and comprising 245 acres.

LITTLETON, partly in the parish of BLANDFORD ST. MARY, hundred of COOMBS-DITCH, and partly in that of LANGTON, hundred of PIMPERNE, union of BLANDFORD, Blandford division of DORSET, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E. by S.) from Blandford-Forum. This place, once an independent parish, now contains only a single house and farm. The last rector of the living was inducted January 10th, 1427.

LITTLETON (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of STAINES, hundred of SPELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Chertsey; containing 111 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1060 acres of arable and pasture land, much of which, from the supposed sterility of the soil, which is a light gravel, was not, till within a comparatively recent period, brought into cultivation; the surface is flat, and the lands bordering on the river Thames are subject to partial inundation. Part of the present mansion of Thomas Wood, Esq., was formerly one of five ancient manor-houses in the neighbourhood which belonged to Cardinal Wolsey. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14; net income, £320; patron, Thomas Wood, sen., Esq. There are 50 acres of glebe in the parish, an allotment of three acres in Laleham, and glebe lands in the parish of Shepperton; and the rector is entitled to the tithe of 25 acres in the parish of Laleham. A school is endowed with £355. 1. 2. South Sea annuities, purchased with the amount of various benefactions.

LITTLETON (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Winchester; containing 135 inhabitants. It comprises 1293 acres, of which 244 are common or waste: an act of inclosure was passed in 1843. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £76; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Winchester, whose tithes have been commuted for £703, and who have a glebe of 10 acres.

LITTLETON-DREW (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, 8 miles (N. W.) from Chippenham; containing 251 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 900 acres, of which the soil is generally clayey and cold: there are some quarries of stone, fit only for mending the roads. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 9., and in the gift of the Bishop of Salisbury: the tithes have been commuted for £120, and the glebe comprises 70 acres. The church is an ancient structure.

LITTLETON, HIGH (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of CLUTTON, hundred of CHEWTON, E. division of SOMERSET, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bath; containing, with the hamlet of Hallatrow, 1116 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £97; patrons, J. G. Mogg, Esq., and Rev. H. H. Mogg, incumbent; impropiators, J. G. Mogg, Esq., Mrs. James, and Miss Hodges Mogg. The great tithes have been commuted for £199, and the vicarial for £13. 6. 8. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is an ancient structure; in the chancel is a monument to the Mogg family, erected in 1584, from which time they have been owners of the greater part of the parish. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Mrs. Mary Jones, in 1787, left £1500 for charitable uses, the interest of £500 whereof she directed to be distributed among the poor of High Littleton.

Arms.

LIVERPOOL, a sea-port, borough, market-town, and union of itself, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 53 miles (S. by W.) from Lancaster, and 205 (N. W. by N.) from London; containing 223,003 inhabitants, and, including the contiguous townships of Everton, Kirkdale, West Derby, and Toxteth-Park, which are separated only by a boundary street, 294,389, exclusively of seamen. This celebrated town has, within the last century, by a progressive increase in extent, population, and commercial importance, obtained the first rank after the metropolis. Baxter, in his Glossary, calls it Segantiorum Portus ad ostium Annis Mersey sive Tinnæ, a statement which is contradicted by Whitaker, the Manchester historian, who places the Sistantian port on the river Ribble: the ancient name of the Mersey is also a subject of difference of opinion, Beli-sama being adopted by Whitaker, whilst Baxter gives that name to the Ribble. Liverpool is not noticed in any of the Roman Itinera, nor does the name occur in the Norman survey; its site, however, is contained within the limits of the West Derbyshire Forest, which, prior to the Conquest, was royal demesne, and in the possession of Edward the Confessor. After the Conquest it was bestowed by William, together with all the land between the Ribble and Mersey, upon Roger de Poitiers, by whom it was subsequently forfeited. It was then granted to the earls of Chester, and on forfeiture by their descendants, to Edmund, son of Henry III., as parcel of the honour of Lancaster; and it continued an integral part of the duchy possessions until its alienation by Charles I., in the year 1628. Regarding the etymology of the name, various opinions have been entertained. John, whilst Earl of Morton, and in possession of the honour of Lancaster, confirmed a grant made by his father, Henry II., to Warin de Lancaster, of Liverpul, with other places, under a certain reddendum. In subsequent records it is written Lyrpul, Lytherpul, Lytherpole, &c., signifying probably, in the ancient dialect of the county, the "lower pool." Some have deduced its etymology from a pool frequented by an aquatic fowl called a "Liver," or from a sea-weed of that name.

Camden informs us that the castle was built by Roger de Poitiers, about the year 1089, and that he appointed Vivian de Molines, ancestor of the Earl of Sefton's family, the castellan. In October, 1323, Edward II. dated some orders from it; and in April, 1358, Henry, Duke of Lancaster, made it his residence for upwards of a month. It was demolished by order of parliament during the Commonwealth, and subsequently was granted by Queen Anne to the corporation, who erected St. George's church upon it. The tower formerly at the bottom of Water-street was, most probably, built by the De Latham family, of whom Isabella, heiress of Sir Thomas de Latham, about the latter end of the fourteenth century, married Sir John Stanley, who, in the 7th of Henry IV., obtained permission from the king to embattle and fortify his house built of stone and mortar at Liverpool. It was subsequently the occasional residence of the Stanleys, earls of Derby, and after having been successively converted into a suite of assembly-rooms and a prison, was taken down in 1819, when warehouses were erected on the site. King John, in the 9th year of his reign, gave to Henry Fitzwarin de Lancaster, an estate near Preston, forming part of the possessions of the honour of Lancaster, in exchange for Liverpool, upon which occasion he granted a charter to the place. Henry III., in 1229, made the town a free borough, instituted a guild-merchant, and bestowed additional privileges. Little is known of the state of the town during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; in the latter of which, Leland, writing in 1558, describes it as a paved town much frequented as a good haven by Irish merchants, and as supplying Manchester with yarn imported from Ireland. From this period, however, till the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, it appears to have declined probably from the baneful consequences of the protracted wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. In 1571, the inhabitants petitioned the queen to be relieved from a subsidy imposed on them, and in their petition described it as "Her Majesty's poor decayed town of Liverpool;" and in 1630, when writs were issued by Charles I. for the levying of ship-money, the town was rated only at £26, while Bristol was assessed at £1000. During the civil war, the place was defended for the parliamentarians by Col. Moore, against Prince Rupert, by whom it was besieged, and to whom, after an obstinate resistance, it surrendered, June 26th, 1644, but was soon after retaken by the parliament. During the rebellion in 1745, Liverpool raised several regiments to oppose the Pretender; and within twelve months after the war with France broke out, in 1778, 120 privateers, carrying in the aggregate 1986 guns, and 8754 seamen, were equipped here.

The town is beautifully situated on the east bank of the river Mersey, along which it extends for more than three miles. On its west side are the immense ranges of docks, wharfs, and warehouses, in the neighbourhood of which the streets are mostly narrow, and the houses inferior in appearance to those of more recent erection. On the east side, to which it stretches, for upwards of a mile, are spacious streets, squares, and crescents of modern houses, built chiefly of brick and roofed with slate, and of which many are elegant mansions. The town is well paved, and brilliantly lighted with gas, by two companies, one established in 1818, for the supply of coal gas, and the other for the preparation of oil gas, in 1823. The inhabitants, and the shipping in the docks, are supplied with water from the springs at Bootle, about four miles distant, by the company of the Bootle water-works, and from springs in or contiguous to the town, by the company of the Liverpool and Harrington water-works. The air is highly salubrious, and the convenience of sea-bathing is afforded by the construction of baths of every description, erected by the corporation; by private establishments of a similar nature; by a floating-bath, and by numerous machines. Steam-boats are constantly sailing to and from the ferries on the Cheshire shore; and every facility of aquatic excursions may be obtained by packets and pleasure-boats, which are in constant attendance. The docks afford delightful promenades, commanding extensive views of the river and of the shipping, and Prince's pier, or Marine parade, is perhaps one of the finest marine walks in the kingdom. The public buildings, which are extremely handsome, give an air of grandeur to the town; and its many sources of refined amusement and social intercourse, render it, independently of its mercantile attractions, a desirable place of residence. The environs are pleasant, abounding with interesting scenery, and with seats and villas.

The public Subscription libraries are numerous and well selected. The Athenæum, a neat building of stone, erected in 1799, at an expense of £4400, contains a newsroom, and a library of above 16,500 volumes. The Lyceum, a handsome edifice of the Ionic order, was erected by public subscription, in 1802, at a cost of £11,000, and contains a well-selected library of 31,000 volumes, conveniently arranged in a circular room, tastefully decorated with busts, and lighted by a dome. The Union newsroom, a substantial building, was erected by subscription, in 1800, at an expense of £6000, and contains a spacious coffee-room, with two recesses at the end, ornamented with Ionic pillars: over the entrance to the bar, is a painting, by Fuseli, emblematical of the Union; and on the parapet above the entrance are the Union arms, finely sculptured. The Exchange newsroom occupies the lower story of the east wing of that splendid edifice. The Royal Institution, a spacious and handsome structure, the purchase and adaptation of which to its purpose cost £14,000, raised in shares of £100, consists of a centre and two wings, and contains, on the ground-floor, reading, lecture, and committee rooms, and classical and mathematical schoolrooms; and on the first-floor, a large room for the Literary and Philosophical Society, a library, a museum, a spacious exhibition-room for the members of the Liverpool academy of painting, an exhibition-room for casts from the Elgin and Egina marbles, a drawing schoolroom, and a committee-room. On the roof is an observatory, and behind the principal building are a laboratory and a theatre for chemical and philosophical experiments. This institution was formed in 1814, for the advancement of literature, science, and the arts, and the members were incorporated by royal charter in 1822. The Collegiate Institution, for the education of the commercial, trading, and working classes, in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England, and of which the first stone was laid by Lord Stanley, in 1840, is a fine structure, in the later English style. The principal front, in Shaw-street, consists of a centre and two slightly projecting wings; the central range is three stories high, lighted by windows of elegant design, and has a boldly projecting porch, forming the chief entrance, above which is a lofty arch, rising to the battlement, and surmounted by an ornamented gable. The wings are adorned with a lofty oriel window, surmounted by a canopied niche, containing a statue on a pedestal; and the whole structure, which is of red sandstone found in the neighbourhood, has an impressive aspect. The Mechanics' Institute, opened in 1837, is on the south side of Mount-street, and contains a library, reading-room, museum, &c.; the cost of erection was about £10,000. In 1838, a Statistical Society was founded.

The Medical Institution is a new edifice at the angle between Hope-street and Mount-street, in the south-eastern part of the town, and contains a lecture-room, library, and three museum-rooms. An Apothecaries' Company was formed in 1837, and a hall in Colquhoun-street was completed for it in 1838. The Botanic Gardens, situated in Edge-lane, about a mile from the town, afford not only a practical illustration of the lectures delivered on that subject at the Royal Institution, but an interesting and pleasing source of recreation. The Museum, in Church-street, consists of two apartments, in one of which a collection of natural productions is displayed, and in the other is a variety of ancient armour and warlike weapons and instruments. An extensive Zoological Garden was opened in the summer of 1833, and is laid out with great taste. The New Baths, on the west side of George's Dock, built by the corporation, at an expense of about £30,000, form a neat range of stone, 239 feet in length, and 87 in depth; and in front is a good promenade, on the margin of the river. The Theatre Royal, on the east side of Williamson-square, opened in 1772, is a neat edifice of brick, with a circular stone front, ornamented with the royal arms, and with emblematical figures in bas relief; in 1837, it was entirely re-decorated and embellished: the season commences in May, and closes in December. The Amphitheatre, in Great Charlotte-street, is the largest theatre in the town, and is open during the winter: the Liver Theatre was opened in 1825. The Wellington Rooms were built by subscription in 1815: in the centre of the front, which is of stone, is a lofty circular portico of the Corinthian order, from which two doors open into an octangular vestibule, beyond which is an ante-room leading on the right and left into card and supper rooms, and in the centre into a ball-room. The Rotunda is a handsome circular building of brick, now used as a billiard-room by a select number of subscribers. At the entrance into the town from London is an equestrian statue of George III., the first stone of the pedestal for which was laid in Great George-square, by the mayor and corporation, on the 25th of October, 1809, but it has been since removed to its present site; it is of bronze, a copy of that of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius at Rome, and the expense, amounting to nearly £4000, was defrayed by subscription. The Races take place in May, July, and October: the course at Aintree, five miles to the north-north-east of the town, is a mile and a half in length; and there is a smaller course used as a training-ground, in the inner circle. Six common stands have been built, capable of accommodating 6000 persons: the grand stand, erected in 1829, is four stories in height; the leads, commanding a view of the whole course, and a most beautiful and extensive prospect of the surrounding country, can accommodate 2000 persons.

The most remarkable feature in the history of the place is, the extraordinary rapidity with which it has risen into a degree of importance without example in the annals of any country. Among the causes which have produced its elevation to a rank but partially inferior to that of the metropolis, are, its situation on the shore of a noble river, which expands into a wide estuary; its proximity to the Irish coast; its central position with respect to the United Kingdom; its intimate connexion with the principal manufacturing districts, and with every part of the kingdom, by numerous rivers, canals, and railroads; and the persevering industry and enterprising spirit of its inhabitants. For the collection of customs, &c., due to the crown, Liverpool was anciently a member of the port of Chester; but, as is evident from records belonging to the corporation, it was an independent port so early as the year 1335. The COMMERCE may be divided into three distinct branches. Of these, the first and most important is its trade with Ireland, which appears to have been established, or greatly promoted, by the settlement of several mercantile families here from that country, about the middle of the sixteenth century; at that time, only fifteen vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 259 tons, belonged to the port, but Liverpool now enjoys about two-fifths of the Irish trade, the gross value of the Irish produce imported averaging about five millions annually. The second principal branch of trade is that with the United States of America, of which it engrosses more than three-fourths of the whole commerce of the kingdom: the chief article traded in is cotton wool, which may be considered as forming the staple trade of the town; Manchester and the cotton manufacturing districts are supplied from the port with the raw material; and the sales of cotton, which upon an average exceed 17,000 bales per week, are negotiated by brokers, of whom there is a considerable number. The port has great facility and frequency of intercourse with the sea-ports of the United States, by regular lines of packets. The old line of New York packets, consisting of eight vessels, sail on the 7th and 19th of every month; the new line, consisting of twelve vessels, sail on the 1st, 13th, and 25th of each month; and a steam-vessel, called the "Liverpool," of 1150 tons' burthen, and 461 horsepower, sailed on her first voyage from the port to New York on the 28th of October, 1838, and continues to sail on the 28th of each alternate month. The Philadelphia packets sail from Liverpool on the 8th and 21st of the month; and those for Boston always monthly, and sometimes twice in the month. There are four government steam-packets for the conveyance of the mail to the United States, two of which leave the port on the 4th and 19th of each month, and which, on their return, quit the States on the same days in the following month, and are due in 13 days. The average annual import of tobacco from the States to Liverpool is 7500 hogsheads. The trade with the South American states is also of importance. The next in extent is the trade carried on with the West Indies, which had its commencement about the middle of the seventeenth century, and which was previously shared between London and Bristol. It has also the advantages of a considerable trade with the East Indies, the principal ports in the Mediterranean and Levant seas, and the British colonies in North America. A limited but rapidly increasing intercourse is maintained with New South Wales and South Shetland; and in that with the Isle of Man about 130 vessels are employed. The coasting trade, likewise, is highly profitable. The fisheries do not appear ever to have been very extensive; in 1764, three ships were engaged in the Greenland whale fishery, which number had increased, in 1788, to twenty-one, but from that time the trade began to decline, and has now ceased to exist, and the home fishery has diminished materially. The exports are principally the manufactured articles of the neighbouring districts, the official declared value being about £22,000,000 annually, exceeding the similar export of London, and being nearly one-half of that of the United Kingdom. The number of vessels of above fifty tons registered at the port is 1097, and their aggregate burthen 307,852 tons. The number of British vessels that entered inwards in the year 1842, was 2501, of the aggregate burthen of 618,624 tons; and in the same year, 978 foreign vessels entered inwards, of the burthen of 369,966 tons. The amount of duties paid at the custom-house in 1841, was £4,140,593; the expenses of the establishment were £110,633, and the net revenue remitted to London was £3,985,669. In addition to the regular packets for America, packets sail for Rio Janeiro, Havannah, Montreal, Naples, Genoa, Leghorn, Smyrna, Constantinople, Lisbon, and Oporto; and there are seventy steam-vessels established between the port and Ireland, the Isle of Man, Scotland, Wales, Carlisle, Whitehaven, and Lancaster; besides which there are twenty belonging to the different ferries on the Mersey. Steam-packets sail regularly to Dublin, morning and evening, on the arrival of the mail train from London.

The HARBOUR is capacious and secure. At the entrance of the river is the Black Rock lighthouse, erected on a point of rock on the western coast, which is covered at quarter flood, and above the surface of which the water at high spring tides rises 20 feet. This lighthouse was built at the expense of the corporation, from a design by the late Mr. John Foster, at an expense of £34,500, and assigned to the Dock estate at a nominal rent; the structure is of limestone brought from Beaumaris, and was completed, and the light first exhibited, on the 1st of March, 1830; it is triangular, and presents successively two lights of a natural colour, and one of brilliant red, every minute. A floating light has also been placed eleven miles seaward from the mouth of the river, by the corporation, in their character of trustees of the docks; and pilot-boats stationed there are constantly on the look-out. A new channel called the Victoria Channel, near Formby Point, has been lately opened by dredging; and a lighthouse has been erected at Crosby Point, which, in conjunction with a light-vessel moored in the Crosby Channel, renders the port easy of access at all times of the tide either by day or night. A telegraph has been established, by means of which communications have been interchanged between this town and Holyhead, distant 72 miles, in the space of three minutes.

the Docks.

For the security of the shipping in the port, and for the greater facility of loading and unloading merchandise, an immense range of docks and warehouses, extending upwards of two miles along the eastern bank of the river, has been constructed, on a scale of unparalleled magnificence, and forming one of those characteristics of commercial greatness in which this town is unrivalled. The docks are of three kinds, the wet, the dry, and the graving, and there are also half-tide docks:

the wet docks are principally for ships of great burthen, employed in the foreign trade, and which float in them at all states of the tide, the water being retained by gates; the dry docks, so called because they are left dry when the tide is out, are chiefly appropriated to coasting vessels; and the graving docks, which admit or exclude the water at pleasure, are adapted to the repair of ships, during which they are kept dry, and when completed are floated out by admitting the tide. The Old dock, which was the first of the kind constructed in England, was opened in 1699, and closed in 1826, when its site, having been filled up, was appropriated to the erection of the custom-house, and other offices connected with the trade of the port. The Canning dock, which was a dry dock till 1832, was constructed under the authority of an act passed in the 11th of George II., and is chiefly occupied by sloops from the North coast, which bring corn, provisions, and slate, and convey back the produce of the West Indies, the Mediterranean, Portugal, and the Baltic; it has a quay 500 yards in length, and has communication with three graving docks. The Salthouse dock, so named from some salt-works formerly contiguous to it, was constructed about the same time as the Canning dock; the upper part of it is chiefly for ships that are laid up, and the lower for vessels in the Levant, Irish, and coasting trades; the quay is 759 yards in extent, and is provided with convenient warehouses, with arcades for foot passengers on the east side, and extensive sheds on the west side. George's dock, constructed in the 2nd of George III., at an expense of £21,000, was originally 246 yards in length, and 100 yards in breadth, with a quay of 700 yards in extent, but has been enlarged, and the quay is now 1000 yards in length. On the east side is a range of extensive warehouses, in front of which is an arcade for foot passengers; at the north and south ends of the dock are handsome cast-iron bridges; and a parade is continued westward for a considerable distance into the river. This dock has a communication with the two preceding docks, and also with the Prince's dock, by basins, which preclude the necessity of returning into the river.

The King's dock, constructed in the 25th of George III., is 270 yards in length and 95 in breadth, and is appropriated to vessels from Virginia and other parts, laden with tobacco, which article is exclusively landed here. The new tobacco warehouses extend the whole length of the quay, on the west side, and are 575 feet in length and 239 in depth; the old warehouses, on the opposite side, have been converted into sheds for the security of merchandise. Ships from the Baltic, freighted with timber and naval stores, discharge their cargoes on the quay; across the entrance is a handsome swivel bridge of cast-iron. This dock has a communication on the south with a dry dock and two graving docks. The Queen's dock, constructed at the same time, is 470 yards long and 227½ in breadth, with a spacious quay, and is chiefly occupied by vessels freighted with timber, and by those employed in the Dutch and Baltic trades; at the south end it communicates with a basin of considerable extent called the Brunswick half-tide dock, which is also connected with the Brunswick dry basin. On the south of the half-tide dock is a new dock of larger dimensions than any of the preceding, for vessels laden with timber, called the Brunswick dock, with a basin to the west of it; also the Harrington dock and three graving docks for the repairing of vessels. The Prince's dock, constructed under an act passed in the 51st of George III., was opened with great ceremony on the 19th of July, 1821, the day of the coronation of George IV.; it is 500 yards in length, and 106 in breadth. At the north is a spacious basin belonging to it, and at the south it communicates with the basin of George's dock; at the north end is a handsome dwelling-house for the dock-master, with suitable offices; and at the south end is a house in which the master of George's dock resides. To the north of the basin belonging to this dock are three new docks, the Waterloo, Victoria, and Trafalgar; the Waterloo dock was opened in 1834, and the others on September 8th, 1836. To the northward of these, are the Clarence dock and basin, completed in September, 1830, and appropriated solely to the use of the steam-vessels trading to and from the port; and also two capacious graving-docks, which will probably for the present terminate the range of docks on the north side of the town. The Duke's dock, between Salthouse and the King's docks, is a small one belonging to the trustees of the late Duke of Bridgewater, for the use of flats, with commodious warehouses. The several carriers by water have also convenient basins on the river, for the use of their barges, with quays for loading and unloading their goods; and the Mersey and Irwell Navigation Company have a small dock, called the Manchester dock, for the flats employed in that extensive trade, and for the transport to this town of the productions of Cheshire and the adjoining counties. The Waterloo, Victoria, and Trafalgar docks are the means of establishing a communication between the line of docks from Clarence to the Salthouse. The whole range of the docks is 2½ miles in length, exclusively of the openings to them, and the total area of water space contained in them is upwards of 90 statute acres; yet, spacious as they are, they are still considered inadequate to the increasing commerce of the port, and measures are in contemplation for their further extension. The sums expended in their formation amount to more than £3,000,000 sterling. The internal management of each is entrusted to a master resident on the spot, and the government of the whole is vested, by an act of parliament obtained in 1825, in a committee of 21 members, 13 of whom are members of the council, elected by that body, and the remaining 8 are elected by the dock rate-payers. An act of parliament was passed in 1841, empowering these trustees to purchase certain graving docks of the town council, with a view to make a wet dock, with basins, piers, wharfs, &c., to the west of the Salthouse dock, which is to be extended; to enlarge graving docks for the better accommodation of steam and other vessels; to make new graving docks; and to erect inclined planes or patent-slips, warehouses, &c., with various other improvements.

The new Custom-house, the foundation-stone of which was laid on the 12th of August, 1828, was erected on the site of the Old dock, at the joint expense of government and the corporation, and under the superintendence of Mr. John Foster; it is in the Grecian style, and presents, from every point of view, an object of great magnificence, unrivalled by any public building of the kind. The eastern wing has apartments allotted for the dock-trust, the excise, and post-office; the western wing and centre are occupied by the customs : in the eastern wing, upon the landing-place, is a large model of a man-of-war. The Exchange buildings, erected by the late Mr. Foster, at a cost of £110,848, subscribed in shares of £100 each, were completed in 1809, and occupy three sides of a quadrangular area, the north front of the town-hall forming the fourth side. The three sides of the quadrangle have a piazza 15 feet in width ; and in the centre of the area is a monument to the memory of Lord Nelson, erected by subscription in 1813, at an expense of £9000, and placed on a circular pedestal of marble, round the base of which are four figures of captives, emblematical of the four principal victories gained by that admiral. In the spaces between these figures are representations, in basso-relievo, of some of his naval exploits ; and on the pedestal is the figure of the admiral, receiving on his sword a fourth naval crown from Victory, while, at the same moment, a figure of Death appears rising from behind the drapery of the fallen standards of the vanquished enemy.

The MANUFACTURES of the town are principally such as are connected with the port and the shipping, the promotion of its commerce, and the supply of the inhabitants. There are several sugar refineries upon a very large scale, extensive potteries, glass-houses, breweries, tanneries, salt and copperas works, iron and brass foundries ; foundries for cannon, anchors, chain-cables, and the several parts of machinery connected with steam-engines ; manufactories for steam-engines, steam-boilers, and machinery of all kinds, and for guns, small arms, nails, files, ropes, sails, cordage, watches, tobacco, snuff, and soap ; also numerous corn-mills, and others for grinding mustard, colours, and dye-woods. The manufacture of soap exceeds that of any place in England, and that of tobacco and snuff is very extensive ; the number of watches made annually, on an average, amounts to 11,500, a number greater than that of any place, except London. Many shipwrights are constantly employed in repairing the vessels in the docks ; ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent, and the building of steam-packets, and the manufacture of engines and boilers for their use, have much increased within the last few years. The trade of the town is greatly facilitated by an extensive line of inland navigation in every direction, and by railways, by which it is connected with the manufacturing districts and the principal towns in the kingdom. No less than five artificial lines of communication by water join the river Mersey ; viz., the Mersey and Irwell navigation, the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, the Sankey canal, the Chester and Ellesmere canal, and the Weaver navigation : the first communicates with Manchester, and with Bolton and Bury by a canal to those towns. The Duke of Bridgewater's also connects Liverpool with Manchester ; by the Rochdale canal, with Hull and the southern parts of Yorkshire, and, by means of the Grand Trunk canal, with almost every other canal or inland navigation south of Lancashire. The Sankey canal runs in the direction of the extensive coal-mines of St. Helen's and its neighbourhood. The Chester and Ellesmere canal, now united to the Birmingham canal in Worcestershire, opens a traffic with the southern parts of England, and with the mining districts of North and South Wales. The Weaver is the great medium of conveyance for the produce of the salt-mines at Northwich and its neighbourhood. In addition to these is the Leeds and Liverpool canal, affording intercourse, by the Lancaster canal, with the north part of Lancashire ; by means of a cut lately made to the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, with Manchester ; and, as the name imports, with Leeds, and consequently with the principal manufacturing towns in Yorkshire. The Liverpool and Manchester railway appears, from the complete success with which the undertaking was attended, to have led to the introduction of that mode of conveyance, not only into different parts of England, but also of Europe and America ; it was commenced in May, 1826, completed at an expense of £1,407,170, and opened to the public in September, 1830. The line proceeds from the station in Lime-street, under a portion of the town, through a tunnel 2000 yards long, and 97 feet wide, to Edgehill, where are two fixed engines for working the trains, and from which point two other tunnels branch off, also passing under the town. One of these is 2000 yards long, 17 feet wide, and 12 feet high, and ascends in its progress to Crown-street, where is a depôt consisting of a foundry, smithy, and workshops for the making and repairing of engines and carriages ; and the other, 2216 feet in length, 22 feet broad, and 16 feet high, descends to Wapping, and the King's dock quay, where are a very extensive depôt and range of warehouses, offices, sheds for 420 waggons, and other requisites, and from which not less than 700 tons of goods are daily forwarded by the railway. The station in Lime-street is a handsome range of the Corinthian order, with two lofty gateways for the reception of passengers and merchandise ; there are four lines of way, above which are extensive ranges of building, for the construction and repair of carriages, supported on cast-iron pillars ; and within the area are refreshment and waiting-rooms for passengers, and the booking-offices for the main line, and for the Grand Junction Company ; the whole erected at an expense of £120,000.

The chartered MARKET days are Wednesday and Saturday, but there are markets for provisions every day in the week : the days for corn are Tuesday, Friday, and Saturday, from ten o'clock in the morning till one, the market being held in the Corn-exchange, a neat building, opened by subscription August 4th, 1808, with an entrance in the centre into the lower area, and the basement story ornamented with Doric columns, supporting a cornice and entablature. Numerous covered market-places have been formed, and buildings erected, for the convenience of persons attending them : of these, the principal is St. John's market-place, nearly in the centre of the town, begun in August, 1820, and completed in February, 1822, by the corporation, at an expense of £36,813 ; the building is of brick, with entrances and cornices of stone. St. James' market, erected by the corporation, at a cost of £13,662, is used by the inhabitants of the south part of the town, Harrington, and the Park ; and St. Martin's, built by the same body, at an expense of £16,500, accommodates the northern portion of the town, Everton, and Kirkdale. At the north end of St. John's market, is the Fish hall, the property of an enterprising company ; and in addition to these are, a new fish market opposite to the eastern entrance of St. John's market, in Great Charlotte-street, opened February 8th, 1837 ; the partially-covered market of Islington; the open market in Cleveland-square; the cattle and hay markets in Lime-street; a pig market, in Great Howard-street; and an extensive cattle market, formed by subscription, about two miles and a half from the town, and which covers an area of five acres, with pens for 14,000 sheep, 1600 head of cattle, six offices for salesmen, and a good hotel attached. The fairs are on July 25th and Nov. 11th: ten days before and after each fair, a hand is displayed in front of the town-hall, during which time every person entering or leaving the town on business connected with the fairs is free from arrest for debt within its liberties.

King John, in the 9th year of his reign, gave to Henry Fitzwarin de Lancaster an estate near Preston, part of the possessions of the honour of Lancaster, in exchange for Liverpool, upon which place he then bestowed a CHARTER; and Henry III., in 1229, confirmed this grant, made the town a free borough, instituted a guild-merchant, and conferred additional privileges. These charters were ratified by Edward III., Richard II., Henry IV., and Philip and Mary; and others were bestowed by Charles I., James II., William and Mary, William III., and George II., III., and IV., under which the controul was vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, an indefinite number of aldermen, a town-clerk, and others, composing a common-council of 41, assisted by subordinate officers. The borough is now governed by a mayor, 16 aldermen, and 48 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, and is divided into 16 wards, the municipal boundaries being co-extensive with those for parliamentary purposes; the number of magistrates is 43, and there is also a stipendiary police magistrate, who is a barrister. The freedom is inherited by birth, and acquired by servitude; and confers, among other privileges, that of exemption from payment of the town duties. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., but made no other return till the reign of Edward VI., since which time it has continued to send two members to parliament. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the privilege of voting was extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprising an area of 4570 acres; the old borough included only 2160 acres. The mayor is returning officer. Six courts of sessions of the peace are held in each year before the recorder, for all offences not capital. The borough court of record, for the trial of causes to any amount, regulated by several local acts, is held every Thursday before the mayor or town-clerk, for the transaction of general business (process, &c., being issued daily), and on the second Thursday in every month for inquiries to assess damages. Five courts of Passage for the trial of causes are held in the year before the assessor, who is a barrister, and are attended by a numerous bar. A court of requests for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, is held four days in the week, under a local act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 135, before a salaried barrister appointed by the corporation. A regular system of police was established under the Municipal Reform act, and the two forces, previously distinguished as Borough and Dock Police, were formed into one body, consisting of 2 head constables, 8 superintendents, 37 inspectors, and 508 constables. The stipendiary magistrate, assisted by the borough justices, one of whom acts in weekly routine, attends daily at the police-office, for the transaction of business. The estates belonging to the corporation may be estimated at upwards of £4,000,000 (subject to a debt of £1,050,000), and produce an income averaging about £120,000 per annum, which is charged, under the Municipal act, with various items of expense, after the payment of which a surplus is left for the benefit of the inhabitants and the improvement of the town. The Dock Estate, which is separately managed by trustees, yields £200,000 per annum, applicable to the payment of the interest on a large bonded debt, and to the maintenance of the important branches connected with the establishment. The trust, however, differs from those of the London and St. Katherine's docks, no beneficial interest arising at Liverpool to any corporate body or individual, and the income being strictly applicable to trust purposes alone.

The Town Hall, commenced in 1749, and of which the ground-floor was originally designed for an exchange, occupies an elevated situation at the north end of Castle-street: the whole of the interior was destroyed by fire in 1795, and has been since restored by the corporation upon an improved plan, at an expense of £110,000. It is a stately and magnificent structure in the Grecian style, with four elegant fronts, of which the north forms one side of the Exchange buildings, and the south, which is the principal, comprises the grand entrance; the whole edifice is surrounded with a rustic basement, from which rise handsome ranges of Corinthian pillars, supporting an entablature and cornice; between the pillars are tablets, in which the emblems of commerce are finely sculptured in bas-relief. The interior of this noble building contains on the ground-floor a council-room, apartments for the mayor, committee-rooms, and offices for the town-clerk, treasurer, and other officers of the corporation. The grand staircase leads into a spacious saloon splendidly fitted up, opening on the east and west sides into two magnificently furnished drawing-rooms, and on the north and east sides into two large ball-rooms, also superbly decorated. On the west of the saloon is the banquet-room, of which the arched ceiling is richly panelled in compartments, and the whole is disposed in the most costly style. The refectory, adjoining the smaller ball-room, is of proportionate elegance; and the entire suite of rooms, for convenience of arrangement, and for splendour of embellishment, is in perfect harmony with the general character of the building, which, for the magnitude of its dimensions, and the beauty of its architecture, is, perhaps, unparalleled by any edifice of the kind in Europe. The Borough Sessions-House, near the west wing of the Exchange buildings, erected by the corporation, at a cost of £18,269, exclusively of the purchase of the land, is a neat plain structure, in the Grecian style. The Borough Prison, also built by the corporation, at an expense of £67,348, consists of six wings, and comprises three divisions for male and one for female debtors, five for male and two for female criminals, with fourteen wards, day-rooms, and airing-yards, and separate apartments for the sick ; and is capable of containing from 500 to 600 prisoners. St. George's Hall and the Courts in which the assizes for the county are held, form one spacious and magnificent range of building, of which the foundation was laid in 1841 ; it is in the Grecian style, 500 feet in extreme length, and of very lofty elevation. The east front, which is 420 feet in length, is embellished with a stately and boldly projecting portico of sixteen square columns of the Corinthian order, supporting an enriched entablature and cornice, which surrounds the whole of the building, and affording an entrance by a flight of steps into St. George's Hall, which is in the centre, and of which the roof rises to a considerable elevation above the rest of the structure. This hall is 161 feet in length, 75 feet in width, and 75 feet in height, and during the assizes is open to the public ; it communicates with the assize courts at the north and south ends, each of which is 60 feet long, 50 wide, and 35 high. On each side of the portico are façades of six columns, of similar character, between the lower portions of which are ornamented screens rising to about one-third of the height. The south front consists of a noble and boldly projecting portico of six circular columns of the Corinthian order, rising from a richly moulded surbase ten feet in height, which surrounds the whole pile, and supporting an entablature and cornice surmounted by a triangular pediment, of which the apex has an elevation of ninety-five feet from the ground. The north front, which is semicircular, is embellished with Corinthian columns similar to those of the eastern front, supporting an enriched entablature and cornice of like design ; and this part of the building contains a concert-room, seventy-five feet in length, and nearly of equal breadth. The edifice, in addition to these principal divisions, contains the vice-chancellor's court, the sheriff's jury-court, a grand jury-room, a barristers' library, and other apartments ; the whole, for the grandeur of its dimensions, the loftiness of its elevation, and the elegance of its style, forming one of the most sumptuous and magnificent structures in the kingdom. The County House of Correction, at Kirkdale, recently erected, is of circular form, with two large wings, and is capable of receiving 800 prisoners, for whose classification there are twenty-one wards, day-rooms, and airing-yards ; the governor's house occupies the north front, and in the centre of the area are the chapel and the schools ; it contains a tread-mill with ten wheels, and hospitals for males and females. The Sessions-house for the hundred of West Derby forms the south front of the house of correction, and is built of stone, with a portico of six lofty Ionic pillars ; the sessions are held in a handsome room, to which are attached apartments for the magistrates, barristers, and witnesses. The petty-sessions for the hundred are held on alternate Fridays, in a smaller room in this building, the whole of which was completed in 1821, at a cost of £80,000. A refuge for discharged female prisoners has been established.

Liverpool was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Walton, from which it was separated in 1698, and constituted a distinct PARISH and a RECTORY, divided into two medieties, respectively belonging to the incumbents of St. Peter's church and the parochial chapel of St. Nicholas ; but, in 1838, an act was passed for uniting the two portions, upon the decease of one of the rectors, and for the better endowment of the living, and of other churches in the town, of which, on the decease of the present incumbents, the stipends, &c. will be altered. Since the period of separation from Walton, many new churches have been erected, and the parish has of late been divided, by act of parliament, into twenty-two districts for ecclesiastical purposes. The original, and the only church prior to 1698, was that of St. Nicholas : the time of its foundation is not known ; but, in 1361, a licence was obtained from the Bishop of Lichfield to bury in the churchyard during the plague, which then raged in the town. The body of the church was rebuilt in 1774. In 1810, the spire and the upper part of the tower fell upon the roof, a few minutes before the hour of service, and killed several persons who had assembled in the church, and were entering at the time ; a new tower, in the later English style, has been erected, surmounted by a lantern, from a design by the late Mr. Harrison, of Chester. There were anciently four chantries in the church, but few monuments of antiquity now remain. St. Peter's church is a plain edifice, with a low square tower, surmounted by an octagonal turret crowned with pinnacles ; the interior contains some good specimens of carving in oak, and on the south side of the chancel is a costly marble monument to Foster Cunliffe, merchant. The living is a rectory not in charge, formerly in the patronage of the Corporation, who lately disposed of the advowson to John Stewart, Esq., for £8150 : the income of each mediety is £710, exclusively of £47 arising from pew-rents ; and £720 per annum are paid, in addition, to four curates.

The livings of the following churches are perpetual curacies, formerly in the gift of the mayor and corporation, but of which all the advowsons have been sold under the Municipal Reform act, except the patronage of several churches, which will fall to the council after certain periods of primary presentation by subscribers and others, and which will not be disposed of till such time has expired. Net income of St. George's, £370, and of the lectureship, £315 ; of St. Thomas's, £220, and of the lectureship, £165 ; of St. Paul's, £170 for the senior minister, and £100 for the second minister ; of St. Anne's, £140 ; of St. John's, £150, and of the lectureship, £180 ; of St. Michael's, £250, and of the chaplain, £250 ; of St. Luke's, and of the chaplain, £250 each ; and of St. Martin's, £300, and of an assistant minister, £200. The foregoing are exclusive of surplice fees and other ecclesiastical emoluments and parochial dues, and also of pew-rents in the parochial churches payable to the incumbents. St. George's, at which the mayor and council usually attend divine service, was erected in 1734, on the site of the ancient castle, and was rebuilt in 1821, under the superintendence of Mr. John Foster ; the prevailing character is the Doric, and in the elevation of the steeple that style has been blended with the Ionic and the Corinthian. The church dedicated to St. Thomas, built under the authority of an act passed in the 21st of George II., and consecrated in 1750, is a handsome edifice, in the Grecian style, with a tower formerly surmounted by a very lofty spire, which was taken down in consequence of the damage it sustained from a storm, in 1822. St. Paul's church, erected at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1769, is a well-constructed building, with a dome rising from the centre, and porticoes of the Ionic order, forming the principal entrances. St. Anne's, erected in 1772, under an act of the 36th of George III., at the cost of two gentlemen of the town, is a neat building of brick, in the early English style, with a square tower crowned by pinnacles; the east window is of painted glass. St. John's church, erected in 1784, under an act passed in the 2nd of George III., is a neat structure, with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles. St. Michael's, erected under an act of the 54th of George III., and amended by a subsequent measure in the 4th of George IV., is an elegant structure, completed in 1834, in the Grecian style, with a lofty steeple of two receding turrets, surmounted by a neat spire; it has a noble and boldly projecting portico of six lofty Corinthian columns, supporting a triangular pediment, and at the east end are four Corinthian columns supporting an entablature and cornice, which are continued round the building; the cost of its erection was £46,267, of which £10,267 were paid by the corporation. St. Luke's, erected in 1831, at an expense to the corporation of £53,418, after a design by Mr. Foster, is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, having turrets at the angles, which rise considerably above the battlements; the walls are strengthened by richly-empanelled buttresses crowned with pinnacles in the lower stages, and carried up above the roof of the chancel, forming a series of highly-ornamented turrets. The interior is much embellished, and the chancel, which is after the model of Beauchamp Chapel at Warwick, is a beautiful specimen of the decorated style. The church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields was erected in 1828, by grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £20,037, and is a handsome structure, in the later English style, having a square embattled tower with angular turrets, surmounted by an octagonal spire; the chancel, of which the roof is finely groined, is separated from the nave by a lofty and richly-moulded arch; the structure forms a striking ornament at the entrance into the town from the Ormskirk-road.

The following churches, of which the livings are likewise perpetual curacies, will, at the expiration of certain periods, be in the patronage of the Council, who will then offer them for sale. The church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, erected by private subscription, under an act of the 32nd of George III., in 1792, is a neat edifice of stone, with a tower: net income, £250; patron, Rev. R. Formby. Christ-Church, erected under an act of parliament passed in the 40th of George III., is an elegant building of brick, ornamented with stone, and having a light and handsome cupola and dome; the chancel is lighted by a large Venetian window, and contains a marble tablet to the memory of John Houghton, Esq., by whom the church was built, at an expense of £21,000, and by whom it was endowed with £105 per annum: patron, Edward Gibbon, Esq. The church dedicated to St. Mark, erected in 1803, at a cost of £18,000, raised by subscription, is a plain edifice of brick, with a square tower crowned by a balustrade, and ornamented with vases at the angles: net income, £370; patrons, five Trustees. St. Andrew's church, erected in 1815, by John Gladstone, Esq., at an expense of £12,000, is a neat edifice, with a turret surmounted by a dome supported by eight columns: net income, £295; patron, John Gladstone, Esq. The church dedicated to St. Philip, built in 1816, by John Cragg, Esq., at a cost of £12,000, is a neat edifice, in the later English style: net income, £200, and there is an assistant minister, with a like income; patron, John Cragg, Esq. St. David's church is a neat edifice, erected in 1827 for the accommodation of the Welsh residing in the town, the service of the Church of England being regularly performed in the Welsh language: net income, £120; patrons, Trustees. St. Catherine's church, in Abercromby-square, was built by subscription, in 1831, at an expense of £10,000; the entrance is through a portico of six handsome Ionic columns, and the interior is lighted by a dome in the centre, supported by Corinthian columns: net income, £250; patrons, Trustees. St. Bride's church, erected also by voluntary contributions, in 1831, at an estimated expense of £5000, is in the Grecian style, with a portico of six Ionic columns: net income, £305; patrons, Trustees.

St. Stephen's church, originally built for a congregation of Protestant dissenters, but purchased and fitted up for the Established religion, is a plain building, with a small turret surmounted by a cupola: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rectors of St. Nicholas and St. Peter's, with a net income of £150. St. Matthew's was also purchased from a congregation of dissenters: the living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £107; the patronage is at present vested in certain Trustees, but will eventually lapse to the two Rectors. St. Mary's church, for the school of the indigent blind, with which it communicates by a subterraneous passage, was erected by subscription, after a design by Mr. Foster, in 1819, and is an elegant structure, in the Grecian style, with a noble portico of six massive columns of the Doric order, supporting an enriched entablature and triangular pediment, an exact copy of the portico of the temple dedicated to Jupiter Panhellenius, in the island of Egina. The interior is beautifully arranged, and contains a splendid monument to the late Pudsey Dawson, Esq.; one-half of the pews are for strangers, whose contributions are received for the benefit of the charity. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of five Trustees, including the mayor and the two senior aldermen. All Saints' church, in Grosvenor-street, was built in 1798; and there is also an episcopal chapel, dedicated to St. Simon. St. Matthias' district church, in the Grecian style, was erected in Love-lane in 1834, at an expense of £3173. 10.: net income of the incumbent, £150. In George's dock is a floating chapel connected with the Established Church, and in King's dock is one in connexion with dissenters. In addition to the churchyards are three public cemeteries: the one near Edge Hill is spacious, and contains a small chapel of brick, in the ancient English style, in which the funeral service is performed. The second, which is called St. James' cemetery, and of which the site was given by the corporation, is a large tract of ground excavated as a quarry for stone used in the building of the docks, and converted into a depository for the dead, at an expense of £21,000; it contains 44,000 square yards, inclosed by a stone wall and handsome iron palisades, having four stately entrances; in the centre is Mr. Huskisson's tomb. The interior is intersected by roads wide enough to admit a carriage, which lead to catacombs excavated in the rock. The oratory, or chapel, built after a design by Mr. Foster, is an elegant edifice, in the Grecian style, and of the Doric order; at the west end is a noble portico of six massive columns supporting a rich entablature, which is carried round the building, and surmounted by a triangular pediment. The third cemetery, called St. Mary's, has lately been formed in the parish of Kirkdale. St. James' church, erected in 1775, nearly adjoining St. James' cemetery, and from which it takes its name, is in the parish of Walton. There are places of worship for Baptists, Welsh Baptists, Welsh Calvinists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Welsh Independents, Wesleyans, Welsh Methodists and those of the New Connexion, Swedenborgians, Unitarians, &c.; others in connexion with the church of Scotland, and for Seceders; several Roman Catholic chapels, and a synagogue. Of these, some are handsome buildings, among which may be noticed the Scottish church in Rodney-street, dedicated to St. Andrew, and built after a design by Mr. Foster, with a receding portico of the Ionic order, and having, at each end of the front, a turret surmounted by a dome; the Roman Catholic chapels on Copperas Hill and in Scotland-road, in the early English style, strengthened on the sides by buttresses crowned with crocketed pinnacles; and the synagogue, an elegant structure, with a handsome Ionic portico, and in every respect characteristic of the opulence of that portion of the inhabitants.

The Blue-coat Hospital, established in 1709, for the clothing and instruction of children, and now conducted on the national system, was, in 1714, extended also to their entire maintenance; and the present substantial building, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, was erected for that purpose by subscription. The endowment arises from a bequest by William Clayton, Esq., of £1000, a bequest by the Cleveland family of premises which sold for £1706, and donations by the late Mr. John Horrocks, amounting to £3022; its support being further provided for by subscription. There are also national schools, and numerous others supported by subscription. The school for the Indigent Blind was founded in 1791, and the present spacious premises were erected by subscription in 1808; they consist of a substantial dwelling-house for the conductor, behind which is a large range of building for the residence and employment of the inmates, for whose accommodation, and as a means of increasing the funds for their support the church already noticed was erected. An institution for the Deaf and Dumb was opened in 1825; and many children of the poor are also instructed in various branches of trade in the House of Industry, founded in 1770. To the east of the building is a house of recovery from Fever, a spacious stone building, occupying an elevated situation. A School of Industry for females was established in 1809; in which year also the Female Penitentiary was instituted, and a handsome brick building has been erected by subscription. The Infirmery, which is an excellent school of medicine and surgery, was originally established in 1749, but the building being found inadequate to the object, the present edifice of stone was erected by subscription in 1824; it consists of a centre and two receding wings, comprising three lofty stories, and the whole, from the chaste elegance of its design, produces a pleasing effect; the cost, exclusively of the land, was £27,800. The Lunatic Asylum, near St. John's church, originally founded in 1792, was found inadequate to the accommodation of the patients, and a new building was erected in 1830, from the plans of Mr. Foster, at a cost of £11,000; opposite to it is the Lock Hospital, opened in 1834. A Marine Humane Society was established in 1823, for the encouragement of boatmen and fishermen to adventure for the relief of vessels in distress in the river and upon the coast, by the distribution of suitable rewards for their success in rescuing the lives of the crews; it has been productive of great benefit. The Strangers' Friend Society, established in 1789, originated with the Wesleyans, and is open, without distinction of religious denomination, to all objects of distress. The Marine Society was instituted for the relief of reduced or aged masters of vessels, and for the support of their widows and children. The Seamen's Hospital was established in 1752, for the maintenance of decayed seamen, their widows, and children; it is conducted on the plan of the Trinity-house, and is supported by a permanent fund of £35,000, the amount of unclaimed prize money, and by a contribution of sixpence per month from the wages of every seaman belonging to the port: 700 individuals receive monthly pensions from the funds. An hospital for the relief of sick and wounded American seamen was opened in 1820, and is supported by the American government; and a Military Hospital, for the relief of any regiment either quartered at, or marching through, the town, is maintained at the expense of the country. The Merchant Society consists of 274 members, associated for the relief of widows of its decayed members.

There are also numerous provident and benefit societies; and the charitable society administers relief to the poor at their own houses. The society for ameliorating the condition and increasing the comforts of the poor is under the direction of a committee of twenty-one members, who have opened a savings' bank in Bold-street, a handsome building, with a rustic basement story, from which rise four Doric columns, supporting an enriched entablature and triangular pediment, with an ornamented architrave. The Diocesan Society, for the relief of the widows and orphan children of the clergy, has been established for several years, and has been productive of considerable benefit. The Charitable Institution house, a commodious building, was erected at the joint expense of John Gladstone, James Cropper, and Samuel Hope, Esqrs., for the gratuitous accommodation of the committees of the various charities in the town; the lower part is used as a depository by the Auxiliary Bible Society. Among the Distinguished Natives of the town may be noticed, Jeremiah Horrox, an eminent astronomer, who was born at Toxteth-Park, in 1619; George Stubbs, a celebrated painter of animals, and author of a work on comparative anatomy, and of a series of drawings and engravings illustrative of the anatomy of the horse, born in 1724; William Sadler, who invented the method of applying copper-plate prints to the embellishment of earthenware; Edward Rushton, an admired poet, born in 1756; John Deare, an eminent sculptor, born in 1760; Joseph Whidbey, civil engineer; Matthew Dobson, M.D., F.R.S., and his wife, both respectable authors; Dr. William Enfield; Dr. John Bostock; the celebrated Mrs. Hemans; Wm. Roscoe, author of the Life of Leo X., and of Memoirs of Lorenzo de' Medici; and the Rev. Legh Richmond, author of the Dairyman's Daughter. Liverpool gives the title of Earl to the family of Jenkinson.

LIVERSEEDGE, a township, in the parish of BIRSTAL, union of DEWSBURY, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, 9 miles (S. W.) from Leeds; containing 5988 inhabitants. This place was anciently the property of the Neville family, lords of the manor, of whose mansion, Liversedge Hall, there are still some slight remains. During the disturbances that prevailed in the manufacturing districts, in 1812, a mill at Rawfolds, in the township, was attacked by a party of Luddites, but was vigorously defended by its proprietor, Mr. William Cartwright; two of the assailants were killed in the conflict, and several severely wounded. None of the attempts of that misguided party for the demolition of property at this place were attended with success; and in testimony of the spirited conduct of Mr. Cartwright, the sum of £3000 was raised by general subscription, and presented to that gentleman. The township, which includes the hamlets of Millbridge, Littleton, Hightown, the Heights, and Robert-Town, is situated on the acclivities of an extensive valley, watered by a stream flowing towards the south-east through Heckmondwike, and comprises by measurement 2044 acres, of which the surface is pleasing, and the scenery abounds with interesting features. Heald's Hall, for many years the seat of the late Rev. Hammond Roberson, and now of Henry Roberson, Esq., is a handsome mansion in the Grecian style, in an ample and tastefully embellished demesne. Millbridge is on the road from Leeds to Huddersfield, with Littleton to the north-west; and both, like other villages of the township, are inhabited by persons employed in the manufacture of blankets, carpets, woollen-cloths, and machine cards, to a very great extent. There are two coal-mines in Robert-Town, of which place the inhabitants are principally colliers. A church, dedicated to Christ, was erected in 1816, by the late Rev. H. Roberson, at an expense of £7000, and endowed by him with 5 acres of land; it is a handsome structure, in the later English style, and contains 700 sittings, of which 100 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £105; patron, H. Roberson, Esq. A neat parsonage-house, in the Elizabethan style, has been recently erected by subscription, as a public testimony of respect to the founder and late incumbent. There are three places of worship for Wesleyans. A school was built by subscription at Hightown, and endowed in 1772 with a rent-charge of £8, by Mr. Jonas Farrar, and in 1723 with one of £6, by Mr. Edward Beaumont; it has merged into a national school, erected in 1812, near the old building, at an expense of £800, for an indefinite number of children, of whom 22 are taught gratuitously for the original endowment. The old school is now used as a girls' school, and attached to it is a house for the master.

LIVERTON, a parish, in the union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 7½ miles (E. by N.) from Guisborough; containing 203 inhabitants. This place, which is within the district of Cleveland, was, at the time of the Domesday survey, a barren and unprofitable waste, and was granted by the Conqueror to Robert de Brus, lord of Skelton, from whose descendants it passed, through the family of Thweng, to the Latimers, Willoughbys, and others; it is now chiefly the property of Viscount Downe, who is lord of the manor. The parish comprises 2393 acres, of which a very considerable portion is high moorland; 393 acres are common or waste, and the remainder arable, meadow, and pasture. The village is situated about midway between the sea and the road from Whitby to Guisborough, and consists chiefly of houses irregularly scattered along the edge of a common. The advowson of the church formerly belonged to the priory of Guisborough, to which it was given by Henry Fitzconan. The living is now consolidated with the rectory of Easington: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is a small ancient structure, with a well-preserved Saxon arch. A parochial school is supported chiefly by Viscount Downe.

LIVESEY, a township, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Blackburn; containing 1996 inhabitants.

LLANARTH (St. TRILLO), a parish, in the union, and partly in the hundred, of ABERGAVENNY, but chiefly in the hundred and division of RAGLAN, county of MONMOUTH, 3½ miles (N. W.) from Raglan; containing 669 inhabitants, of whom 330 are in the hamlet of Clytha. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Usk, and intersected by the road from Monmouth to Abergavenny, and comprises by computation 3161a. 2r. 33p., of which 1446 acres are arable, 1640 meadow and pasture, and 74 woodland; the surface is undulated, and the views, especially from the Clytha hills, are very fine. Llanarth Court, the admired seat of John Jones, Esq., is a handsome and spacious mansion, the front ornamented with an elegant portico resembling that of the temple of Pæstum. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Bettws-Newydd annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop, Archdeacon, and Chapter of Llandaff, who are the appropriators: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £211, and there is a glebe of about 62 acres, with a good parsonage-house, nearly rebuilt within the last few years by the vicar, the Rev. W. Price. The church, an ancient structure, consists of a nave and chancel, with a lofty square embattled tower, surmounted by pinnacles. A private Roman Catholic chapel, richly decorated with ancient and modern stained glass, is attached to Llanarth Court. On the summit of Clytha hill is an intrenchment, which retains marks of having been strongly fortified; and near Llanarth is a tumulus.

LLANBADOCK (St. MADOCUS), a parish, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, division and hundred of Usk, county of MONMOUTH, 1 mile (W. S. W.) from Usk; containing 457 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £5. 8. 9.; net income, £72; patron and incumbent, Rev. T. A. Williams; impropiator, Duke of Beaufort. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

LLANBEDER, a chapelry, in the parish of LANGSTONE, union of NEWPORT, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, 3¾ miles (E.) from Caerleon. The chapel, now in ruins, was dedicated to St. Peter.

LLANCILLO (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 14½ miles (S. W.) from Hereford; containing 84 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south-east by the river Munnow, which divides it from Monmouth— shire; and comprises 983 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £105; patron and incumbent, Rev. James Morris.

LLANDEGVETH (St. THOMAS), a parish, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, division of CAERLEON, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Caerleon; containing 131 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 4. 9½., and in the gift of W. A. Williams, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £120, and the glebe comprises 29 acres.

LLANDENNY (St. JOHN), a parish, in the division and hundred of RAGLAN, union and county of MONMOUTH, 4 miles (N. E.) from Usk; containing 375 inhabitants. The parish is on the right bank of the river Ebwy, and comprises about 2470 acres, of which 820 are arable, 1641 pasture and meadow, and 9 woodland; the surface is undulated, and from the higher grounds some fine views are obtained. When Fairfax, in the parliamentary war, attacked Raglan Castle, he made Cefyn Tillau, in the parish, his head-quarters. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £5. 15. 5.; net income, £50; patron and impropiator, Duke of Beaufort, whose tithes have been commuted for £330. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

LLANDEVAUD, a chapelry, in the parish of LLANMARTIN, union of NEWPORT, Lower division of the hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £40; patron, Prebendary of Warthacwm in the Cathedral of Llandaff. The chapel is in ruins, and the inhabitants attend Llanmartin church.

LLANDEVENNY, a hamlet, in the parish of St. BRIDE-NETHERWENT, union of NEWPORT, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH; containing 51 inhabitants.

LLANDINABO (St. DINEBO), a parish, in the union of Ross, Upper division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Ross; containing 62 inhabitants. The parish consists of 484 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 18. 6½., and in the gift of Kedgwyn Hoskins, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £130.

LLANDOGO (St. DOCHOE), a parish, in the division of TRELLECK, hundred of RAGLAN, union and county of MONMOUTH, 9 miles (N.) from Chepstow; containing 660 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the right bank of the Wye, comprises by measurement 1773 acres, whereof 103 are arable, 540 meadow and pasture, 900 woodland, and 20 common; the surface is diversified with hills, and the scenery is picturesque. The manufacture of paper is carried on, affording employment to about 100 persons. In 1826, a handsome iron bridge of one arch was erected here over the river, thus connecting the counties of Monmouth and Gloucester; and the parish is intersected by the high road from Chepstow to Monmouth, which passes along the vale of the Wye. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £72; patron and impropiator, Prebendary of Caire in the Cathedral of Llandaff. The tithes have been commuted for £168, and the glebe comprises 20 acres, which belong to the incumbent, who has also a comfortable parsonage-house. The church is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle. A church was erected at the hamlet of Whitebrook, in 1835, by subscription, and is a neat edifice in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and parochial schools are supported by subscriptions and donations.

LLANELLEN (St. HELEN), a parish, in the division of PONT-Y-POOL, union and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Abergavenny; containing 342 inhabitants. On the north and east, it is bounded by the river Usk, which is here crossed by a handsome bridge of three arches, on the road from Abergavenny to Pont-y-Pool; and the Brecon and Monmouthshire canal proceeds through the parish, from north to south. Within its limits is also a great portion of the Bloreng mountain. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a moiety of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £8. 10. 7.; net income, £105; patron, C. K. Tynte, Esq.; impropiators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, the Trustees of the Free Grammar school of Abergavenny.

LLANFOIST (St. FAITH), a parish, in the union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Abergavenny; containing 1500 inhabitants. This parish is bordered on the north by the river Usk, and intersected by the road from Abergavenny to Merthyr-Tydvil; it abounds with coal, iron-stone, and limestone, of which several mines are in operation, and the produce is chiefly forwarded to the Blaenavon iron-works, in the parish of Llanover. There are also quarries of good building-stone, of which large quantities are sent to Abergavenny and Hereford. The Brecon and Abergavenny canal, which communicates with the Monmouth and Newport canal near Pont-y-Pool, passes through the parish, as well as the tram-road from Hereford. Within its limits is situated the greater portion of the Bloreng mountain, 1720 feet high, along the brow of which proceeds a tram-road, whence, near its centre, four inclined planes descend, leading from the Blaenavon and Pwllwdw iron-works, and passing over the Abergavenny canal, to the village of Llanfoist, where there are extensive limekilns. The average quantity of coal, limestone, and iron, conveyed down these planes is about 150 tons daily. From the summit of the mountain the views are extremely beautiful. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. 4½., and in the gift of the Earl of Abergavenny: the glebe comprises 30 acres, with a small parsonage-house, and the tithes have been commuted for £280. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LLANGARRAN (St. DEINST), a parish, in the union of Ross, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Ross; containing, with the townships of Kilreague, Llangunnoch, Langstone with Tre-Evan, Trecilla, Tredoughan, and Tretilla, 1175 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 5448 acres of land, of which the substratum affords stone of good quality for building, and is intersected by the Garran river. The living is annexed, with those of Little Dewchurch, Hentland, and St. Weonards, to the vicarage of Lugwardine: the appropriate tithes have been commuted for £699. 4. 6., with a payment of £9. 12. to the rector, and the vicarial for £289. 11. 6.; the glebe contains 4 acres.

LLANGATTOCK (St. CADOCUS), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH; containing, with the market-town of Caerleon, 1440 inhabitants. Jones: the tithes have been commuted for £147, and the glebe comprises 109 acres, with a comfortable parsonage-house. The church, a neat structure, picturesquely situated near Llanthewy Court, was rebuilt, with the exception of the tower, in 1828, from the proceeds of a rate.

LLANTHEWY-VACH (St. DAVID), a parish, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, division of CAERLEON, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Usk; containing 172 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Jesus' College, Oxford, with a net income of £77: the tithes, belonging to the Bishop of Llandaff, have been commuted for £90.

LLANTHONY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of GLOUCESTER, Middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, adjacent to the city, and in the E. division of the county, of GLOUCESTER. A priory, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. John the Baptist, was founded here in 1136, by Milo, Earl of Hereford, for Black canons, refugees from Llanthony Abbey, in Monmouthshire, to which it was at first a cell, but afterwards became the superior, and had, at the Dissolution, a revenue of £748. 19. 11.

LLANTHONY-ABBEY, a chapelry, in the Upper division of the parish of CWMYOY, union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 10 miles (N. by W.) from Abergavenny. This place, which is of remote antiquity, is distinguished as having been chosen by St. David, uncle to King Arthur, and titular saint of Wales, for his seclusion from the world. Finding here a solitary spot on the banks of the Honddŭ, among rocks, woods and valleys, he built a small chapel, and made it a hermitage, where he passed many years, and which was afterwards unfrequented for several centuries: this chapel was called Llan-Dewy-nant-Honddŭ, or "the church of St. David on the Honddŭ," now corrupted into Llanthony. In the reign of William Rufus, Hugh de Lacy happening to follow deer into this retreat, William, one of his followers, was impressed with the wild solitude of the scenery, and, espying the chapel of St. David, resolved to devote himself here to the service of God: after passing several years alone, he induced Ernest, chaplain to Queen Maud, wife of Henry I., to become his associate, and by their united efforts another chapel was built, which was consecrated, in 1108, to St. John the Baptist. Soon afterwards, Hugh de Lacy founded a priory of canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, also dedicated to St. John; and when riches poured in upon the establishment, a more magnificent church was erected. Situated in the vale of the Ewyas are the remains of the abbey, built in the form of a Roman cross, and exhibiting a fine specimen of the early English, with some Norman details. The present living of the chapelry is a perpetual curacy; net income, £55; patron, the Bishop of St. David's; impropiator, W. S. Landor, Esq.—See CWMYOY.

LLANTILIO-CRESSENY, or LLANTILIO-GROSSENNY (St. TEILAW), a parish, in the division and hundred of SKENFRETH, union and county of MONMOUTH, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Monmouth; containing 699 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west and south-east by the river Trothy, and situated on the road from Monmouth to Abergavenny, and comprises about 5480 acres; the soil is chiefly clay, the surface a good deal undulated, and the views are exceedingly fine, especially from the stately ruins of White Castle, which is encompassed by a deep moat, and on the crest of an eminence about a mile and a half north-west of the church. Killough, which still exists, but is now a farm-house, was once the principal seat of the Powells, or ap Howels, a younger branch of which family resided at Llantilio for about 270 years, and the last descendant of whom intermarried with Mr. Serjeant Taddy, who has a mansion here. Old Court was the residence of Sir William Thomas, who married the daughter of Sir David Gam, whose services at Agincourt were rewarded by Henry V. with knighthood on the field of battle: Sir David occasionally made Old Court a place of retreat from the vengeance of Owain Glendwr, by whom his castle of Peyton Gwyn, in Breconshire, was burnt to the ground.

A farm now called Park Farm, was the Red-Deer park belonging to Raglan Castle.

The living is a vicarage, with that of Penrose annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop, Archdeacon, and Chapter of Llandaff, the appropriators; net income, £270: there is a small parsonage-house, with a glebe of about 10 acres. The church, which is picturesquely situated on an artificial mound, part of the site of an ancient intrenchment, is a handsome cruciform structure of stone, with side aisles, and a chapel on the north side of the chancel; it is chiefly in the early style, and has a tower surmounted by a lofty shingled spire, rising from the intersection of the transepts. In the chapel are several curious tombstones with effigies of the Powell family, and in the chancel are neat monuments to the family of Lewis, especially one by Flaxman to the memory of the lady of Mr. Justice Bosanquet: in the churchyard is a handsome stone cross. A chapel of ease, capable of accommodating 180 persons, was erected by subscription, in 1842, at Llanvair-gil-Coed, where are remains of an ancient castle, and where was a grange belonging to the abbey of Dore, in Herefordshire. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists; also a school endowed with £40 per annum from bequests by James and John Powell, in 1645. Remains exist of the moat of Old Court.

LLANTILLIO-PERTHOLEY (St. TEILAW), a parish, in the union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Abergavenny; comprising the Citra and Ultra divisions, and containing 808 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road to Hereford, and comprises 6550 acres, of which 950 are common or waste; it is beautifully situated, nearly in the centre of a district surrounded by mountains, of which the principal are the Sugar Loaf to the west, the Great Skirrid or Holy Mountain to the east, and the Little Skirrid and Blorenge Mountains to the south. A tram-road from Abergavenny to Hereford passes through the parish, through which also flows the Gavenny river. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Chapter of Llandaff, the appropriators: the great tithes have been commuted for £370, and the vicarial for £252. 10.; the glebe comprises 66 acres, with a small vicarage-house. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower on the north side. A small chapel of ease has been recently rebuilt at Bettws, in the parish. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a parochial school is supported by subscription.

LLANTRISSENT (St. PETER, St. PAUL, AND St. JOHN), a parish, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, division and hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Usk; containing 329 inhabitants. in the king's books at £10; net income, £194; patron, Sir Charles Morgan, Bart. The church is an ancient structure, with a low square tower.

LLANVAIR-DISCOED (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and division of CHEPSTOW, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Chepstow; containing, with the hamlet of Dinham, 186 inhabitants. The parish comprises by estimation 1590 acres of land, of which a considerable portion is lofty undulated ground, whence some fine views are obtained. The living is a perpetual curacy, united, with the vicarage of Caerwent, to the vicarage of Mathern; appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Llandaff. The church is an ancient structure, and near it are the remains of a castle, very picturesquely situated, which is supposed to have been erected soon after the Conquest, and was formerly the property of the family of Kemeys.

LLANVAIR-KILGIDIN (St. MARY), a parish, in the division of PONT-Y-POOL, union and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Abergavenny; containing 276 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1790 acres, of which about 1100 are arable, 550 pasture and meadow, and 60 woodland; it is intersected by the new road from Abergavenny to Usk, and is bounded on the north-west and south-east by the Usk river, over which, at the former point, is a stone, and at the latter, a suspension, bridge. The soil in the lower parts is a sandy loam, and in the upper a red clay; the surface is a good deal undulated, and the views from the higher grounds are very fine. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Sir Charles Morgan, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £255, and there is a good parsonage-house, with a glebe of about 84 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by a carved screen: in the churchyard are some fine yew-trees.

LLANVAIR-WATERDINE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of KNIGHTON, hundred of PURSLOW, S. division of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Knighton; containing 603 inhabitants. The parish is bounded by the river Teme, by which it is divided from the county of Radnor, and was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Clun, from which it was separated in 1593. It comprises about 7000 acres; the surface is hilly, and the soil generally a light gravel. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £78; patron and impropriator, Earl Powis. The church is a plain building without a steeple.

LLANVANNER, in the parish of LLANGATTOCK-VIBON-AVEL, hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 9 miles (N. W.) from Monmouth. At this place is a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Llangattock-Vibon-Avel: the living is endowed with two farms, purchased by grants from Queen Anne's Bounty, and now let for £70 per annum. The chapel is a structure of some antiquity.

LLANVAPLEY (St. MAPLEY), a parish, in the union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 4 miles (E.) from Abergavenny; containing 124 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the old road from Abergavenny to Monmouth, comprises by measurement 819 acres of arable and pasture land, in nearly equal portions; the soil is chiefly clay, producing good wheat, and the surface is considerably undulated. The river Trothy passes on the east. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 5. 2½., and in the gift of the Earl of Abergavenny: the tithes have been commuted for £150, and the glebe comprises 54 acres, with a good parsonage-house. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a parochial school is supported by the rector.

LLANVETHERINE (St. James the Elder), a parish, in the union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Abergavenny; containing 212 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Trothy, and situated on the road from Ross to Abergavenny, and comprises 2143a. 3r. 13p., of which about 983 acres are arable, 1102 meadow and pasture, and 58 woodland and rough grazing ground; the substratum contains stone, which is quarried for paving. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 17. 8½., and in the gift of the Earl of Abergavenny: the tithes have been commuted for £300, and the glebe comprises 51½ acres. The church is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a square tower: in the interior are several tombstones sculptured in bas-relief to the Powell family, and on the outside is a tombstone with a very rudely-executed effigy of the patron saint.

LLANVEYNOE, a chapelry, in the parish of CLODOCK, union of DORE, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 17 miles (W. S. W.) from Hereford; containing 244 inhabitants. This place is on the eastern side of the Black Mountains, and between the Munnaw and Olchon rivers; and comprises 3510 acres, of which 1279 are common or waste land. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter.

LLANVIHANGEL-CRUCORNEY (St. Michael), a parish, in the union and division of ABERGAVENNY, partly in the hundred of SKENFRETH, but chiefly in that of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Abergavenny; containing, with the hamlet of Penbiddle, 400 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Hereford to Abergavenny, in a valley between the Holy, and a portion of the Black, Mountain, and comprises about 2603 acres, exclusive of gardens, roads, &c.: stone is quarried for roads and buildings. A tram-way runs through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £5. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Queen; net income, £281; improprators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, Governors of the school at Abergavenny: the glebe contains 40 acres, to which there is a house. The church, with the exception of the tower, chancel, and porch, was rebuilt in 1835. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LLANVIHANGEL-LLANTARNAM (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CAERLEON, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (N. W. by W.) from Caerleon; containing 780 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £108; patron, E. Blewitt, Esq., who, and the family of Wood, are the improprators. There is a school with a trifling endowment. Here was a Cistercian abbey, the revenue of which was valued at the Dissolution at £71. 3. 2.

LLANVIHANGEL-JUXTA-ROGIETT (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, 7½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Chepstow; containing 44 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 550 acres; the soil is composed of a gravelly loam and clay, and there are quarries of limestone. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 9. 4½., and in the gift of Sir C. Morgan, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £123, and the glebe consists of 9 acres. The church is in the early English style, and consists of a nave and chancel, with a square embattled tower, and at a former period had a north aisle, as is apparent from the arches now filled up in the wall, on the north side of which two coffin-lids were discovered a few years since, one displaying the sculptured effigy of a man, in bas-relief, and the other that of a Knight Templar.

LLANVIHANGEL-NEAR-USK (St. Michael), a parish, in the union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Abergavenny; containing, with the parish of Llansaintfraed, 123 inhabitants. The river Usk bounds the parish on the south; and it is also intersected by the road from Monmouth to Abergavenny, and by the new road from the latter town to Usk. It contains by estimation 354 acres, of which 151 are arable, and 203 pasture and meadow. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 8. 9., and in the gift of Sir Samuel Fludyer, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £82, and there is a glebe of 26 acres. The church exhibits much antiquity. Here is a place of worship for Calvinists.

LLANVIHANGEL-PONT-Y-MOILE (St. Michael), a parish, in the union and division of PONT-Y-POOL, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Usk; containing 202 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Abergavenny to Pont-y-Pool, and comprises 1651a. 1r. 6p. Facilities of supply are afforded by the Brecon and Abergavenny canal, which passes through the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £87; patron and improprator, Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq.

LLANVIHANGEL-TOR-Y-MYNYDD (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, division of TRELLECK, hundred of RAGLAN, county of MONMOUTH, 6½ miles (E. by N.) from Usk; containing 197 inhabitants. The parish, which forms a portion of a mountainous district, comprises 1080 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 15. 5., and in the gift of the Archdeacon of Llandaff: the tithes have been commuted for £108. 10., and the glebe contains about 11½ acres.

LLANVIHANGEL-YSTERN-LLEWERN (St. Michael), a parish, partly in the hundred of RAGLAN, and partly in the division and hundred of SKENFRETH, union and county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Monmouth; containing 153 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the old road from Monmouth to Abergavenny, and comprises by estimation 1814 acres, of which 900 are arable, 650 meadow and pasture, and 264 woodland; the surface is agreeably diversified with hill and dale, and the soil is a stiff clay, producing good wheat. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 8. 4., and in the gift of the Earl of Abergavenny: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe contains about 80 acres, with a small parsonage, now a farm-house. The church is an ancient structure. The Baptists have a place of worship. In 1735, the Rev. R. Thomas left a cottage, and 5 acres of land, for the instruction of poor children.

LLANVRECHVA, a parish, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (N.) from Caerleon; containing 1591 inhabitants, of whom 892 are in the Lower, and 699 in the Upper, division. The parish comprises 4183 acres, of which 210 are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £85; patrons and appropriators, the Chapter of Llandaff, who receive a rent-charge of £348. 3., in commutation of tithes: the curate's glebe contains six acres. Here is a national school.

LLANWARNE (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of ROSS, Upper division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Ross; containing 377 inhabitants. This place, which comprises 2399 acres, is situated near the eastern base of Saddlebow hill, whence issues the small river Garran: the road from Hereford also intersects the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Governors of Guy's Hospital. The following rent-charges are paid in commutation of tithes, viz.: to an impropiator, £106; to the rector, £339; to the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, £11; and to the vicar of Much Dewchurch, £6. 6. There is a glebe-house, with half an acre of land.

LLANWENARTH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union, division, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Abergavenny; containing 2582 inhabitants, of whom 256 are in the Citra, and 2326 in the Ultra, division. The parish comprises 3300 acres, of which 800 are common or waste; it is situated in the north-western part of the county, and includes the Sugar-loaf, rising to an elevation of 1852 feet, Craig, and other hills, forming conspicuous objects at a considerable distance, and in several parts of the principality of Wales. The river Usk, together with the roads from Brecon to Merthyr-Tydvil, intersects the parish, through which also passes the Brecon and Monmouthshire canal. At Carn-y-Denis, coal and iron works have been established. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 6. 3.; net income, £470; patron, Earl of Abergavenny: the tithes for Llanwenarth Citra have been commuted for £460, and the glebe consists of 45 acres. The church exhibits many indications of great antiquity. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; and a national school is about to be erected.

LLANWERN (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Caerleon; containing 15 inhabitants. It comprises 707 acres by measurement; the surface is irregular, about half of the parish being high and hilly ground, and the other half level; the soil is very fertile, and limestone is quarried for building and for burning into lime. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 0. 10., and in the gift of Sir Charles Salusbury, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £82. 8., and the glebe comprises $16\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style.

LLANYBLODWELL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the hundred of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Oswestry; containing 961 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Oswestry into Wales, and comprises 4676a. 3r. 32p., about two-thirds of which are arable, and the remainder pasture, with the exception of about 100 acres of common, and nearly the same quantity of woodland; the soil is clay and gravel. The small meandering river Tannat, famed for its trout, flows through the parish; and Offa's Dyke bounds it on the east. Limestone of the finest quality is extensively quarried in the hills of Porthywaen and Crickbeath, which, with that of Llanymynech, form the beautiful valley in which the village is situated, and commence the range of wild and rugged scenery extending to the stupendous Berwyn, in North Wales. Copper and lead ore abound, though no regular mines of either seem to have been wrought since the time of the Romans, of whose works there are considerable traces in this and the adjoining parishes. In the township of Llynelys, a name derived from Llyn, a lake, and Llys, a palace, is a lake of extraordinary depth, covering seven or eight acres, and surrounded by striking scenery. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 1., and in the gift of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the great tithes have been commuted for £201, and the vicar for £34. 12.; there is a glebe-house, and the vicar's glebe contains 20 acres. The church, a plain structure, with a small wooden turret rising from the roof of the west end, contains handsome monuments to the Bridgeman and Godolphin families. Moreton chapel, a brick edifice, was built and endowed, as is supposed, by an ancestor of the Earl of Bradford. Here is a school, which was rebuilt in the year 1827.

LLANYMYNECH (St. AGATHA), a parish, partly in the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, but chiefly in the hundred of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Oswestry; containing, in the English portion, 566 inhabitants. In this parish commences the principal limestone range of North Wales, originating in an abruptly precipitous elevation of 900 feet, and extending northward through the country. In these rocks are found sulphate and carbonate of lead, copper, and zinc of superior quality, and a green dusty ore of copper, called by the miners "copper malm." Great quantities of limestone are burnt, and calamine is procured in abundance. The curious ancient mining level called the "Ogo," consists of caverns of unequal form and dimensions, connected by veins of ore which serve as guides to the miners. A branch of the Ellesmere canal from Frankton reaches to this place, where it joins the Montgomeryshire canal; and a railway has been formed, extending from the limestone rocks for nearly two miles and a half, communicating with these canals, of which the latter crosses the river Vyrnwy by an aqueduct. Offa's Dyke passes through the parish, near the church, to the precipitous rock above noticed, and thence towards Oswestry. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4.; net income, £394; patron, Bishop of St. Asaph. A national school has been established.

LLWYNDŪ, a hamlet, in the parish, union, and hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH; containing 168 inhabitants.

LLWYNTIDMAN, a township, in the parish of LLANYMYNECH, hundred of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Oswestry; containing 545 inhabitants. The tithes of this township and those of Trepnal, which are the only portions of the parish in Shropshire, have been commuted for £214, and there is a glebe of about 14 acres.

LOAD, a chapelry, in the parish and hundred of MARTOCK, union of YEOVIL, W. division of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Somerton; containing 426 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Martock. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. The navigable river Yeo, or Ivel, is here crossed by a bridge.

LOAD, a hamlet, in the parish of LONG SUTTON, union of LANGPORT, hundred of SOMERTON, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 14 inhabitants.

LOAN-END, a township, in the parish of NORHAM, otherwise NORHAMSHIRE, union of BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, county of DURHAM, though locally to the northward, and for electoral purposes annexed to the Northern division, of Northumberland, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Berwick-upon-Tweed, containing 155 inhabitants. The township comprises $824\frac{3}{4}$ acres, of which 749 are arable, 64 pasture, and $11\frac{3}{4}$ woodland; the soil consists generally of a strong loam, capable of producing all kinds of grain and green crops, and the scenery is beautiful. The river Tweed bounds the township on the north and west, and is here crossed by the celebrated Chain bridge, the invention of Captain, now Sir S. Brown, R. N., opened on the 26th of July, 1820, and the first erection of the kind in Great Britain. The extreme length of the suspended chains from the point of junction on each side of the Tweed is 590 feet, and from the stone abutments 432 feet; the height above the surface of the river is 27 feet. On the east of this place, is the road between Berwick and Cornhill. The tithes have been commuted for £226. 15., of which £189. 15. are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and £37 to the vicar of the parish.

LOBB, a hamlet, in the parish of GREAT HASELEY, union of THAME, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD; containing 22 inhabitants.

LOBTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTH WITHAM, union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN; containing 54 inhabitants.

LOCKERIDGE, a tything, in the parish of OVERTON, union of MARLBOROUGH, hundred of SELKLEY, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of the county of WILTS, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Marlborough; containing 334 inhabitants.

LOCKERLEY (St. John), a parish, in the union of ROMSEY, hundred of THORNGATE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6 miles (N. W.) from Romsey; containing 558 inhabitants. The Salisbury and Southampton canal passes through the parish. The living is annexed, with that of East Dean, to the rectory of Mottisfont: the tithes have been commuted for £370, and the glebe contains $8\frac{1}{4}$ acres. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and two schools are partly supported by the incumbent.

LOCKHAY, or Locko, a chapelry, in the parish of SPONDON, union of SHARDLOW, hundred of APPLETREE, though locally in the hundred of MORLESTON and LIT-

CHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Derby. Here was an hospital of the order of St. Lazarus of Jerusalem, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and subordinate to a house in France: in the reign of Edward III. it was seized by the crown, and given to the Society of King's Hall, Cambridge.

LOCKING (St. Augustine), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Axbridge; containing 166 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1016 acres; and the Bristol and Exeter railway passes near the place. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 10½.; patrons and impropiators, Society of Merchant Adventurers of Bristol. The great tithes have been commuted for £44, and the vicarial for £174. 10.; the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church was built principally at the expense of the above-named society, who are trustees of Colston's charity at Bristol, and, as such, patrons of the benefice; and was enlarged in 1820, at a cost of £700, defrayed chiefly by the society.

LOCKINGE, EAST (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of WANTAGE, county of BERKS, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Wantage; containing 325 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £31. 10., and annexed to the Wardenship of All Souls' College, Oxford, since 1764, by act of parliament; net income, £480. A parochial school is supported by subscription.

LOCKINGE, WEST, a hamlet, in the parish, union, and hundred of WANTAGE, county of BERKS; containing 63 inhabitants.

LOCKINGTON (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of SHARDLOW, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Loughborough; containing, with the township of Hemington, 617 inhabitants. The navigable river Trent flows along the northern, and the Soar along the eastern, boundary of the parish, at the north-east angle of which they form a junction. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 7. 3½.; net income, £149; patron and impropiator, John Bainbridge Story, Esq., who has a fine mansion in the parish.

LOCKINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BEVERLEY, Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Beverley; containing, with part of the township of Aike, 433 inhabitants, of whom 394 are in that part of Lockington township which is in the parish of Lockington. The parish comprises by computation nearly 3000 acres, including a portion of Aike; it is partly arable, and partly old pasture, much of it of inferior quality, and about 100 acres are woodland. Lord Hotham and the Rev. Charles Constable, of Wassand, are lords of the manor, and the former is chief owner of the soil. The village, which is considerable, is seated in the vale of a small rivulet, about a mile west of the Beverley and Driffield road. The Lockington Car canal, formed by the Hotham family, is two miles long, and joins the river Hull. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £532; patron and incumbent, Rev. Francis Lunday: the tithes for the township of Lockington were commuted for land and a money payment in 1771. The church is a neat edifice, with a small brick tower, and contains monuments to the Constable, Meriton, and other families. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school has been established. About three miles east of the village, is a large artificial mound, called Barrow Hill, formerly surrounded by a moat.

LOCKTON, a chapelry, in the parish of MIDDLETON, union and lythe of PICKERING, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Pickering; containing 347 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises 4010 acres, of which 1142 are inclosed, 1058 unincloded, and 1810 acres are in Saltersgate; the soil is lime, and a blackish mould, and very productive; good stone is burned into lime. The Whitby and Pickering railway passes through the township. The village, which is pleasantly situated, borders on two winding dales. There is a small chapel of ease in the village, which has a square tower, and was rebuilt in 1800; also a place of worship for Wesleyans. Lockton has the privilege of sending six boys to the Levisham free school.

LOCKWOOD, a chapelry, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Huddersfield; containing 4182 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises by computation nearly 1700 acres; the soil is rich and fertile, the surface finely varied, and the scenery of pleasing character; the substratum abounds with stone of good quality for building and other purposes. The village, which forms a rural suburb to the town of Huddersfield, is beautifully situated in the vale of the river Holme, near its confluence with another tributary of the Colne, and on the road to Sheffield; it is extensive and well built, and contains an hotel for the accommodation of persons visiting the spa in its immediate vicinity. Lockwood Spa, erected in 1827, in a deeply-sequestered spot, sheltered by a lofty and well-wooded ridge on the east side of the river, is a handsome range of building, comprising warm, tepid, vapour, cold, and shower baths, with a large swimming-bath, and every requisite arrangement for the internal and external use of the water, which issues from a spring, and is pumped into the baths by a steam-engine. The water, which has a strong sulphureous smell and taste, contains a small proportion of carbonate of lime and sulphate of magnesia, with 35 parts of carburetted, and 17 of sulphuretted, hydrogen, 7 of carbonic acid, and 41 of azotic gas. The manufacture of woollen-cloths, and the weaving of fancy goods, are carried on extensively in the township; and a large brewery was established in 1790. The chapel, now a district church, dedicated to Emanuel, was erected in 1830, at a cost of £3000, by the Parliamentary Commissioners, on a site given by Sir John Ramsden; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a campanile turret, and contains 920 sittings, of which 400 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Almondbury, with a net income of £150. A residence for the incumbent has been erected at the expense of John Brooke, Esq., of Armitage-Bridge Hall. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; and a national school.

LODDINGTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BILLESDON, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Uppingham; containing 137 inhabitants. It comprises about 2000 acres; the soil is gravelly and clayey, and the surface hilly. The living is a vicarage; net income, £92; patron and impropiator, Charles Morris, Esq.: the glebe consists of about 17 acres of land.

LODDINGTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of KETTERING, hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (W.) from Kettering; containing 226 inhabitants. W.) from Kingsbridge; containing, with the chapelry of Buckland-Toutsaints, 1069 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3054 acres, of which 150 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £26. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, impropiator, and incumbent, Rev. Thomas Freke, whose great and small tithes have been commuted for £266 each; the vicarial glebe comprises 103 acres, to which there is a house. The church contains some interesting monuments to the families of Fortescue and Arundell. There is a chapel of ease at Buckland-Toutsaints. Blackdown camp, an ancient military post, is in the neighbourhood.

LODDON (HOLY TRINITY), a market-town and parish, and the head of the union of LODDON and CLAVINGER, in the hundred of LODDON, E. division of NORFOLK, 10 miles (S. E.) from Norwich, and 113 (N. E.) from London; containing 1197 inhabitants. This place, which gives name to the hundred, is situated on the road from Norwich to Beccles, and on the banks of an inconsiderable stream, called the Chet, which flows from the neighbourhood of Howe into the Yare at Hardley cross; it consists of one principal street, of which the inhabitants are well supplied with water. Malting is carried on to a small extent. The market is on Tuesday; and there are fairs on Easter-Monday, and on November 25th for horses. The county magistrates hold petty-sessions every fortnight at the Swan inn, and a court baron is held at the will of the lord of the manor. The parish comprises 2988 acres, of which 2303 are arable, 615 pasture, and 70 wood. The living is a vicarage; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Ely: the great tithes have been commuted for £520, and the vicarial for £300, and the glebe comprises 4 acres. The church, erected at the expense of Sir James Hobart, chief justice of the court of common pleas in the reign of Henry VII., is a fine edifice of stone, in the later English style, with a lofty embattled tower; the font, now much defaced, was formerly very splendid. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. A national school has been established; and about £100 per annum, derived from 80 acres of land, are applied to the repairs of the church, and to the relief of the poor. The union of Loddon and Clavinger comprises 42 parishes or places, containing a population of 14,472.

LODE, a hamlet, in the parish of BOTTISHAM, union of NEWMARKET, hundred of STAINED, county of CAMBRIDGE; containing 494 inhabitants.

LODERS (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of BRIDPORT, liberty of LODERS and BOTHENHAMPTON, Bridport division of Dorset, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Bridport; containing 952 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from London to Exeter, and comprises by measurement 2305 acres, of which 1114 are arable, 1056 pasture, and 134 woodland; the greater portion is beautifully situated in a fertile vale, sheltered by hills, and abounding with varied scenery. There are some quarries of stone, which is of good quality for building, and is also used for the roads; and about 100 persons are employed in the making of twine. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 5. 7½., and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and Sir Molyneux Hyde Nepean, Bart., of whom the latter, with others, is impropriator; net income, £235. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a low massive western tower, and contains numerous interesting details. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a parochial school on the national system is supported by subscription. An alien priory, subordinate to the abbey of Montsburch, in Normandy, was suppressed here in the reign of Richard II., when its revenue, valued at £80, was bestowed on the priory of St. Anne, near Coventry: in the reign of Henry IV., it was restored to its ancient owners, and, after its dissolution by Henry V., formed part of the endowment of Sion Abbey, in the county of Middlesex.

LODSWORTH, a liberty and parish, in the union and parliamentary borough of MIDHURST, hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Petworth; containing 634 inhabitants. The Rother, or Arundel, navigation is crossed by a bridge in this parish, through which also runs the road from Petworth to Midhurst. The liberty is co-extensive with the parish, and consists of certain exemptions granted by the 3rd of Richard I. to the Bishop of London, to whom the manor formerly belonged. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £75; patrons, the family of Poyntz, who, with the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, are the impropriators. Some tithes have been commuted for £110; and £90, the produce of other tithes, are payable to the Dean and Chapter. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, was enlarged in 1839, by the addition of a north transept, at the expense of H. Hollist, Esq., who is lessee of the Dean and Chapter's tithes, and who has established a school on the national system, which is supported by himself and family.

LOFTHOUSE, in CLEVELAND (St. Leonard), a parish, in the union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Guisborough; containing 1091 inhabitants. This place, in the domesday survey Lochtushum, was laid waste by William the Conqueror, in 1069, and subsequently granted by that monarch to Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, who soon afterwards transferred it to the Percy family, of whom William de Percy, the third baron, in 1133, founded at Handall, in the parish, a priory for Benedictine nuns, which he dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and of which the revenue, at the Dissolution, was estimated at £20. 7. 8. The lands remained for many generations in possession of the Percys, and the greater portion of them is now the property of the Hon. Major-General Sir Robert Lawrence Dundas, lord of the manor. The parish is bounded on the north by the sea, and comprises by measurement 3775 acres, including 383 of common or waste. Near the coast the ground is elevated, but it declines gradually from the cliffs towards the village, whence it rises gently, assuming a northern aspect, and commanding a good view of the sea; the surface is diversified with richly-wooded dales, and the scenery is pleasingly picturesque. The substratum is chiefly freestone of good quality for building; and the rocks abound with alum, of which very extensive works, belonging to the lord of the manor, afford employment to many of the inhabitants of the adjacent hamlets. Lofthouse Hall, the seat of Major-General Dundas, is a handsome mansion, recently erected; and Handall Abbey, about a mile to the south, is beautifully situated. The village, which is on the coast road from Guisborough to Whitby, consists mainly of one long street of houses built of stone. A customary market is held on Thursday. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £600. The church, originally given by William de Saucey to the priory of Guisborough, was rebuilt in 1813, at a cost of £1300, and is a spacious structure, with a square embattled tower; and a parsonage-house, in the Italian style, has been built by the present rector, the Rev. Horatio Hildyard. There are some remains of the convent.

LOFTHOUSE, with CARLTON, a township, in the parish of ROTHWELL, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Wakefield; containing 1536 inhabitants. This township, which includes the manors and villages of Lofthouse and Carlton, comprises by computation 1810 acres; the soil, though various, is generally fertile, and the commons were inclosed under an act of parliament obtained in 1836; the substrata are chiefly coal and freestone, of excellent quality, and in extensive operation. The village of Lofthouse is situated on the road from Leeds to Wakefield, along which it stretches for a considerable length; and about a mile to the north-east of it, is the village of Carlton, of which many of the inhabitants are employed in the rope manufacture. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £187, and the vicarial for £100. An episcopal chapel was erected at Lofthouse, in 1840, at an expense of £1050, of which £250 were granted by the Ripon Diocesan, and £100 by the Incorporated Society; it is a handsome structure in the early English style, and contains 392 sittings, of which 294 are free. A parsonage-house, also, was erected in 1842, at a cost of £600, of which one moiety was paid by the Ripon Society; the sites for the chapel and house, including the chapel-yard and garden, were given by Miss Harrison. An ecclesiastical district, comprising likewise the township of Thorpe, has just been assigned, including a population of 1606 persons, and of which the Rev. Robert Chadwick is incumbent; patron, the Vicar of Rothwell; net income, £120. A school-house, also, for the reception of 200 children is about to be erected, with a master's residence, at a cost of £500, on a site given for the purpose by Samuel Stocks, Esq., of Wakefield, and J. J. Charlesworth, Esq. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LOFTSOME, with WRESSEL, a township, in the parish of WRESSEL, union of HOWDEN, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Howden; containing 174 inhabitants, of whom 20 are in the hamlet of Loftsome. The township comprises about 1380 acres: the hamlet lies near the Derwent, over which is a wooden bridge, so constructed as to admit the passage of vessels.

LOGARSTON, a township, in the parish of ALMELEY, union of WEOBLY, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD.

LOLWORTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ST. IVES, hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Cambridge; containing 122 inhabitants. It comprises 1076 acres, of which 62 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 2. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Sir J. Hawley, Bart., and P. Orchard and L. W. Buck, Esqrs.: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe contains 24 acres.

LONDESBOROUGH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of POCKLINGTON, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Market-Weighton; containing 267 inhabitants. This place was, for several generations, the seat of the Clifford family; and in the village, park, and gardens, several Roman coins, and repositories of the dead, have been discovered, on which account Dr. Drake considers it to have been the Roman station Delgovitia. The parish comprises 4200 acres, of which about 300 are wood, and 400 comprehended in the park, to which the Roman road from Brough is continued in a line. Londesborough Hall, a large and ancient mansion, in the form of the letter H, was taken down in 1819; and a neat mansion in the Elizabethan style was built in 1839. The village is pleasant, and picturesquely seated on the western side of the wolds. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16; net income, £798; patron, Duke of Devonshire. The church stands on the verge of the park, and consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with an embattled tower at the west end; the interior is neat, and has a few mural monuments of the Clifford and other families. A national school is chiefly supported by the Duke of Devonshire and the rector. An hospital for twelve aged bachelors, widowers, or widows, was founded by the first Earl and Countess of Burlington.

Arms.

339 (S. E.) from Dublin. It contains, including some of the adjoining parishes, which may be considered as forming part of the metropolis, 1,873,676 inhabitants, of whom 54,626 are in the city Within the Walls, 70,382 in the city Without the Walls, 98,098 in the borough of Southwark, and 222,053 in the city of Westminster.

HISTORICAL ACCOUNT.

The earliest notice that we find of London, which is now the most important, if not the most extensive, city in the world, is in Julius Cæsar's account of his two exploratory expeditions from Gaul to Britain, styled his Commentaries. It is identified with the Civitas Trinobantum, or "city of the Trinobantes," by which people it was probably selected on account of its peculiarly fine situation, being protected on the north by an eminence, a forest, and a morass; on the west, by the deep ravine named the Fleet; on the east, by another ravine, since called Walbrook; and on the south, by the Thames, connected with extensive marshes, sheltered by the Kent and Surrey hills; thus combining, with other advantages, all the natural defences that could be desired by an uncivilized people. At a very early period it was considered peculiarly eligible as a seat of commerce, its proximity to the sea being sufficient to afford the full advantage of the tide, whilst the distance was great enough to furnish a perfect security against any sudden attack from the naval force of an enemy. The name Londonium is, according to the most prevailing opinion, a Latinization of the British compound Llyn-din, "the town on the lake;" the vast estuary formed by the Thames here, at that time, being a peculiarity attached to no other British town; whilst Lun-dun, "the town in the grove," and Llhong-din, "the city of ships," the next two most probable etymons, are liable to insuperable objections; the former name, expressing a feature said by Cæsar to have been common to all British towns, which he describes as fortified woods; and the latter being inapplicable before the place became known as a naval station. The Saxons called it Lunden-Ceaster, of which the affix, as well as those of wick and byrg or byrig, occasionally used by them, appears to have been dropped at the time of the Norman Conquest.

The first event on record is its destruction by Boadicea, queen of the Iceni, in the reign of Nero, in the year 60. Its progress since the time of Cæsar had been so rapid, that Tacitus describes it, at this period, as "the chief residence of merchants, and the great mart of trade;" though not then dignified, like Camalodunum (Maldon, or Colchester), and Verulamium (St. Alban's), with the name of a colony; nor, as it appears, fortified in the Roman manner. A few years afterwards, the Romans made it a permanent station, subject to the authority of their own laws. It is agreed to have been surrounded by a wall in the fourth century; and, according to Dr. Stukeley, the Roman city occupied an oblong square, extending in length from Ludgate to Wal-brook, and in breadth from Maiden-lane, Lad-lane, and Cateaton-street, to the Thames. This space was between the river Fleta, on the west, and the stream called Wal-brook, on the east, and comprised about one-fifth of the area subsequently surrounded by a wall, the height of which, when perfect, was twenty-two feet, throughout its whole circuit. The wall commenced at the Palatine tower, proceeded in a straight line along the eminence of Ludgate-hill, as far as Newgate, and was then suddenly carried eastward to a spot a little beyond Aldersgate, running thence straight in a northerly direction, almost as far as Cripplegate, from which spot it returned, in a direct easterly course, as far as Bishopsgate, where a large remnant of the wall, called "London Wall," remained standing until the late removal of Bethlehem hospital. From Bishopsgate the wall assumed a gentle curvature to the Tower, over the site of which it originally passed, and probably finished in a castellum at this, as it did at the western extremity. Another wall skirted the river, and ran the whole length of Thames-street. Fifteen towers and bastions, of Roman masonry, increased the strength of these fortifications, to which, in after times, was added a broad deep ditch; and at Barbican stood the Specula, or Watch-tower, so named. Four gates afforded entrance from the great military roads which then intersected South Britain. The Prætorian way, improved from the British Watling-street, passed under one of those gates, at the spot where Aldersgate formerly stood, whence it proceeded along that street to Billingsgate, and thence continued, on the opposite bank of the Thames, to its southern termination at Dovor. The Ermin-street led from a trajectus, or ferry, which crossed from Stoney-street, Southwark, to Dowgate, and, passing by Bishopsgate, pursued the course of the present road northwards to Ad Fines (Braughing). Another road passed through Newgate, by Holborn and Oxford-street, to Ad Pontes (Staines), from which there was a branch road, in a north-easterly direction, by Portpool-lane, Clerkenwell, Old-street, and Hackney, to Duroleiton, the modern Layton, in Essex. Bishopsgate, Moorgate, Ludgate, &c., were added as new roads were formed: Temple Bar is modern, not having been built until 1670, after the great fire. Roman antiquities, consisting of foundations of houses, temples, walls and streets, tessellated pavements, sepulchral monuments, urns, glasses, coins, articles of dress, and numerous other remains, have been discovered on the site of the present metropolis, as is more particularly noticed at the close of the article; and the London stone, in Cannon-street, is considered by most antiquaries as part of a Roman milliary, and the central point from which the great Roman roads diverged.

The city continued to improve under the Romans, and had greatly increased in importance before the year 211, when we find it recorded as "a great and wealthy place, illustrious for the vast number of merchants who resorted to it, for its widely-extended commerce, and for the abundance of every species of commodity it could supply." Antoninus, at this period, makes seven of his fifteen itineræ terminate here, and its early importance is further evinced by its having been a municipium, or free city, and the residence of the Vicars of Britain, under the Roman Emperors. In the year 359, no less than 800 vessels are said to have been employed in the exportation from London of corn alone, and its commerce is stated to have increased proportionally, until the end of the fourth century. On the abandonment of Britain by the Romans, a new and fierce race succeeded to their dominions. The warlike Saxons, under their leaders, Hengist and Horsa, landed in 448, at Upwines fleet, the present Ebbs-flete, in the Isle of Thanet. The Britons, however, remained masters of London for at least nine years after that event; as, being defeated in 457 at Creccanford, now Crayford, they evacuated Kent, and fled to the capital. On Hengist's death, in 488, having then been for some time in the possession of the Saxons, it was retaken by Ambrosius, and retained by the Britons during a considerable part of the following century. In the year 604, it seems to have recovered from the ravages of the invaders, so that Bede terms it "a princely mart town;" and its chief magistrate was called portgrave, or portreeve.

London was the chief town of the Saxon kingdom of Essex, and, on the conversion of the East Saxons to Christianity, it became an episcopal see. Sebert was the first Christian king of Essex; and his maternal uncle, Ethelbert, King of Kent, founded here, about the commencement of the seventh century, a church, dedicated to St. Paul, of which Melitus was consecrated the first bishop. In the years 764, 788, and 801, the capital suffered severely from fires, as it did also in 849, on an invasion of the Danes, who entered the Thames with 250 ships, plundered and burnt the city, and massacred the inhabitants. In a similar attempt with an increased naval force, two years afterwards, the same invaders were completely defeated by Ethelwulph and his son Ethelbald; yet London suffered more from these two assaults than it had ever done before. Under Egbert, though not the seat of government, it was advancing fast in importance, a wittena-gemot having been held in 833, to consult on the means of repelling the Danes. Alfred restored the city, which he constituted the capital of all England, but had the mortification, in 893, to see it almost entirely reduced to ashes by an accidental fire, which raged with the more uncontrollable fury as the houses were, at that time, almost wholly built of wood. It was a second time rebuilt, and, for its better government, divided by Alfred into wards and precincts; that monarch also instituted the office of sheriff in London, as in other parts of the kingdom. In 925, King Athelstan had a royal palace here, and appointed eight mints for the coinage of money; and the city increased in importance during the succeeding reigns, until the year 1015, when Canute the Dane, with his fleet, sailed up the Thames and besieged it; but he was repulsed, and after having blockaded it, and made several unsuccessful attempts, a compromise was effected between the two kings, Edmund Ironside and Canute, whereby London was conceded to the latter. The comparative opulence of the city, at this time, is evinced by its having paid a seventh part of the tax levied on the whole nation by that monarch, the total amount of which was £72,000. In a witten-gemot at Oxford, to determine the succession after the death of Canute, we find the "pilots of London" summoned, thereby meaning its magistrates, or leading men. Edward the Confessor granted to London the Court of Hustings, and by his charter, in which the city is called Troy-novant, gave it pre-eminence over all his other cities: he moreover confirmed its right of manumission of slaves who had resided there a year and a day, from which is deduced the custom of calling the city "The King's Free Chamber."

On the successful invasion of England by William the Norman, the magistrates of London, in conjunction with the prelates and nobility, invited him to accept the title of king, and he was crowned at Westminster. In return, that prince granted to the city two charters, confirming the whole of the privileges it had enjoyed under the Saxon kings, and adding several others. The government at this time appears to have been vested in the bishop and a portreeve. In the year 1077, another fire having destroyed a great part of the city, with St. Paul's cathedral, Maurice, Bishop of London, laid the foundation of a new church, on a more extended scale than the former. That part of the city which had been destroyed by the last-mentioned fire was soon rebuilt more magnificently than before; and the White Tower, now forming a portion of the Tower of London, was erected by William I., in 1078. Domesday book contains no notice of London at this time, owing, it is supposed, to a separate survey having been made of it, which is now lost; but it mentions, as part of the suburbs, a vineyard in Holborn, in the possession of the crown, and ten acres of land, near Bishopsgate, belonging to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's: the latter is the present manor of Norton-Falgate, and both are now situated within the limits of the metropolis. In 1090, a tremendous hurricane overthrew about six hundred houses, with several churches, and damaged the Tower of London, which last was repaired and strengthened with additional works, by William Rufus, who, in 1097, also founded Westminster Hall. Henry I., as a reward for the ready submission of the men of London to his usurped authority, bestowed upon the city the first charter in which its privileges were circumstantially detailed; amongst these was the perpetual shrievalty of Middlesex, which enabled the citizens to unite the power of the two shrievalties in freemen of their own nomination. The standard of weights and measures was granted to them about the same time; and, by the same king's charter, it was further stipulated, that the city should have all its ancient privileges, as well by land as by water. In the first year of the reign of Stephen, another fire, beginning near London stone, consumed all the houses eastward to Aldgate, and westward to St. Paul's, together with London bridge, which was then of wood. This occasioned, in 1192, an order to the mayor and aldermen, that "all houses hereafter erected in the city, or liberties thereof, should be built of stone, with party walls of the same, and covered either with slate or tiles, to prevent the recurrence of fires, which had been occasioned by the houses having been built of wood, and thatched with straw, or reeds;" but this order does not appear to have been extensively carried into effect.

Of the state of London at this early period, an admirable picture is afforded in the description by Fitz-Stephen, a contemporary monk, wherein he informs us that the city was strongly walled and fortified; that it abounded with churches, convents, and public buildings; carried on an extensive commerce with distant parts of the world; and had a large disposable military force. The chief improvement during the reign of Henry II. was the foundation, in 1176, of a new bridge of stone, which was completed in 1209. The year 1189 is memorable in the metropolitan annals for the cruel massacre of the Jews, which took place at the coronation of Richard I. In 1210, King John empowered "the barons of London," as they are styled, to choose their mayor annually, or continue him from year to year at pleasure; but in 1252 a by-law was made, ordaining that no one should be mayor longer than one year. In 1212 occurred a destructive fire, by which, according to Stowe, 3000 persons perished. In 1214, the Town ditch, surrounding the city walls, was commenced, and after several hundred persons had been employed upon it for upwards of two years, was completed in 1218. In 1215, the citizens, taking part with the barons against King John, opened their gates to Louis the Dauphin and his army. In the same year happened a great fire, which began in Southwark, and extended to London bridge, where it destroyed 3000 persons, whose escape was prevented by another fire breaking out at the Middlesex end of the bridge.

The increase of buildings in the metropolis, from the reign of Henry I. to the period last named, kept pace with the extension of its municipal privileges. In this interval, of little more than a century, twelve large monasteries were founded in London and its suburbs, including the magnificent establishments of the Knights Templars and the Knights Hospitallers, the superb priory of the Holy Trinity, in Aldgate, of which the prior was an alderman of London, and others of nearly equal magnitude. Several additional gates were also erected, in consequence of the formation of new roads; as well as magnificent mansions built by the wealthy citizens, such as Gerard's Hall, Basing Hall, the Ledyn Porch, &c.; and various parochial churches rebuilt on a more grand and substantial scale. In consequence of the extensive foundations above-mentioned, and the increased number of private houses, in the reign of Henry III., the supply of water furnished from Old-bourne (Holborn), Wal-brook, and Ley-bourne, was found insufficient, and a new supply was obtained from the springs in the village of Tyburn; and, in 1285, a conduit in Cheapside was first supplied with this water, by leaden pipes. The fee-farm of Queen-hythe had, previously to this period, been purchased from Richard, Earl of Cornwall, by the corporation, subject to an annual quit-rent of £50, thus affording additional facilities for the increased commerce of the metropolis. In 1258, a dreadful famine was experienced, in consequence of the high price of corn, and 20,000 persons are said to have died of hunger. In 1262, a considerable part of West-cheap was reduced to ashes by a fire wilfully caused by some unknown incendiaries. In 1266, the Earl of Gloucester, in rebellion against Henry III., entered the city with an army, and built bulwarks, cut trenches, and made other defences.

In 1296, in the reign of Edward I., the wards of London, first formed by Alfred, but uncertain as to their number, were extended to twenty-four, with each a presiding alderman, and common-councilmen appointed to be chosen annually, as at present, for the several precincts: a common seal was also granted to the city. Edward III., who began his reign in 1327, decreed that the mayor should be one of the judges of Oyer and Terminer, or gaol delivery of Newgate; that the citizens should not be compelled to go to war out of the city; and moreover that the liberties and franchises of the city should not, after this time, on any pretext, be taken into the king's hands: he also granted that the mayor should be the only escheator within the city. In 1338, the serjeants of the mayor and sheriffs were empowered to bear maces of silver gilt, with the king's arms engraven on them; and in 1340, tolls were imposed for paving the streets. In 1348 occurred a great plague; and in the course of the same year, Sir Walter Manny founded the Charter House, near Smithfield, with Pardon churchyard adjoining, to be a place of burial for such as died of it. In 1354 it was ordained that the aldermen, who had been hitherto changed yearly, should not be removed without some especial cause. In 1380 occurred Wat Tyler's rebellion, when William Walworth, mayor, was knighted in the field, together with several aldermen, for their gallant behaviour on the occasion; and the dagger is said to have been added to the city arms on account of Walworth having killed the rebel Tyler in Smithfield with that weapon. In 1406, London was afflicted with another great plague, which swept away upwards of 30,000 people. In 1416, Sir Henry Barton, mayor, ordained that lanterns, with lights, should be hung out on winter evenings, between Hallowtide and Candlemas; and in the following year this custom was general. In 1417, a new guildhall was built on the site of the present edifice, in lieu of a mean cottage, formerly occupied as such, in Aldermanbury; and in 1419 Leadenhall was erected as a public granary. The supply of water being found insufficient, in 1443, pipes were laid from Paddington. In 1449, the Kentish rebel, Jack Cade, made his entry into London.

About the year 1460 occurs the earliest notice of the use of brick in the buildings of London, which material was first made in Moorfields, and afterwards gradually superseded wood, and became generally used in erecting dwelling-houses. New conduits, and cisterns for water, were also constructed. In 1469, the Tower being delivered to the mayor and his brethren, the aldermen, they set at liberty King Henry VI., who was confined there. Under Richard III. and Henry VII. various additions were made to the royal palace at Westminster; and the latter monarch, besides founding his magnificent chapel at the abbey adjoining, rebuilt Baynard's castle, in Thames-street. In the thirteenth year of his reign, several gardens in Finsbury were destroyed, and formed into a field for archers, whence the origin of the present Artillery Company. During this reign also the river Fleet was made navigable, Houndsditch was arched over, and many less works of utility or ornament were completed. Henry VIII. continued the improvements of the metropolis; and during his reign the police was better regulated, many nuisances were removed, the streets and avenues were mended and paved, and various regulations were carried into effect for supplying the metropolis with provisions sufficient to answer the demands of its increasing population. The greatest alteration made in the aspect of the city, in this reign, was effected in the year 1535, by the dissolution of religious houses, of which upwards of twenty had been founded between the reign of Edward I. and the period of suppression, besides those before mentioned, amounting in all to fifty-four larger monasteries, exclusively of minor institutions. The religious establishments, usually occupying large plots of ground, now gave way to the erection of schools, hospitals, manufactories, noblemen's mansions, and other edifices. Two royal palaces, St. James' and Bridewell, were among the splendid structures erected by Henry VIII.; and to the same monarch is to be attributed a considerable part of the buildings in New Palace Yard, Westminster, and at Whitehall, particularly the Cock-pit, and the fine gateway by Holbein, which formerly stood at the latter palace, as also the laying out of St. James' Park. Until the Reformation, the government of Westminster had been vested solely in its abbot, but in the settlement of that great revolution it was placed first in the hands of a bishop, and subsequently in those of the Dean of Westminster, in whom it still, in some degree, continues. Near this period, notwithstanding a recent revival of commerce, and the enlargement of the metropolis, it is stated that there were not above four merchant vessels exceeding 120 tons' burthen in the river Thames; and afterwards it is observed, in a letter from a London merchant to Sir William Cecil, that there was "not a city in Europe, having the occupying that London had, that was so slenderly provided with ships:" yet a spirit of enterprise was then very general among our merchants. By an act in the seventh of Edward VI., for the general regulation of taverns and public-houses, it was directed, that there should be only forty in the city and liberties of London, and three in Westminster. In this reign also, Southwark was annexed to London, and constituted a twenty-sixth ward, under the name of "Bridge ward Without."

The commencement of Elizabeth's reign was distinguished by the building of the Royal Exchange, and various other works of public utility. In 1580, from the great increase of the city, that queen prohibited the erection of any new buildings within three miles of the city gates, and ordained that only one family should inhabit each house; and another proclamation, in 1583, commanded that no new building should be erected within three miles of London and Westminster, that one dwelling-house should not be converted into two or more, and that the commons within three miles of London should not be inclosed. At this period, notwithstanding the danger that was anticipated by increasing the size of the metropolis, it appears, from contemporary plans, that the greater part of London was contained within the walls, and even in those narrow limits there were numerous gardens, upon the sites of which have since been formed lanes, courts, and alleys. On the whole of the space now constituting the parishes of St. Margaret, Westminster; St. Martin-in-the-Fields; St. Paul, Covent Garden; St. Anne, Soho; St. Giles-in-the-Fields; St. George, Bloomsbury; and even including the extensive parish of St. Mary-le-bone, there were not at that time 2000 houses. All the north side of the city, continuing through Clerkenwell, as far as Shore-ditch church, was very thinly scattered with dwellings; the whole of Spitalfields, Goodman's-fields, Bethnal-green, and Stepney and Limehouse fields, were, what their names import, open spaces of ground, having here and there groups of cottages and gardens; and on the Surrey side of the river, with the exception of the Borough of Southwark, Bermondsey, and part of Lambeth parish next to the Thames, the entire space was devoid of buildings. In 1594, the Thames water was first conveyed into houses, by means of an engine of a pyramidal form, erected at Broken wharf, to which succeeded the "London-Bridge Water-Works;" and, in 1613, that great work of public benefit, the New River, which was projected and executed by Sir Hugh Myddelton, was brought to its head at Clerkenwell, from Amwell, in Hertfordshire. In 1616, the sides of the principal streets, which had before been laid with pebbles, were paved with broad stones and flags.

Building continued to advance after the death of Elizabeth; and we find that most part of Spitalfields, and about 320 acres to the south and south-east of it, were then covered with houses. James I., alarmed at this rapid growth of the metropolis, issued his proclamation, in 1618, against the erection of new buildings; but the suburbs, notwithstanding, had greatly increased in 1640, especially to the westward, in the parishes of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and St. Paul, Covent Garden. In 1643, Cheapside cross was demolished, by the authority of the common-council, as a relic of superstition, thus increasing unintentionally the width and accommodation of that great central thoroughfare. Another attempt was made, during the Protectorate, in 1656, to prevent the enlargement of the metropolis; for which purpose, all houses built since the year 1620, within ten miles of it, were taxed, and fines were imposed on those who raised new buildings within that distance. About 1661, many streets, on the site of St. James' parish, were built or finished, particularly St. James'-street, Pall-Mall, and Piccadilly; other thoroughfares were ordered to be widened; and candles, or lights in lanterns, were to be hung out by the occupier of every house fronting the street, between Michaelmas and Lady-day, from night-fall until nine o'clock, when it was presumed that people retired to bed. The dreadful plague, in 1665, put a temporary stop to the increase of the metropolis. This infection was generally thought to have been brought from Holland, about the close of the year 1664, and made its appearance in the neighbourhood of Drury-lane: 68,596 persons are calculated to have perished in the course of the year 1665, during which, London was so far deserted by its inhabitants, that grass grew in the principal streets.

The great fire of London, the most terrible conflagration that the metropolis ever suffered, succeeded "the Plague year," as it is emphatically styled: it broke out on Sunday, the 2nd of September, 1666, at the house of a baker in Pudding-lane, Thames-street. The houses being then for the most part of wood, with projecting stories, the uppermost of which, from the narrowness of the streets, almost touched each other, and a strong easterly wind blowing at the time, the fire spread rapidly and continued raging until Thursday, when it was nearly extinguished, having destroyed 13,200 houses and 89 churches, exclusively of the venerable Cathedral of St. Paul, the greater part of the corporation halls, London bridge, and other public edifices, covering an extent of 436 acres of ground with ruins. The value of the property involved in the destruction was calculated at upwards of £10,000,000. To perpetuate the remembrance of the melancholy event, "The Monument," on Fish-street-hill, was erected by order of parliament; it was commenced in 1671, and finished in 1677, from a design by Sir Christopher Wren. In rebuilding the city, many improvements were effected: the streets, which were before so narrow that, according to Sir William Davenant's facetious remark, "they seemed to have been contrived in the days of wheelbarrows," were widened; conduits and other obstructions were removed, and the buildings in general were constructed on a more substantial and regular plan. An increased number of houses, amounting to nearly 4000, was added, by building on the sites of the gardens belonging to the halls and merchants' residences; and although the noble plans of Wren and Evelyn, for rebuilding the metropolis, were rejected, it arose, on the whole, with increased splendour. Many houses in Southwark having been destroyed by an extensive fire, in 1676, an act was passed for rebuilding them of brick instead of wood.

In 1685, the population in Spitalfields and St. Giles' was much increased by the settlement of French Protestant manufacturers, who had left their native country in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes; and in the same year, the western suburbs increasing, the two parishes of St. Anne, Soho, and St. James, were formed, both of which were previously parts of the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. In 1689, the district called the Seven Dials was built on a spot named Cock and Pye Fields. From the great increase of the commerce and shipping of London, the suburbs to the east of the Tower were become so populous in 1694 that a new parish was constituted, by the name of St. John's, Wapping. Soho-square and Golden-square were built at the close of the century. At this time, also, that useful institution called the Penny Post had its origin, a proof of the enlargement of the capital; and the number of hackney-coaches, which in Cromwell's time was limited to 300, had increased to 900, exclusively of 200 sedan-chairs. Shortly after, in the reign of Queen Anne, 50 new churches were erected in the metropolis and its vicinity. In 1722, the Chelsea Water-Works' Company was established, for supplying the city of Westminster and the western suburbs with water. A few years subsequently, Hanover-square, Cavendish-square, with the streets adjacent, and Bedford-row, Red-Lion-square, Hatton Garden, &c., were built; the streets from Leicester-square and St. Martin's-lane to the Haymarket and Soho, and thence nearly to Knightsbridge, were finished in the reign of George II.; and in 1729, the north side of Oxford-street was partly built, and many streets near it were completed. In 1730, the hamlet of Spitalfields became so populous, in consequence of the prosperity of the silk manufacture, as to make it necessary to form it into a distinct parish, which received the name of Christ-Church; and about the same period the parishes of St. George-in-the-East, St. Anne (Limehouse), and St. Matthew (Bethnal-green), were separated from Stepney, and the parish of St. Luke was formed out of that of St. Giles, in Farringdon ward Without.

The improvements in the construction of the buildings, and in the local regulations of the metropolis, during the period last described, and principally in the reign of George III., were of considerable importance. About the year 1760, most of the city gates were pulled down. In 1762, an act was passed to remove the shop signs, which, projecting from almost every house into the middle of the street, materially obstructed the light and air; and at the same time the water-spouts, which projected in like manner, were taken down, and the names of the streets were ordered to be affixed at the corners of each. In the mode of erecting dwelling-houses, many salutary alterations were effected by the Building act. In 1768, commissioners were appointed by act of parliament for paving, lighting, and watching the streets, and for regulating the stands of hackney-coaches; and in 1774, an act was passed for placing fire-cocks in the water-pipes, with conspicuous notices of their distances and situations, and for keeping fire-engines and ladders in every parish. About 1795, in pursuance of a legislative enactment authorizing a lottery for the purpose, called "The City Lottery," Snow-hill, and the western side of Temple Bar, were materially widened and improved; and about the same period several companies were established for supplying the metropolis with water, and subsequently for lighting the streets and shops with gas.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION.

London is eminently fortunate in being situated upon rising ground, and on a river of ample extent, which, flowing through the town, is agitated twice in twenty-four hours, by a tide which ascends fifteen miles above it, and, by its winding in this part of its course, greatly contributes not only to the embellishment, but to the healthful ventilation, of the metropolis. The Thames is crossed by five magnificent bridges of stone and one of cast-iron; its mean breadth here is about 400 yards, and were the noble plans that have been proposed in various quarters for embanking it, and forming quays and terraces along its sides carried into effect, this important adjunct to the salubrity, and to the commerce, of London, would present an appearance truly splendid, enhanced by the beauty of adequate approaches, and the utility of commodious lines of way. Occupying a gentle slope on the north side of the river, which extends from east to west in a kind of amphitheatre, together with a level tract on the southern bank, the city is surrounded on every side, for nearly twenty miles, by thickly-scattered villages and seats. The streets are regularly paved, having a central carriage way, and a foot-path on each side; the pavement of the former is chiefly composed of square blocks of granite, and the latter is laid with large flags. Some, however, of the wider streets in the western part of the metropolis are macadamized, and many thoroughfares are paved with wood in a very ingenious, and, considering the unceasing traffic constantly testing its capabilities, durable manner. The foot-paths are in general broad, and have a regular curb-stone, raised some inches above the carriage way, which latter has a slight convexity, in the middle, to allow the water to pass off into channels on each side. Underneath are large vaulted sewers, communicating with every house by smaller ones, and with every street by convenient openings and gratings, to carry off to the river every impurity; and all mud and rubbish accumulating on the surface of the streets are taken away by scavengers employed for that purpose. Nearly all the streets and principal shops are lighted with gas, supplied by several incorporated companies; and as an evidence of the magnitude of the metropolis, it may be stated, that for lighting London and its suburbs with gas, there are 180,000 tons of coal used in the year for making 1,460,000,000 cubic feet of gas; 134,300 private burners are supplied to about 400,000 customers; there are 30,400 public or street consumers, and 380 lamplighters are employed. Almost the whole of the houses, a few of ancient date excepted, are constructed of brick; the more modern and larger edifices are built of stone, or covered stucco resembling it. Excellent water is plentifully conveyed from the Thames, the New River, and other sources, to almost every house; and spring water is obtained from pumps, erected in various parts of the town. The quantity of water daily supplied by the eight different water-companies, in 1833-4, was 21,110,555 imperial gallons.

Strictly speaking, London is still confined within its ancient bounds, and the limits of the corporate jurisdiction of the city; but, as a continuity of buildings has connected it with Westminster, Southwark, and all the neighbouring villages and hamlets, the name is, in common usage, given to them all collectively, their respective proper names being no more than subdivisions of one great metropolis. In this general view, therefore, London may be said to consist of several divisions; one of which, the City, properly so called, comprehends the most ancient and central part of London, and is almost exclusively occupied by shops, warehouses, counting-houses, and public offices devoted to business, The East End of the Town includes Wapping, Shadwell, Ratcliffe-highway, &c., extending from Tower-hill, eastward, to the East India Docks, and this part has, within the last thirty years, assumed an importance unknown to preceding ages, vast commercial docks and warehouses having been constructed; the inhabitants, consisting of shipwrights, ship-owners, and captains of vessels, pilots, sailors, shop-keepers, and others, are generally connected with the shipping interests, and are supported by the business of the port. The West End, the most modern and elegant part of London, is inhabited by the nobility and gentry, is the seat of Government, the residence of the court, and the centre of fashion, and consists principally of handsome squares and streets, which may be said to extend westward from the meridian of Charing Cross. Lastly, there is Southwark, a district lying on the south bank of the Thames, and comprehending five parishes, connected with others by extensive ranges of houses, and chiefly inhabited by merchants, traders, and manufacturers; it had formerly only one main street, called the Borough High-street, leading from London bridge towards Newington, but the increase of buildings has since added numerous others, stretching in various directions, and forming a town, several miles in extent. That part of the metropolis on the north-west, and which may be considered as the latest enlargement, and the most elegant, as well as the most systematic in its arrangement of squares and streets, comprehends an immense mass of new buildings, between Holborn and Somers-town, and in the parishes of St. Mary-le-bone and Paddington. And besides these, the villages of Chelsea, Knightsbridge, Paddington, Camden-town, Pentonville, Islington, Mile-End, Limehouse, Rotherhithe, Bermondsey, Newington, Camberwell, Lambeth, &c., united by the contiguity of their buildings, may be considered as appendages to this gigantic capital. Thus regarded, the EXTENT of London, from west to east, along the banks of the Thames, or from the upper end of Knightsbridge to the lower end of Poplar, is seven miles and a half; and its breadth from north to south, or from Islington to Kennington, is about five miles and a half: its circumference is full thirty miles, and hence it may be fairly estimated, that the buildings of the metropolis cover at least twenty square miles, extending in length seven miles. This space contains between 8000 and 9000 streets and smaller avenues, more than 70 squares, and 200,000 houses, besides an immense number of public buildings. The town, in the direction of east and west, is traversed by two principal ranges of streets, which may be termed the great southern and northern lines, forming under different names, a communication from one end to the other. The streets running north and south, which connect the above-mentioned lines, are comparatively short, as are also those from the southern line to the river. Those from the northern line to the New-road are longer; but, with the exception of Tottenham-Court-road, and its continuation to Camden-town, St. John's-street, to the extremity of Islington, and Bishops-gate-street, Shoreditch, and some others, they are all of moderate length.

The beauty of the ENVIRONS is greatly enhanced by a chain of hills to the north of the town, forming a second amphitheatre, entirely inclosing the first, and of which Hampstead, Highgate, and Muswell hills are the most prominent features. On the east and west are extensive plains, stretching twenty miles, in each direction, along the banks of the Thames, and forming a most fertile, populous, and interesting valley; those which lie eastward of the town feed numerous herds of cattle, and those westward are chiefly employed in the production of fruit and vegetables for the supply of the London market. That part of the metropolis which is situated south of the Thames occupies a flat surface, bounded by a landscape beautifully varied from west to east by the heights of Richmond, Wimbledon, Epsom, Norwood, and Blackheath, and terminating in the horizon with Leith hill, Box hill, the Reigate hills, the Wrotham hills, and Shooter's hill. On every side the approaches are spacious and kept in admirable order, and, like the town, lighted at night with gas, and well watched and patrolled. Country houses of opulent merchants and tradesmen, or the mansions of the nobility, standing detached and surrounded by plantations, or arranged together in successive handsome rows, are every where to be seen, either on the sides, or in the vicinity, of these roads, together with numerous villages, some of which imitate the commercial activity of the metropolis.

The INCREASE of London, since the commencement of the present century, has exceeded, if possible, that of the last in celerity and extent, and is visible on all sides, but perhaps more especially on the western and northern, where the buildings in the parishes of Paddington, St. Mary-le-bone, Bloomsbury, and St. Pancras, have been amazingly extended, by the formation of an incredible number of new streets, squares, and places, for the most part after elegant designs. In the same quarter of the town, also, the Regent's Park has been laid out, and surrounded with stately ranges of brick buildings stuccoed so as to resemble stone. A great number of excellent residences have been lately completed on the space behind Gower-street, formerly called the Long-Fields, and these again are adjoined eastward by the new church of St. Pancras, and the elegant streets in its neighbourhood. Proceeding towards the east, we perceive the village of Islington to have joined the city on one side, and St. Pancras on the other, and to have stretched itself over the White Conduit fields (formerly celebrated amongst our early places of amusement) to the hamlet of Holloway, and through that link to Highgate and Hornsey. In the parishes of Shoreditch, Hackney, Stratford-le-Bow, &c., the extent of building has every where immensely increased; and at the direct eastern extremity of London are the East and West India, the London, and the St. Katherine's docks. On the Southwark side of the Thames is Newington, with the streets adjacent to it, connecting Camberwell with Southwark; while Kennington, Brixton, Clapham, and Battersea-fields, have numerous extensive, and continually increasing ranges of building. On viewing the surface of the parishes of Rotherhithe, Bermondsey, Walworth, Newington, Camberwell, and Lambeth, also on the south side of London, much ground is yet occupied as fields or gardens; but these parishes may be said, notwithstanding, to form an immense connected town in many places, and are again joined to Deptford and Greenwich, on the east; and to Peckham, Stockwell, Clapham, Battersea, &c., on the south and southwest. In that part of Chelsea called the Five Fields the Marquess of Westminster has erected several beautiful squares and uniform lines of streets, on what was formerly waste ground, constituting one of the most handsome metropolitan improvements. The advantageous alterations in the western part of the metropolis include the recent widening of the Strand, &c.; the new and elegant buildings on the site of Carlton House and Gardens; the erections and embellishments in the vicinity of Whitehall; the laying-out of St. James' Park, and various changes and buildings in the interior of, and at the entrances to, Hyde Park; the mass of new streets and mansions on the north side of Pimlico, before-named; and many additions to the buildings of the Regent's Park and its neighbourhood, as well as on the intermediate space connecting Westminster with St. Mary-le-bone, formed by the fine line of Regent-street, and the streets and places branching from it. As evidence of the great extent of building mentioned, it is conjectured that, within the last 60 years, 80,000 houses, at least, have been erected in London and its vicinity; and that these afford habitations for nearly 350,000 additional persons.

Since the completion of the various improvements and alterations just alluded to, numerous others have been made in the appearance of the metropolis; and several public buildings and streets now in progress will still further contribute to impart a new aspect of beauty to the principal thoroughfares. One of the most important improvements recently effected in the city, is the formation of a line of street from the new London bridge to the Mansion House, and, by the side of the latter, northward, to the extension of the City-road through Moorfields; and a corresponding change has been wrought in the character of the buildings of the vicinity, which are of stately dimensions and uniform architecture. Within the last few years, several club-houses have been erected, of exceedingly handsome design, of which that styled the Oxford and Cambridge Universities' Club-house is especially worthy of notice, as well as the Reform Club-house, which latter has been much admired for the excellence of its style, and the great convenience of its arrangements. Crosby Hall, the Temple Church, the College of Surgeons, in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, and other structures, have been restored or remodelled. Of new buildings, of recent date, contributing to the adornment of the metropolis, may be named, Goldsmiths' Hall, in the rear of the General Post Office; the London and Westminster Bank, Lothbury; the National Gallery, Charing Cross; the Globe, Sun, Alliance, and other insurance offices; Gresham Hall, Basinghall-street; the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street; several of the railway termini; the edifice just completed at Staple's Inn, as offices for the taxing masters in chancery; and the Nelson Column, at Charing Cross. And of structures in progress, may be mentioned, the Royal Exchange, the New Houses of Parliament, the additions to the British Museum, and the new hall and library of Lincoln's Inn. A new road is in course of formation at Pimlico, which will join the Vauxhall road, and materially widen the vicinity of Buckingham Palace; and among other improvements now being carried into effect, are, the widening of Piccadilly, by taking in a portion of the Green Park; the laying out and embellishment of Trafalgar-square; and the construction of a street leading from Coventry-street, across Leicester-square, to Long Acre; of another street, from Waterloo bridge, across High-street, Bloomsbury, to Tottenham Court-road; and of a street from Farringdon-street towards Islington. The "rookery" which has existed for so many years in Westminster, Tothill-street, York-street, and Castle-lane, will be shortly destroyed; and St. Margaret's church will be pulled down, to improve the view of the magnificent abbey. A minute survey, also, is being made on the Middlesex side of the river, with a view to the contemplated Thames embankment, it being proposed that a line of stone quays, similar to those on the banks of the Seine, in Paris, should be carried from Whitehall to Blackfriars bridge, upon arches, so as not to interfere with the navigation of the river, and the numerous coal-barges approaching the wharfs. Lastly, it may be observed that a new feature has of late years been bestowed upon some parts of the environs, by the formation of cemeteries, laid out with much taste, and ornamented with appropriate buildings; and in the east of the metropolis, a park named the Victoria, has been inclosed. But to particularize all the various public improvements of recent years would far exceed the limits of this article, and it must therefore suffice to say, that their number and consequence may be inferred from the circumstance that no less than 80 new churches have been erected by the Commissioners appointed under act of parliament, and from the Bishop of London's fund, nearly all having districts allotted to them, many of which already contain a vast population. So numerous, indeed, are the improvements constantly being projected and carried into effect, that scarcely a month passes in which there is not brought forward some plan of elegant embellishment, of public or private utility, or of civil or commercial advantage. In size, population, and wealth; in the extent, grandeur, and number of its religious edifices, its public establishments, its charitable institutions, its commercial docks, and its bridges; in the elegance of its squares, and the commodiousness of its habitations, the superiority of the English metropolis over that of every other country is manifest.

ROYAL PALACES AND HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

St. James' Palace is an ancient building, which, though irregular in its parts, and with an appearance far from imposing, is said, from its great extent and the number of fine apartments it contains, to be the best adapted for royal parade of any in Europe. It derives its name from the hospital of St. James, a religious foundation acquired by Henry VIII., who, in 1532, gave lands in Suffolk in exchange for its site, and then erected a manor-house, of which a part, consisting of the presence chamber and the north gateway, is preserved in the present structure. The mansion did not, however, fully become a royal residence till the time of William III., and the period during which it has been inhabited by royalty comprises only the reigns of that monarch, Queen Anne, and the two first Georges; George III. and his successors have held their courts here, but their domestic residence has been elsewhere. Carlton House, the splendid residence of George IV. when Prince of Wales, was demolished some years since for the purpose of effecting the Park improvements. On the site of Buckingham House a new palace has lately been completed as the town residence of the Queen, which consists of a centre and large wings projecting from it at right angles, forming, with the principal entrance, which is a detached marble gateway of great cost, a spacious and magnificent quadrangle. Marlborough House, a noble building near St. James' palace, and the late residence of the King of the Belgians, is now occupied by the Dowager Queen Adelaide. The Lords' and Commons' Houses of Parliament, which were destroyed by a fire that broke out on the evening of the 16th of October, 1834, occupied parts of the old palace of Westminster, and, though possessing a certain degree of splendour, were chiefly venerable for their age and the purposes to which they were appropriated. The House of Lords was a large oblong room, formerly the Court of Requests, and was fitted up for its recent purpose on the union with Ireland, when the fine tapestry of the old House of Lords, representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, was removed thither, and the apartment was otherwise handsomely decorated: at the upper end of the room was the throne, which had been renovated in a style of great magnificence; and a new entrance had a short time previously been added, with a superb staircase and gallery, by Mr. Soane. The old House of Commons was originally the chapel of St. Stephen, out of which it was formed chiefly by raising a floor above the pavement, and adding an inner roof, considerably below the ancient one. In its recent state the house was a large plain apartment, of which the Speaker's chair, with its appendages, formed the chief decoration; around it were galleries, supported by slender iron columns with gilt capitals, into one of which, at the lower end, over the bar of the house, strangers were admitted to hear the debates. Since the destruction of these two interesting edifices, and prior to their re-erection, on a scale of appropriate magnificence, preparations have been made for the temporary accommodation of the Lords and Commons, by fitting up the library of the old House of Lords, which had escaped the effects of the conflagration, for the former, and by roofing anew and otherwise adapting the old House of Lords for the latter. The buildings now in course of erection, after the designs, and under the superintendence, of Charles Barry, Esq., will form an extensive and magnificent range in the later English style, consisting chiefly of a central quadrangle and two quadrangular wings, connected by corridors, and extending southward from the end of Westminster bridge along the west bank of the Thames, from which a considerable portion of the site has been gained by embankment, effecting at the same time an important improvement by contracting the breadth, and deepening the channel, of the river. The outline of the front which faces the river, is relieved by hexagonal projections with enriched buttresses, having in the lower compartment a single window, and on the upper two windows of larger dimensions with canopied niches between them; the space between the lower and upper windows is ornamented with a series of single panels, on which are sculptured in bold relief the armorial bearings of all the sovereigns of England from the Conquest to the present time. The whole is of Bolsover stone; and, when completed in all the details of the design, with its lofty towers and other embellishments, it will undoubtedly constitute the most stately and majestic ornament of the metropolis.

THE PARKS, SQUARES, &c.

St. James' Park, so called from the palace of the same name, contains about 200 acres, of which the central part is laid out in a pleasing manner, varied with water, shrubberies, and intersecting gravel walks, and the sides are adorned with several avenues of stately trees. Its eastern extremity is occupied by the Horse Guards, the Treasury, and other government offices, which have a noble appearance; the ground plot of the entire park is oblong, and nearly two miles in circuit. The Green Park is a triangular piece of ground lying south of the western part of Piccadilly, and adjoining St. James' Park and the gardens of Buckingham House. On its north side is a large basin, with a promenade round it, near which was, till lately, the Ranger's house, embowered in a fine plantation, now thrown open, adding to the beauty of the prospect. Hyde Park, which stretches from the western extremity of the metropolis to Kensington Gardens, and contains about 400 acres, is a spot of great rural beauty, the drives round it forming one of the chief recreations of the fashionable; it is adorned, in the lower part, by a large winding sheet of water, called the Serpentine river. The entrances have been greatly improved within the last few years; and at the Piccadilly opening, a handsome screen of the Ionic order, consisting of three arches, united by an open colonnade, with two side arches, has been erected, facing which is a new and magnificent arched gateway (an imitation of the arch of Severus at Rome), leading into the gardens belonging to Buckingham Palace. Kensington Gardens are beautiful and extensive pleasure-grounds, attached to the palace at Kensington, and were formerly part of Hyde Park; they are open to all respectable persons, and form one of the most delightful promenades of the metropolis during the months of summer. The Regent's Park, newly formed on the site of what was formerly Mary-le-bone fields, and containing about 450 acres, for the magnificence of the buildings by which it is surrounded, and the picturesque style in which it is laid out, indisputably excels the others, and will do so in a still greater degree as the trees with which it is planted approach maturity. The residences of the nobility, though formerly scattered over the whole town, and particularly along the northern bank of the Thames, from the Temple to Whitehall, are now almost exclusively confined to the western portion of it; and such of the higher class as have not detached mansions, reside in spacious structures in finely-formed squares and streets too numerous to describe. Portland Place was, some years since, almost the only street that, in point of width, length, and the uniform grandeur and elegance of its buildings, would have been deemed worthy of especial notice; but the construction of the new line of street extending northwards from the site of Carlton House, under the names of Waterloo-place, the Quadrant, and Regent-street, and communicating with Portland-place by means of Langham-place, forms a new era in our domestic architecture; and for vast length, width, and uniform elegance, this immense range of buildings, as a whole, is not exceeded by any in Europe. Carlton-terrace, recently built on the site of Carlton House, corresponds in beauty of style with the avenue last named; and eastward of the fine street called Pall-Mall an opening has been formed, to obtain a view of the noble portico of St. Martin's church. Beyond this church, on the north side of the Strand, to the site of Exeter Change, lately demolished, eastward, the Strand improvements have been made, which impart to the whole neighbourhood a character of magnificence that it did not in any degree before possess.

THEATRES AND PLACES OF AMUSEMENT.

The Italian Opera House, a magnificent edifice, situated at the lower end of the Haymarket, on the western side, is appropriated exclusively to the performance of Italian operas, and ballets. The original edifice was burnt down in 1790, soon after which it was rebuilt, though not externally completed till 1818, from a design by Mr. Nash. It is of brick cased with stucco, and is surrounded by a colonnade supported on cast-iron pillars of the Doric order; the front is decorated with figures in bas-relief, representing the origin and progress of music, executed in 1821; the boxes, of which there are five tiers, will accommodate about 900 persons, and the pit and gallery about 800 each. Drury-Lane Theatre had its origin in a cock-pit, which was converted into a place of theatrical entertainment, and pulled down and rebuilt, under the name of the Phoenix, in the reign of James I. A patent for dramatic performances having been granted to Killigrew by Charles II., a new theatre was erected on the site of the present structure, and the actors having belonged to the king's household, their successors at the theatre have ever since been styled "His Majesty's Servants." The theatre was burnt in 1671, and rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren, but was displaced, in 1793, by one much larger, from a design by Holland, which, however, was destroyed by fire, in 1809, and the present edifice erected, in 1811, under the superintendence of Mr. B. Wyatt. The portico, supporting a statue of Shakspeare, was added in 1820; and a new colonnade, along the side extending from Brydges-street to Drury-lane, was erected in 1832. The interior was rebuilt in 1822, on a scale of great splendour: the boxes will accommodate 1828 spectators; the pit, 800; the lower gallery, 675; and the upper gallery, 308; making a total of 3611 persons. The building is the property of a number of shareholders. Covent Garden Theatre was established by Sir W. D'Avenant, who received a patent in 1662, under which successive companies acted at the theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, until the erection of the original theatre in Covent Garden, in 1733, the destruction of which, by fire, in 1808, led to the erection of the present magnificent structure, which was opened Sept. 18th, 1809. It is of the Doric order, in imitation of the Temple of Minerva, situated in the Acropolis at Athens, and was built from a design by Mr. Smirke, jun., at an expense of £150,000; it is computed that it will afford accommodation to upwards of 3000 persons.

The Haymarket Theatre was erected originally in 1702, and the present edifice was built from a design by Mr. Nash, and opened in 1821; it is licensed for the performance of regular dramas, and is principally open during the summer. The other minor establishments, most of which are summer theatres, are, the Lyceum, in the Strand, originally opened June 15th, 1816, and, having been lately burnt down, rebuilt from a design by Mr. Beazley, and re-opened in July, 1834; the Adelphi Theatre, also situated in the Strand; the Strand Theatre, opened in the year 1832; the Royal Circus, or Surrey Theatre, in Blackfriars' road, originally used for equestrian performances, destroyed by fire in 1805, and rebuilt in a superior style, since which it has been appropriated to the performance of melo-dramas, ballets, &c.; the Royal Victoria Theatre, formerly called the Royal Cobourg Theatre, in the Waterloo-road, first opened in 1818; Sadler's Wells, in St. John's-street-road, erected in 1765, so styled from some wells anciently situated there, and from the name of a person who, in 1643, opened a place of entertainment in that neighbourhood; Astley's, or the Royal Amphitheatre, pre-eminently distinguished for equestrian exhibitions, opened about 1767, as a riding-school, and converted into a regular theatre in 1780, burnt down in 1794, again in 1803, and a third time on the 8th of June, 1841, when Mr. Ducrow's loss was estimated at £10,000; the Olympic Theatre, in Wych-street, built in 1806; the Queen's Theatre, in Tottenham-street, formerly called the Regency Theatre; the St. James's Theatre; the City of London Theatre, in Norton-Falgate; the Pavilion, in Whitechapel; and other establishments of inferior note. Among the higher class of amusement are the nobility's balls, held at Willis' rooms, King-street, St. James', commonly called Almack's, from the name of their former proprietor; where also, and at Hanover-square rooms and other places, concerts are given. Oratorios are likewise performed at certain periods, the present age being distinguished, above all others in England, for the patronage bestowed upon the art of music; and there are various other miscellaneous public performances; but they are so multifarious and changeable, as to preclude a particular description.

COMMERCE, &c.

The commerce of London has three principal branches. The traffic of the port, with the foreign trade and domestic wholesale business; the manufactures; and the retail trade. In 1268, the half-year's customs for foreign merchandise in the city was only £75. 6. 10.: in 1331, they amounted to £8000. In 1354, the duty on goods imported was only £580, and on exports, £81,624. In 1641, just before the commencement of the civil war, the customs yielded £500,000 per annum, the effect of a long series of peaceful days; and from the year 1671 to 1688 they were, on an average, £555,752. In 1709, they had increased to £2,319,320; and in the year ending April, 1799, they amounted to £3,711,126. The gross sum now annually collected is about eleven millions. The astonishing increase in the extent of commercial intercourse of late years may be inferred from the fact that the average number of British ships, and vessels of various kinds, in the Thames and docks, is estimated at 13,444, of which the barges and other small craft, employed in shipping and unloading, are not fewer than between 3000 and 4000: there are 2888 barges and other craft engaged in the inland trade; besides which, there are vast numbers of steam-boats and wherries for passengers. About 8000 watermen are employed in navigating the wherries and craft, 4000 labourers in lading and unloading ships, and several thousand revenue officers are constantly doing duty on the river. The number of vessels which entered the port in the year ended January 5th, 1843, was 4767 British, and 1640 foreign; the former of an aggregate tonnage of 1,002,453, and the latter, of 281,468. The number of vessels of above 50 tons, now registered at the port, is 2405, and their aggregate burthen 598,554 tons. The scene of this great traffic occupies a space more than four miles in length, reaching from London bridge to Deptford, and from 400 to 500 yards in average breadth, which may be described as consisting of four divisions, three of them called the Upper, Middle, and Lower pools, and the fourth comprising the space between Limehouse and Deptford. It is, besides, calculated that above 40,000 waggons and other carriages, taking into account their repeated journeys, arrive and depart, laden in both instances with articles of domestic, colonial, or foreign merchandise; occasioning a transit, including cattle and provisions sent for the consumption of the inhabitants, of more than £50,000,000 worth of goods to and from the inland markets, making altogether a sum of £120,000,000 worth of property annually moving to and from the metropolis.

London has long been celebrated for its MANUFACTURES, as well as its commerce. So early as the reign of Henry I., the English goldsmiths had become so eminent for working the precious metals, as to be frequently employed by foreign princes; and the perfection of various other manufactures at this period appears both from history and antique remains. The manufacturers were, in that reign, so numerous as to form fraternities, or companies, some of which have ceased to exist, some have declined, as the Cappers, Bowyers, Fletchers, &c., and others still flourish, and are much increased in the number of their members, in the extent of their property and patronage, and in general importance. In 1556, a manufactory for the finer sorts of glass was established in Crutched Friars; and flint-glass, not exceeded by that of Venice, was made at the same time at the Savoy. About five years after, the manufacture of knit-stockings was introduced, through the ingenuity of William Rider, an apprentice on London bridge, who, happening to see a pair from Mantua, at the house of an Italian, made another pair exactly similar to them, which he presented to William, Earl of Pembroke. The manufacture of knives was shortly after begun by Thomas Matthews, of Fleet bridge, and has since eclipsed that source of employment at Sheffield, where it was much earlier established. Silk-wove stockings were first made from the invention of Lee, a student at Oxford, in the time of Elizabeth, which reign forms so splendid an era in the commercial and trading history of the metropolis. Coaches were introduced in 1564, and in less than twenty years they became an extensive article of manufacture; in the following year the manufacture of pins was begun, and, soon after, that of needles. The making of "earthen furnaces, earthen fire-pots, and earthen ovens, transportable," began about the 16th year of Elizabeth, an Englishman of the name of Dyer having brought the art from Spain; and in 1579, the same individual being sent to Persia, at the expense of the city of London, brought home the art of dyeing and weaving carpets. In 1577, pocket-watches were imported from Nuremberg, in Germany, and the making of them was almost immediately commenced. In the reign of Charles I., saltpetre was made in such quantities as not only to supply the whole of England, but the greater part of the continent. The manufacture of silk, as well as of various articles of plate, had also become extensive. The printing of calicoes commenced in 1676, and, about the same time, weaving-looms were brought from Holland. The other articles of manufacture, introduced or practised in the metropolis about the same time, are too numerous to particularize.

The silk manufacture, which, under its different modifications, now affords employment to so many thousands, was first established at Spitalfields by the expelled French Protestants, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685. Since that period the productions of London have greatly increased, both in extent and value, in articles of elegance and utility, such as cutlery, jewellery, gold and silver ornaments, japan ware, cut glass, cabinet work, &c., as well as commodities requiring a great mart for their consumption, export or sale, as porter, English wines, vinegar, refined sugar, soap, &c. In short, the manufactures of London, as well as its commerce, are vast and flourishing, many of the goods made here surpassing in quality those of any other part of the country; and the coach-builders and harness-makers, who are very numerous, far excel those of any other city in the world. For the more scientific manufactures, also, such as those of machinery, optical and mathematical instruments, &c., London has always been celebrated. Ship-building is carried on to a great extent; and during the late war many frigates were built here for the government by private individuals.

COMMERCIAL DOCKS, CANALS, AND RAILWAYS.

Intimately connected with the commerce of the metropolis is the establishment of inclosed docks, which were rendered necessary from the former insecurity of property on the river, and the daring plunder committed on it, and have yielded important service to the revenue and trade of the country. The West India Docks, which were the first constructed, are situated on what may be called the isthmus of that peninsular part of the environs of London named the Isle of Dogs, and communicate with the Thames at Limehouse on the west, and at Blackwall on the east. They were commenced in June, 1800, and finished in August, 1802, and occupy, with the ground attached to them, an area of 204 acres. The import dock is 2600 feet long, 510 broad, and 29 feet deep, and the export dock is of the same dimensions, except in breadth; both are inclosed by walls five feet thick, and surrounded by a series of very lofty and extensive warehouses. They are stated to have cost £12,000,000: the proprietors are an incorporated body, under the title of the West India Dock Company. In the vicinity is a school, established by the company, for instructing apprentices in the West India navigation, whilst the vessels are in dock. Parallel with the docks is a canal, which cost between £300,000 and £400,000, to enable merchant vessels of any burthen to avoid the circuitous navigation round the Isle of Dogs. The East India Docks, commenced in 1804, and completed in 1806, are lower down the river, but at no great distance from the former, and, like them, consist of an import and an export dock, the former about 1400 feet long, and 560 wide, and the latter 780 feet long, and 520 wide; the depth of each is 30 feet, and the space which they occupy is 28 acres. A basin was added to the export dock in 1817. The London Dock, also extensive, covers 20 acres of ground, between Ratcliffe-highway and the Thames, and belongs to a company whose capital is £12,000,000. It is capable of containing 200 sail of merchantmen, and may be appropriated to any branch of commerce; it was opened February 1st, 1805, and is surrounded, like the former, with immense warehouses, beneath which are capacious cellars. A branch dock was opened in 1828. St. Katherine's Docks were commenced in 1825, and completed in 1829, by the merchants, shipowners, and traders of London, for securing additional accommodation to the great increase of shipping in the port, and a reduction in the rates and charges. They receive annually about 1400 merchant vessels, besides craft for loading and discharging; and afford a better mode of ingress and egress than any other docks in the kingdom, as vessels drawing 20 feet of water may be locked from two to three hours after high water, and small vessels and lighters at all periods of the tide; the total outlay attending their construction (including the purchase of considerable property, capable of returning its price on re-sale) amounted to £1,827,113. The warehousing, bonding, and quay-room, are nearly equal to the London Dock; and from an improved construction of the warehouses, which are within a few feet of the docks and basin, a great saving is effected in the expense of labour. The Bermondsey Collier Dock is calculated to relieve the river from an obstruction to navigation by the number of small craft, which, in course of time, must otherwise have prevented ships with general cargoes approaching convenient places of discharge near the Custom House, and which had afforded serious matter of complaint for many years.

Notwithstanding the numerous CANALS which intersect the interior of the kingdom, the inland navigation to the metropolis is confined; owing, it is supposed, in a great measure, to the policy which prohibits the carriage of coal by that conveyance. The Paddington canal, which was the first, was opened July 10th, 1800, and, leading from Paddington, unites with the Grand Junction canal. From the basin at Paddington it extends nearly 100 miles, to the Oxford canal at Brans-ton, in Northamptonshire, by which it is connected with the Coventry and Birmingham canal, the Grand Trunk canal, &c.; thus forming a regular line of water conveyance from London into Lancashire and Yorkshire. The Regent's canal, opened August 1st, 1820, connects the Paddington Grand Junction, and other canals west of London, with the Thames on the east or mercantile side of the city, and, skirting the northern suburbs, has occasioned a vast influx of trade, with its accompanying warehouses, wharfs, &c., at Paddington, Battle-Bridge, the City-road, and other places. Its length is nine miles, within which space are comprised twelve locks and thirty-seven bridges; the canal cost upwards of half a million of money, and was seven years in construction, under the superintendence of Mr. Nash. On the south side of the river is the Grand Surrey canal, which passes through the south-eastern suburbs, from Camberwell to the Thames at the lower extremity of Rotherhithe. The RAILWAYS which have their termini on the northern side of the Thames, are, the Birmingham, which opens a speedy communication with the midland and northern counties, and was completed September 17th, 1838; the Blackwall, finished July 4th, 1840; the Great Western leading to Bath and Bristol, and also affording convenient access to South Wales and the south-western counties of England, and which was opened in August, 1840; the Eastern-Counties', intended to run through Essex and Suffolk, but which has only been partially opened; and the Northern and Eastern line to Cambridge, which also is as yet incomplete. The lines that quit London on the southern side of the river are, the Greenwich, a short line, opened December 26th, 1838; the Croydon, which, leading southward to that town, was opened June 1st, 1839, and was continued to the coast of Sussex, at Brighton, September 21st, 1841, and, more lately, to the coast of Kent, at Dover; and the South Western, running through Surrey and Hants to Southampton, and which opens a communication with the sea in that direction, and was finished May 11th, 1840.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS CONNECTED WITH COMMERCE.

The late Royal Exchange, situated on the north side of Cornhill, was built in the reign of Charles II., from the design of an architect named Jerman, in lieu of the original Exchange, founded in 1566, by Sir Thomas Gresham, an eminent merchant, nearly on the spot where the ancient Tun prison stood, and at first named Britain's Bourse, which was destroyed by the great fire in 1666. The entire building, erected at an expense of £80,000, occupied a quadrangular space, 203 feet long and 171 broad; the south and north fronts had lofty central gateways, richly decorated with sculpture, and stately piazzas. The galleries over the four sides of the building, originally divided into 200 shops, were occupied by the Royal Exchange Assurance and other offices, and by Lloyd's Coffee-house, celebrated as a place of meeting for underwriters and insurance brokers. Above the piazza which surrounded the quadrangular area in the centre of the building, was an ornamented entablature, over which were twenty-four niches, nineteen of them occupied by statues of the English sovereigns, from Edward I. down to George III., excepting Edward II., Richard II., Henry IV., and Richard III. This noble building was consumed by a fire which broke out in the night of the 10th of January, 1838; and a new one has just been completed on the same spot, for which a wider space has been made, by taking down many adjoining houses. The foundation-stone of the new Exchange was laid by His Royal Highness Prince Albert, Jan. 17th, 1842; the building, which is fire-proof throughout, was contracted for at the sum of £115,900, to be finished by June 25th, 1844, under a penalty of £20 for every day's delay until its completion. Its form is that of an irregular quadrangle, 293 feet in length, of which the eastern and western fronts only are parallel, the former 175, and the latter 90, feet in width. The west front is embellished with a portico of Corinthian columns, 41 feet in height, supporting a triangular pediment, enriched with entablature and cornice. The north and south fronts are relieved with series of pilasters of the same order, supporting an entablature and cornice surmounted by a balustrade; and in the centre of these fronts are three lofty arched portals leading to the inner area, and surmounted by an attic rising above the balustrade. The east front, of similar design, is distinguished by a lofty campanile turret, rising above the central compartment to the height of 170 feet. The area of the Exchange, including the surrounding piazza, is 170 feet in length, and 113 in width, and the building above the piazza is appropriately decorated.

The Bank of England was commenced in 1732, when the central part of the present building was erected on the site of the house and garden of Sir John Houblon, the first governor: the east wing was completed about the year 1786; and the north front, and the side towards Prince's-street, were added in 1825, when considerable alterations and improvements were made throughout the whole of the interior. The buildings, which are chiefly of stone, are included in an area of irregular quadrangular form, the exterior wall of which measures 365 feet in front, 440 feet on the western side, 410 feet on the northern side, and 245 feet on the eastern side; and the area comprises, together with the various buildings and offices, eight open courts, with apartments stored with bullion, coin, &c., under ground. Prior to the erection of the present huge edifice, the business of this great national corporation was transacted at Grocers' Hall, in the Poultry. The Stock Exchange, situated in Capel-court, opposite the eastern entrance to the Bank, was completed in 1804; and an additional building for the transfer of foreign stock was subsequently erected. No persons can transact business but such as are ballotted for annually by a committee; the number of Jew brokers is limited to twelve, who, before they are entitled to admission, must purchase a ticket of the lord mayor, which, being sold to the highest bidder, generally costs from £1200 to £1500, and is a perquisite of the chief magistrate. The South Sea House is a substantial and handsome building of brick, ornamented with Portland stone, with a noble gateway entrance leading into a court having a piazza: the company was incorporated in 1711, for an exclusive trade to the South Seas. The East India House, which ranks amongst the most magnificent public structures in the city, may, in consequence of the important additions of late years made to the old building erected in 1726, be considered almost a new edifice. It contains numerous apartments and offices, of the former of which several are of large dimensions and stately architecture, especially the grand court-room, the new sale-room, the old sale-room, the rooms for the committee of correspondence, the library, and the museum, all embellished with emblematical designs and paintings, statues, portraits, &c.; but in consequence of the company's charter having recently expired without a renewal, a great reduction has taken place in the establishment, and comparatively little business is now transacted. The Custom House, or place where the king's duties are collected on goods imported to, and exported from, London, stands on the north bank of the river, at a small distance to the westward of the Tower, having been removed to its present situation after the destruction of the former edifice by fire in 1814: it was begun in 1815, and occupies a great extent of ground, reaching from Billingsgate eastward, nearly to the site of the former Custom House, being 489 feet long by 107 feet wide, and erected at an expense of £167,050. It contains numerous apartments and offices appropriated to the vast extent of business carried on, of which the principal is the Long Room, 190 feet in length, 66 feet in breadth, and about 55 feet in height; and the vaults and store-cellars beneath the building are very extensive. Attached to the establishment are about 650 clerks and officers, besides 1000 tide-waiters and servants.

The Corn Exchange, instituted as a mart for the disposal of all kinds of grain through the medium of corn-factors, until lately consisted only of a handsome brick building, on the east side of Mark-lane; but the vast increase of business requiring additional space, a new and commodious edifice of stone was erected in 1828, adjoining the former. The market is held on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, the first being the principal day. The Coal Exchange, in Thames-street, comprises a spacious rotunda, with convenient divisions for the business of the coal-merchants and dealers. The Excise Office, in Broad-street, was erected in 1763, to which the business of the excise, established in 1643, and at first carried on in the Old Jewry, was transferred; the town business of the excise is here transacted by nine commissioners, having under them numerous clerks and officers. The Commercial Hall, in Mincing-lane, built by subscription in 1811, for the sale of the various kinds of colonial produce, contains five public sale-rooms, a large coffee-room, several show-rooms, and numerous counting-houses let to merchants. The Auction Mart, in Bartholomew-lane, opened in 1810, principally for the sale of estates by public auction, is built of Portland stone, and, though not very large, exhibits much lightness, and gracefulness of design. The Trinity House, Tower Hill, was completed in 1795, previously to which the company occupied a house in Water-lane, near the Custom House. The corporation received a charter from Henry VIII., in 1516, when the English navy began to assume an ascendancy, and was invested with extensive powers, which it still exercises in full vigour, with a view to foster and protect the shipping, both military and commercial. The members examine those children in Christ's Hospital intended for the sea service, also the masters of king's ships, appoint pilots for the Thames, and settle the rate of pilotage, erect lighthouses and landmarks, grant licenses to poor seamen not free of the city to navigate on the Thames; besides transacting a variety of other business connected with that river, and maritime affairs generally. The New Post Office was completed in 1829, from the plans of Sir Robert Smirke, under an act passed in 1815, a great portion of the interval having been consumed in the purchase and removal of the houses which were crowded upon its site. It is an isolated structure, of massive dimensions and handsome design, composed externally of Portland stone, and is about 389 feet long, 130 broad, and 64 high, standing at the junction of the street called St. Martin's-le-Grand with Newgate-street, a more central and convenient situation than that which the old building occupied in Lombard-street. The façade towards St. Martin's-le-Grand exhibits the principal architectural display, which is chiefly comprised in three porticoes of the Ionic order, one at each end consisting of four columns, and one in the centre of six, the latter being surmounted by a pediment. Some idea of the vast extent of the business carried on in this important establishment may be gained from the facts that the number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom amounted, in one week of the year 1839, to 1,585,973; in one week of the year 1842, to 4,202,546; and in one of the year 1843, to 4,212,656. The number of letters which passed through the general post of London alone, during the first four weeks of the year 1843, was 5,716,898; and the number that passed through the London district post, exclusively of general letters, in the same period, was 1,971,008. The net revenue of the establishment of the United Kingdom amounted, in 1839, to £1,614,353; in 1841, to £393,166; and in 1843, to £478,479. Money-orders are issued to the amount of above eight millions of pounds annually, for England and Wales alone.

MARKETS.

The markets held in the different parts of the metropolis amount to 16 flesh markets, and 25 for corn, hay, vegetables, &c. Smithfield has of late years been considerably enlarged and improved, and is the grand mart for the sale of live stock, which takes place on Mondays and Fridays, on which latter day is also one for horses: upwards of 100,000 bullocks and 800,000 sheep are, on an average, annually sold. Covent Garden market is celebrated for its early and abundant supply of fruit, vegetables, herbs, and flowers: the incommodious and mean buildings which crowded the large area of the market, have all been taken down, and a new and handsome market-place completed at the cost of the Duke of Bedford, who is the proprietor. The old Fleet Market has been removed by the corporation of the city, and a new and spacious market-place constructed, which was opened in 1829, at an expense of £80,000, exclusively of £200,000 laid out in the purchase of houses previously occupying the site: it is now called Farringdon Market. Hungerford Market has also been rebuilt on an enlarged and exceedingly commodious plan, the expense of which was defrayed by subscriptions on shares. London has at present only one fair, well known by the name of Bartholomew Fair, which is held in Smithfield, and, though anciently famous for the sale of cloth and other commodities, is now resorted to merely for amusement: it was granted by Henry II. to the prior and convent of St. Bartholomew, and its opening is proclaimed by the lord mayor on the 3rd of September, and continues three days. The corporation having recently refused to let standings for shows, it has much declined.

MUNICIPALITY AND LEGAL JURISDICTION.

Corporation Seal.

Obverse.

Reverse.

The CITY of London, properly so called, consists of that part anciently within the walls, together with the Liberties, which immediately surround them; the superficial extent does not exceed 800 acres. Its boundaries are known by the Bars, which formerly consisted of posts and chains, but are now marked by lofty stone obelisks, bearing the city arms, which may be seen eastward in Whitechapel, the Minories, and Bishopsgate-street; northward, in Goswell-street, at the end of Fan-street, and in St. John's-street; and westward, at Middle-row, Holborn. At the western end of Fleet-street the boundary is the stone gateway called Temple Bar.

It is divided into 25 WARDS, exclusive of Bridge ward Without, which comprehends the liberties of the borough of Southwark, granted to the city in 1550, and constituted a distinct ward. Their names are as follow:—Aldersgate, Within and Without, which has eight precincts, with an alderman, two deputies, and eight common-councilmen; Aldgate, having seven precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and six common-councilmen, including the deputy; Bassishaw, having two precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and four common-councilmen; Billingsgate, having twelve precincts, with an alderman and ten common-councilmen; Bishopsgate, Within and Without, having nine precincts, with an alderman, two deputies, and six common-councilmen; Bread-street, having twelve precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and twelve common-councilmen; Bridge Within, so named from its contiguity to London-bridge

(which, at the time it had houses upon it, formed three of its precincts), divided into four precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and nine common-councilmen, including the deputy; Broad-street, having ten precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and nine common-councilmen; Candlewick, having seven precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and seven common-councilmen; Castle-Barnard (comprehending the soke, or liberty, anciently attached to a castle originally built by William Baynard, one of the followers of William the Norman, on the site of the present Carron wharf, the possessors of which, by virtue of their castellanship, were hereditary standard-bearers to the city), having ten precincts, with an alderman and ten common-councilmen; Cheap, having nine precincts, with an alderman and twelve common-councilmen; Coleman-street, having six precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and six common-councilmen; Cordwainers', having eight precincts, with an alderman and nine common-councilmen; Cornhill, having four precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and six common-councilmen, including the deputy; Cripplegate Within and Without, having thirteen precincts, with an alderman and sixteen common-councilmen; Dowgate, having eight precincts, with an alderman and eight common-councilmen; Farringdon Within, having seven precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and eight common-councilmen; Farringdon Without (the ward of Farringdon having been divided in the 17th of Richard II.), having sixteen precincts, with an alderman, three deputies, and sixteen common-councilmen; Langbourn, having twelve precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and ten common-councilmen; Lime-street, having four precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and four common-councilmen, including the deputy; Portsoken, having five precincts, with an alderman, a deputy, and five common-councilmen, including the deputy; Queen-hythe (which takes its name from the harbour of Queen-hythe, formerly a place for shipping and landing goods, and so called because the customs payable there were assigned by King John to his queen Eleanor and her successors for their private use: the ground for a considerable space around the harbour formed a soke, governed by the queen's bailiffs; and in the time of Henry III., having come into the possession of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, it was conveyed by him, for an annuity, to the corporation), having six precincts, with an alderman and six common-councilmen; Tower-street, having twelve precincts, with an alderman and twelve common-councilmen; Vintry (comprising a space on the north bank of the Thames, where the merchants of Bordeaux formerly bonded and sold their wines, and near which anciently stood a spacious and stately edifice, called the Vintry, from its being appropriated to the stowage of wine), having nine precincts, with an alderman and nine common-councilmen; and Walbrook (so called from the brook which intersected the city wall at Dowgate, and flowed into the Thames), having seven precincts, with an alderman and eight common-councilmen. In addition to the representatives above named, all the wards have inferior officers. Bridge ward Without, although so long annexed to London, was never entirely incorporated with it, and is wholly unrepresented in the common council; its civil government is administered by a steward and a bailiff appointed by the court of the lord mayor and aldermen. The Surrey magistrates, notwithstanding the royal grants to the city, retain the power of appointing constables and licensing victuallers, and exercise other magisterial authority within the limits of the ward. Whenever a vacancy occurs in the office of alderman of it, it is customary for the lord mayor and aldermen to appoint to it the senior alderman, who then has the title of "Father of the City," this nominal office being regarded as an honourable sinecure, which relieves him from the fatigues of business. That portion of the borough of Southwark situated without the city jurisdiction, or borough liberty, is called the Clink Liberty, and is under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester, who appoints a steward and bailiff for its government.

The entire civil government of London is vested, by successive charters of the English sovereigns, in its own corporation, or body of citizens, confirmed for the last time by a charter passed in the 23rd of George II. As then settled, the corporation consists of the lord mayor, two sheriffs for London and Middlesex conjointly, 26 aldermen, the common-councilmen of the several wards, and the livery, assisted by a recorder, chamberlain, common-serjeant, comptroller, city remembrancer, town-clerk, and various other officers.

The Lord Mayor is elected on Sept. 29th: the livery in guildhall, or common assembly, choose two aldermen by show of hands, who are presented to the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen, by whom one of the aldermen so chosen, usually the senior, is declared mayor elect; and on the 9th of November following he enters on his office. He is supreme magistrate of the city, and has, since the reign of Edward III., borne the title of "The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor." It is necessary that the nominee should be free of one of the great city companies, should have served the office of sheriff, and be alderman at the time of election. The prerogatives are of great extent and importance: as the immediate representative of the Sovereign, the mayor takes precedence of every other subject within the limits of the city, and, in the event of the monarch's decease, becomes the first officer in the realm, takes his seat at the privy council board, and signs before all other subjects in the kingdom. According to a custom which has prevailed nearly 300 years, he sits every morning at the mansion-house, to hear and determine causes of offence within the jurisdiction of the city. He is a perpetual coroner and escheator for London, the Liberties, and Southwark; chief justice in all commissions for trial of felony and gaol delivery; and judge of all courts of wardmote for the election of aldermen. In other respects, he ordinarily has authority all over the city, and part of the suburbs; as conservator of the Thames, his jurisdiction extends eastward on the river as far as Yardale, or Yantlet, and the mouth of the river Medway; and westward to Colne ditch, above Staines bridge; and he is perpetual commissioner in all affairs relating to the river Lea. To the lord mayor also belongs the ancient court of Hustings, which preserves the laws, rights, franchises, and customs of the city. He acts as chief butler at all coronations, receiving a golden cup and ewer for his fee; and is first commissioner of the lieutenancy.

The Aldermen are chosen for life, by the free householders of every ward, that of Bridge Without excepted, to which the aldermen themselves elect. Those aldermen who have filled the civic chair are justices of the quorum; and all the other aldermen are justices of the peace within the city. They are subordinate governors of their respective wards, under the jurisdiction of the mayor, and they exercise an extensive power within their own districts. They hold courts of wardmote, for the election of common-councilmen and other officers, the regulation of the business of the ward, the removal of obstructions, &c., and are officially addressed by the title of "Your Worship." The Common-councilmen, whose office is annual, and whose number, which formerly varied, is fixed at 236, are chosen by the inhabitant householders being freemen, in the same manner as the aldermen, except that the lord mayor presides at the election of an alderman, and the alderman at that of a common-councilman. The election for each ward takes place on St. Thomas's-day.

The representatives of the wards, with the lord mayor and aldermen, constitute what is called the court of Common Council, or "Three City Estates," the powers of which are extensive. This court has the entire disposal of the funds of the corporation, makes such by-laws as are necessary for the regulation of its concerns, and possesses the right of nomination to several of the subordinate city offices; and it has the style of "Honourable." The council cannot assemble without a summons from the lord mayor, and then for one sitting only; but it is his duty to call a meeting whenever it is demanded by requisition, and the law compels him to assemble the court a certain number of times during his mayoralty. The council annually elect six aldermen and twelve councilmen, as a committee for letting the city lands, and also chooses another committee of four aldermen and eight councilmen, for transacting the affairs of Gresham College; besides the appointment of which and several other committees, the court, by virtue of a royal grant, annually chooses a governor, deputy, and assistants, for the management of the city lands in Ireland. In short, the civil administration, in all its branches, within the jurisdiction of the corporation (which in all cases embraces the city, and part of the borough of Southwark, and in some extends beyond), is exercised by the corporation, or its officers.

The Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who are, strictly speaking, officers of the queen, are chosen by such citizens as are of the livery, out of their own number, in the guildhall, upon Midsummer-day, but are not sworn into office until Michaelmas-day, when each sheriff enters into a bond of £1000 to the corporation to serve it faithfully; after which, they proceed in state to Westminster, to be accepted on behalf of the sovereign, by the barons of the exchequer. The mode of nominating the sheriff is for the lord mayor to drink in succession to fourteen respectable citizens, two of whom are elected, but he cannot properly nominate a commoner as sheriff, if there be an alderman who has not served that office, though it is frequently done. The jurisdiction of the two sheriffs is, to a considerable extent, perfectly separate; but if either die, the other cannot act until a new one be chosen; for there must be two sheriffs for London, which, by charter, is both a city and a county, though they make but one jointly for the county of Middlesex. By grant of Edward IV., in 1473, the sheriffs are appointed to have sixteen serjeants, and every serjeant his yeoman; also a secondary, six clerks, a clerk of the papers, four under-clerks, and two under-sheriffs. Of the officers associated with the corporation in the government of the city, the principal is the Recorder, who is appointed by the lord mayor and aldermen for life, with a salary of £2500 per annum, and usually acts as judge at the Old Bailey and other courts, and takes precedence in councils and courts before all aldermen who have not filled the office of mayor. The Chamberlain, Common-Serjeant, and Town Clerk, are officers ranking next to the recorder, and have respectively duties to perform of great importance, as have also the City Comptroller and City Remembrancer. There are various other inferior city officers.

Common Halls, which are assemblies of the livery only called on extraordinary occasions, are convenable on requisition of several of its members to the lord mayor, who presides. The Livery, about 12,000 in number, are composed of the respective liverymen of the city companies, of which there are 91. The first twelve on the list are called the Chief or Twelve Great Companies, viz., Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant-Tailors, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Clothworkers, and are sometimes styled "The Honourable." The less important have the title of "Worshipful." Nearly 50 of the companies have halls, some of which are remarkable as buildings, and others for their curiosities and paintings; most of them have "clerks," or solicitors, with offices on the premises, who have the custody of the Company's records, and transact its legal business. Several of these Companies attend the mayor on his inauguration, in their livery gowns, with banners, streamers, music, &c., and on the water, conveyed in elegant state barges, concluding the ceremonies of the procession with sumptuous dinners at their respective halls. The freedom of the city is obtained by apprenticeship to a freeman; by redemption, fine, or ransom; and by gift of the corporation: to be a liveryman, however, it is necessary to be free of one of the incorporated companies. The city returns four members to parliament, who are elected by the liverymen, and, under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, by the £10 householders; the number of electors is 20,030, and the sheriffs are the returning officers.

The Guildhall, or common hall of the corporation, where their courts, meetings, and festivals are held, is situated at the upper end of King-street, Cheapside, and comprises numerous buildings and apartments. It was originally erected by subscription, in 1411 (prior to which period the corporation assembled in a small structure in Aldermanbury), but having been greatly damaged by the fire in 1666, the present pile was formed from such parts as remained, excepting the new front facing King-street, which with several additions and repairs, was completed in 1789. The magnitude and grandeur of the hall may be estimated from the fact that it is capable of holding 6000 or 7000 persons, and actually accommodated that number at the great feast given to the allied sovereigns in 1814. Of the apartments in the rear, appropriated to the use of the corporation, the principal is the council-chamber, a large room, in which the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council, hold their courts, or city parliaments. Over the entrance in the front of the hall, a library of works relative to the history of London and the counties immediately adjoining, has been recently formed, and is already of considerable extent. The courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Commissioners of Bankrupts and Review, occupy the site of the ancient guildhall, chapel, and Blackwell hall; and near the same spot are the Court of Requests, the Irish Chamber, and other offices of the corporation, forming a mass of convenient, though not very elegant, buildings.

The Mansion House was finished in 1753, at an expense of £42,638, as a residence for the chief magistrate, who before had no suitable dwelling in which to exercise the duties, and maintain the state and dignity, of his office. It stands on the site of the Stocks' market, at the western end of Lombard-street, in the most central part of the city, and is a spacious and stately edifice, constructed entirely of Portland stone, but of rather ponderous aspect. In front is a fine portico, composed of six large fluted Corinthian columns, rising from a massive rustic basement, and surmounted by a pediment, the tympanum of which exhibits a good piece of sculpture by Taylor, emblematic of the dignity and opulence of the city of London, and the various virtues by which they have been established and maintained. The body of the building presents two tiers of lofty windows, and over these, and above the portico, is an attic story surmounted by a balustrade; the cornices are rich and deep, and supported by Corinthian pilasters. These parts, in themselves elegant and complete, have been universally allowed to be deformed by a supplementary piece of building raised on the top contrary to the architect's wish, to give a loftier ceiling to a ball-room. The interior is arranged with taste and judgment, possessing, amongst other state apartments, a magnificent banquet-room, called "The Egyptian Hall," 90 feet long (the whole width of the mansion), and 60 feet broad, with a lofty and richly-ornamented concave roof; a ball-room, with a drawing-room; and a state chamber, containing a magnificent state bed.

COURTS OF LAW, &c.

The Lord Mayor's Court is held in the Queen's Bench, Guildhall, by the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, for actions of debt and trespass, for appeals from inferior courts, and for foreign attachments; giving decision in all cases whatsoever, in fourteen days, at an expense not exceeding 30s. The Court of Hustings is the ancient and supreme court of the city, for pleas of land and common pleas. The sheriffs hold courts of record, every Wednesday and Friday, for actions entered at Giltspur-street Compter; and on Thursday and Saturday for actions entered at the Poultry Compter, which are for debts, trespasses, accounts, covenant-breaking, attachments, and sequestrations to any amount. The sheriffs, or their deputies, may sit with the judges of these courts upon trials if they please. The Court of Requests and of Conscience, at which commissioners preside, formerly took cognizance of no cause above 40s., but now extends to all debts under £5; the number of suits determined annually is about 5000, and the amount of debts recovered, £8000. The Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen appoints monthly such aldermen and commoners for commissioners as they think fit; and these, or any three of them, compose a court, held on Wednesday and Saturday, from 12 till 2 o'clock. The other city courts are, the Chamberlain's Courts, held every day, to determine differences between masters and apprentices, and to admit such persons as are duly qualified to the freedom of the city; the Court of Orphans, held before the mayor and aldermen, as guardians of the children of deceased freemen under twenty-one years of age; the Pie-Poudre Court, held during the continuance of Bartholomew fair; a Court of Conservancy, held by the mayor and aldermen four times a year, as before stated; a Court of Petty-Sessions, for small offences, held daily at the Mansion House in the forenoon, by the mayor and one alderman, and daily at Guildhall, by two aldermen in rotation; the Coroner's Court, to inquire into the causes of sudden death; and the Court of the Tower, held within the verge of the city, by a steward, appointed by the Constable of the Tower, and by whom are tried actions of debt, trespass, and covenants.

The exercise of its own military government is one of the peculiar privileges possessed by the city from the earliest times; its forces formerly consisted of what were termed the trained bands, but now of two regiments of militia, raised according to an act of parliament passed in 1794, by ballot, and consisting of 2200 men. The officers are appointed by the commissioners of the queen's lieutenancy for the city of London, of whom the lord mayor is the principal; and one regiment may in certain cases be placed by the queen under any of her general officers, and marched to any place not exceeding twelve miles from the capital, or to the nearest encampment; the other being at all such times to remain in the city.

By an act of the 4th and 5th of William IV., cap. 36, the city of London and the county of Middlesex, and certain adjacent parts of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, were formed into a district to be comprehended within the jurisdiction of a new court of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery, called the Central Criminal Court, to be held at the sessions-house in the Old Bailey, twelve times in the year at least, or oftener if necessary. The justices and judges of the court have power exclusively to try persons accused of various crimes specified in the act, of which the justices of the peace for the cities of London and Westminster, the liberty of the Tower, the borough of Southwark, and the above-named counties, are restrained from taking cognizance; they have also the power to try for offences committed on the high seas. The justices of the peace for the above-named divisions are still allowed to hold their respective general quarter-sessions; and by an especial clause the rights and privileges of the city of London are reserved.

The government of WESTMINSTER, until the Reformation, was arbitrary, under the abbots and monks; then under a bishop, and dean and chapter; and subsequently, by an act passed in the 27th of Elizabeth, the civil controul was placed in the hands of the laity, the dean being at the same time empowered to nominate the chief officers. The principal magistrates are, a high steward, usually a nobleman, the office being generally held for life; and a high bailiff, chosen by the steward, also for life, and who has the chief management of parliamentary elections for Westminster, as well as authority over all the other bailiffs, who summons juries, and in the courts leet sits next to the deputy steward. To him all fines and forfeitures belong, which renders the situation very lucrative, and occasions a considerable sum to be given for it. Besides these, there are sixteen burgesses and their assistants, whose functions in all respects resemble those of the aldermen's deputies of the city of London, each having a ward under his jurisdiction; and from these are elected two head burgesses, one for the city, and the other for the liberties, who in the court leet rank next to the high bailiff. There is also a high constable, who is chosen by the court leet, and to whom all the other constables are subordinate. The four principal courts for the city and liberties of Westminster are, the Court of the Duchy of Lancaster, held in Somerset-place; the Court of Quarter-Sessions of the peace, held by the justices for the city and liberties, four times a year, at the guildhall, Westminster; St. Martin's-le-Grand Court; and the Westminster Court, or court leet. The three first are courts of record; the duchy court being for all matters of law and equity relating to the duchy of Lancaster; that of quarter-sessions, for all trespasses, petty larcenies, and other minor offences committed in Westminster and its liberties; and that of St. Martin's-le-Grand, for the trial of all personal actions appertaining to that particular liberty. The court leet, which is held by the Dean of Westminster, or his deputy, is for choosing parochial officers, preventing or removing nuisances, &c. The city and liberties of Westminster return two members to parliament, who are elected by the inhabitant householders; the number of voters is 14,801, and the high bailiff is returning officer.

SOUTHWARK was governed by its own bailiffs until 1327; but the city suffering great inconvenience from the number of malefactors that escaped thither from the jurisdiction of the city magistrates, the mayor of London was then, by charter, constituted bailiff of Southwark, and empowered to govern it by his deputy. Edward VI. granted the "Borough, or Town of Southwark," to the city of London, for a pecuniary consideration, and afterwards, for a further payment of the same kind, it was made a twenty-sixth ward to the city, by the name of Bridge-ward Without. It became, in consequence, subject to the lord mayor, who has under him a steward and a bailiff, the former of whom holds a Court of Record every Monday at St. Margaret's Hill, for debts, damages, and trespasses. Here is also a Court of Record for the Clink liberty, held near Bankside, in Southwark, by the Bishop of Winchester's steward, for actions of debt, trespass, &c., within that liberty. The borough returns two members to parliament, who are chosen by the inhabitant householders of the old borough, which comprised 401 acres, and by the £10 householders of an enlarged district, which, by the act of the 2nd and 3rd of William IV., cap. 64, was added thereto for elective purposes, and the limits of which include by estimation an area of 1649 acres. The number of voters is 5353, and the high bailiff is returning officer.

For the suburbs there are several courts. Of these, the Sheriff's Courts for the county of Middlesex are for actions of debt, trespass, assault, &c. East Smithfield Court is a court leet and court baron to inquire into nuisances, &c.; in the court baron, pleas are held to the amount of 40s. General and Quarter Sessions of the peace, for the liberty of the Tower of London, are held by the justices of that liberty, eight times a year, for petty larcenies, trespasses, felonies, misdemeanours, &c. A Court of Requests is held for the Tower Hamlets, for the recovery of debts under £5.

In the metropolis are also held the four great law courts of the kingdom, the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, and High Court of Chancery. The two first are held alternately at Westminster Hall, and Guildhall in the city; the Exchequer court at Westminster hall only; and the Court of Chancery, alternately at Westminster hall and Lincoln's Inn, where causes are heard by the chancellor or vice-chancellors. The rooms in Westminster Hall in which the business of the courts is transacted are situated on the western side of the great hall, and were elegantly fitted up by the late Sir John Soane. This was the great hall of the ancient palace of Westminster, and is celebrated as the scene of many important events in English history: the first hall was founded by William Rufus, but the present edifice was for the most part erected by Richard II. It is considered to be the largest apartment in Europe unsupported by pillars, being 270 feet long, 74 broad, and 90 high; the floor is of stone; the side walls and ends are pierced with elegant windows, the latter being of vast magnitude and highly elaborate workmanship. The roof, which deserves particular admiration, is of chesnut, forming an immense arch, sustained by carved angels bearing shields of the founder's arms. Parliaments were anciently held in the hall, and it was the court of justice in which the sovereign presided in person; the coronation feasts have been held here for many ages, and it is also occasionally used for the trial of peers, or persons impeached by the commons. There is likewise the Rolls' Court, generally held by the Master of the Rolls in the Rolls' Chapel, Chancery-lane. Civil and ecclesiastical causes are tried at Doctors' Commons, at which place are also held the Courts of Admiralty. The ecclesiastical courts are, the Court of Arches, for appeals from inferior ecclesiastical courts in the province of Canterbury, of which the Court of Peculiars here is a branch; the Prerogative Court, for causes relative to wills and administrations; the Faculty Court, empowered to grant dispensations to marry, &c.; and the Court of Delegates, for ecclesiastical affairs.

London also contains, besides the courts already described, the following. The Palace Court, or Marshalsea, held formerly at the Old Court-house in the Borough, but now in Scotland-yard, opposite the Admiralty, has jurisdiction of all civil suits within twelve miles of Whitehall, the city of London excepted, and takes cognizance of debts to any amount above 40s.; but all actions for debts above £20 may be removed into any of the superior courts. The High Court of Admiralty, Doctors' Commons, takes cognizance of all maritime pleas, criminal and civil, the latter being determined according to the civil law, the plaintiff giving security to prosecute, and, if cast, to pay what is adjudged; but the former being tried by special commission, at the sessions-house in the Old Bailey, by a judge and jury, a judge of the common law assists. A Court for the relief of Insolvent Debtors was instituted a few years since, by an act of parliament, for the purpose of releasing debtors in England and Wales, who have been imprisoned and apply by petition to be liberated, upon surrendering their effects to their creditors; the commissioners, who preside as judges, hold their sittings at a newly-erected court-house, in Portugal-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. Courts of Request for the summary recovery of debts not exceeding 40s. are situated in various parts: there is one in Vine-street, Piccadilly; also one in Kingsgate-street, Holborn; one in Osbourne-street, Whitechapel; one in Castle-street, Leicester-square; and one in Bowling-Green-lane, Southwark. That in Trinity-street, Stones-end, Borough, is for debts not exceeding £5. In addition, to the parliamentary representation already mentioned, four new metropolitan boroughs, each described under its own head, namely, Finsbury, Mary-le-bone, Tower Hamlets, and Lambeth, comprising a numerous constituency, have been created under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, each empowered to send two members, who are elected by the £10 householders.

PRISONS, AND POLICE.

The prisons for criminals are, Newgate, Cold-bath-fields, Giltspur-street Compter, Pentonville Model prison, Millbank, New Prison Clerkenwell, Tothill-fields Bridewell, and the gaol for the county of Surrey, Southwark. The prisons for debtors were, until recently, the Debtors' prison (White Cross-street), the Queen's Bench, the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and the Borough Compter; but in 1842 an act was passed "for consolidating the Queen's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea Prisons, and for regulating the Queen's Prison," by which it was enacted that the prison previously called that of the Marshalsea of the Court of Queen's Bench should be termed the Queen's Prison, and should be the only prison for all debtors, bankrupts, or other persons, who before the passing of the act might have been confined in the Queen's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons. Of the buildings, the majority are extensive, and in several instances, though gloomy, not inelegant, piles. Newgate, the general criminal prison for the city of London and the county of Middlesex, and, since the establishment of the Central Criminal Court, for various populous districts adjacent to the metropolis, may be particularly mentioned as such; it is of stone, divided within into several court-yards, and possesses a handsome uniform front towards the west, consisting of two wings, with the governor's house forming the centre. The city, as already stated, is under the controul of its own magistracy, consisting of the mayor and aldermen, &c.; and an act of parliament has recently been obtained for the formation of an effective police force. By the new Metropolitan Police act, the whole of the metropolis, exclusively of that part immediately denominated the City and Liberties, was consolidated into a Metropolitan Police district, which was established with a view to the better security of the persons and property of the inhabitants, and to supersede the local police previously existing in the several parishes. It extends eastward to Stratford, Poplar, and Greenwich; southward to Streatham, Tooting, and Wandsworth; westward to Acton, Ealing, and Brentford; and northward to Hampstead, Islington, Newington, and Hackney. Each division is under the charge of a superior officer, and the total number of men composing the force is upwards of 3300; the annual expense of the establishment is about £206,000.

INNS OF COURT.

The London Inns of Court were originally like colleges in a university, but confined to the study of the law. Though their origin cannot be exactly ascertained, they may be presumed to have owed their rise to the establishment of the courts of justice at Westminster, by Henry III., which collected in their neighbourhood the whole body of common lawyers, or practitioners, who began to form themselves into a society (supposed at Thavies' Inn, Holborn), in a collegiate manner. Hence their place of residence was denominated an inn (Hostell), or House of Court; and the king, in 1244, forbade the teaching of law in schools set up in the city, as had been customary, and restricted its study to these inns. Their increase, as well as divisions into Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery, was not recognized till the reign of Edward III., when their students were called apprentices of the law (from the Fr. Apprendre); and the Inns of Court became appropriated solely to the study of the common law, as were the Inns of Chancery to such clerks as studied the forming of writs and other processes in chancery. These inns have become mere residences, not for lawyers only, but any persons who choose to hire chambers in them; and the law-student, before being called to the bar, is now only obliged to be entered of one of these places, and dine in the common hall a certain number of terms; after which, should his admission not be opposed by the members, an occurrence that rarely happens, he is legally qualified to plead and conduct causes. The Inns of Court are not incorporated, consequently the masters, principals, benchers, &c., by whom they are governed, can make no by-laws, nor possess estates, &c.; yet they have certain orders which, by consent and prescription, have obtained the force of law. The societies are entirely supported by sums paid for admissions and for chambers; and from the benchers, or seniors, in whom the controul is vested, a treasurer is usually chosen to manage these funds: the other members may be divided into outer barristers, inner barristers, and students.

The principal Inns of Court are four: the Inner Temple, Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. The Inns of Chancery are seven, viz., Clifford's Inn, Lyon's Inn, Clement's Inn, and New Inn, belonging to the two Temples; Furnival's Inn, belonging to Lincoln's Inn; and Staple's Inn, and Barnard's Inn, belonging to Gray's Inn. Thavies' Inn, Scroop's Inn, Chester Inn, or Strand Inn, as well as Johnson's Inn, and some others in the city, have long been disused. Of the two Serjeants' Inns, in Fleet-street and Chancery-lane, the latter only is appropriated as chambers for the Serjeants-at-law, who removed thither from Symond's Inn, which is falling to decay, and merely tenanted as chambers by any one who chooses to rent them. Serjeants' Inn, Fleet-street, consists now of private residences. The Temple is so called from its original inhabitants, the Knights Templars, who, on quitting their old house in Southampton-buildings, Holborn, in the reign of Henry II., built a house in Fleet-street, thence called the New Temple, which occupied all the ground from White Friars to Essex-street. On their suppression by Edward II., the Temple, after two or three intermediate grants from the crown, was, by Edward III., given to the monastery of St. John of Jerusalem, the prior and convent of which afterwards demised it to the lawyers, supposed to have removed hither from Thavies' Inn, at a yearly rent of £10, a sum for which they still enjoy from the crown the whole of this splendid property. The Temple is at present divided between the two societies, the Inner and Middle Templars, each consisting of benchers, barristers, and students, the government being vested in the benchers. In term-time the members dine in the hall of the society, which is called keeping commons; to dine a fortnight in each term, is deemed keeping the term, and twelve of those terms qualify a student, after being called to the bar, to plead and manage causes in the courts. Lincoln's Inn occupies, with its gardens and squares, a very extensive plot of ground on the western side of Chancery-lane. It has a fine ancient brick gateway opening from Chancery-lane, built by Sir Thomas Lovel in the reign of Henry VIII.; a hall erected by the same person, wherein the Lord Chancellor holds his sittings; and a chapel built by Inigo Jones, in the English style. A new library and dining-hall, of which the first stone was laid by Vice-Chancellor Sir Knight Bruce, April 20th, 1843, are in course of erection, in a very handsome style, at the south-western angle of the garden, the west front overlooking Lincoln's Inn Fields; the design is of the latest Tudor character, resembling the older parts of Hampton Court, and the edifice, which will be of very considerable extent, will afford the necessary accommodation which has been for some time needed; the old hall and library will be judiciously preserved inviolate. Gray's Inn principally consists of two quadrangles, separated by a hall and chapel, and two handsome ranges of buildings recently erected, called Verulam and Raymond buildings. Most of the other inns consist of double courts, surrounded by large brick buildings divided into chambers; all of them have halls, in some cases surrounded by gardens, and several have good libraries.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES AND OTHER PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The offices more immediately connected with the affairs of government occupy a grand line of buildings, stretching entirely across the eastern extremity of St. James' Park, from Spring Gardens to Downing-street. The most northerly is the Admiralty: next is the War Office, or Horse Guards; then the Treasury; and lastly, the offices of the three Secretaries of State.

The War Office, or Horse Guards, derives its latter appellation from the circumstance of that branch of the military mounting guard here. It is a noble, though rather heavy, building, erected by Ware, at an expense of more than £30,000, and contains a variety of apartments in which is transacted all business relative to the British army; a handsome portal leads through it from St. James' Park into the fine open street called Whitehall. The Admiralty, originally called Wallingford House, and facing Whitehall, has a beautiful screen by Adams, which, with its spacious portico, renders it on the whole a commanding pile; the Lords of the Admiralty have offices, with spacious private apartments, and on the top of the building is a semaphore telegraph, which communicates orders, by signal, to the principal parts of the kingdom. The Treasury is an extensive pile, partly formed out of the remains of Whitehall palace; the principal front, which is of stone, looks into St. James' Park; that next Whitehall has been rebuilt in a splendid style by Sir John Soane. Besides the Board of Treasury, the edifice contains a variety of offices, amongst which is the Council Chamber. The buildings of the other government offices situated in the immediate vicinity of the above, and which consist of the offices of the Secretaries of State, the Board of Control for the affairs of India, the offices of the Crown Lands, and of the Board of Works, &c., have nothing in them particularly worthy of notice.

Somerset House, the most noble collection of Government offices in London, derives its name from being built on the site of the splendid palace erected by the Protector Somerset, in the reign of Edward VI. After having been for several ages occasionally inhabited by the queens of England, it was rebuilt, as it now stands, under the superintendence of Sir William Chambers, in 1775. It occupies a space of about 800 feet in width, and 500 in depth; and for magnitude, as well as architectural merit, ranks among the foremost of the public buildings in London. The magnificent Strand front, the extensive quadrangular court, the yet grander front next the Thames, with its terrace, one of the finest in the world, all combine, with the numerous spacious apartments and offices it contains, to excite admiration. It comprises the offices of the Poor Law Commission, of the Registrar-General, and of the Tithe Commission; also the Naval Office, Navy Pay Office, Malt Office, Stamp Office, the Offices of the Chancellors of the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, the Hawkers' and Pedlars' Office, Stage-coach Office, Legacy-duty Office, and the whole revenue establishment of the Tax Offices; all which are situated in the quadrangle that forms the main body of the pile. The front next the Strand has been munificently devoted to the use of the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries, and other institutions; apartments have been assigned for the use of the board constituting the University of London, and others have been appropriated to the School of Design, instituted by the Government within the last few years, for elementary instruction in drawing, modelling from the antique and from nature, and in the use of oil and water colours. The buildings of King's College, recently founded, form the eastern wing of the south front of the edifice, which, without it, was incomplete.

"THE TOWER," as it is familiarly called, stands on the northern bank of the Thames, and consists of a large pile of building, the irregularity of which arises from its having been erected and enlarged by various sovereigns, at distant periods of time: it served the purpose of a fortified palace to many of the early monarchs of England. Tradition ascribes its origin to Julius Cæsar, but the earliest authentic account of it is, that William the Conqueror, having little reliance on the fidelity of his new subjects of London, on fixing his residence in the metropolis, built a strong fortress to overawe them, on part of the present site of the Tower. In 1078, he appointed Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester, a skilful architect, to superintend the building of a larger fort, being the same, though repaired or rebuilt by some of his successors, which is now called the White Tower. It is situated in the centre of the fortress, and is of a square shape, with four watch-towers, one of which is used as an observatory: this part of the building contains, besides a small armoury for the sea service, an old Norman chapel, dedicated to St. John, in which the kings and queens who resided here performed their devotions; it is of an oblong form, circular at the east end, and supported by short round pillars, and in it the ancient records of the kingdom are now kept. In 1082, William Rufus laid the foundations of a castle southward, and near to the river, which was finished by his successor, Henry I.: beneath it were two gates, one called Traitors' gate, through which state prisoners were conveyed to their cells, and the other bearing the name of the Bloody gate. Henry III. added a strong gate and bulwark to the west entrance, repaired and whitened the square tower, which probably gave it the name it still retains, and extended the fortress by a mud wall, which was superseded by one of brick by Edward IV., who built within this enclosure the present Lion's tower. Charles II. and the succeeding sovereigns, down to George IV., made various additions and alterations within the area inclosed by the ancient fortifications; and the exterior walls now include an area of twelve acres and five roods. The exterior circuit of the ditch, which entirely surrounds it, is 3156 feet; it is separated from the Thames by a broad quay, behind which is a platform for mounting 61 pieces of cannon, which are brought out and fired on all occasions of public rejoicing. The interior, which forms a parish within itself, subject to the visitation of the Bishop of London, contains several streets, and a variety of interesting buildings, which, before the recent fire, consisted of the Tower parochial church, or Royal Free Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula, the White Tower, the Ordnance Office, the Record Office, the Jewel Office, the Horse Armoury, the Grand Storehouse, the new or small Armoury, houses belonging to the officers of the Tower, barracks for the garrison, and two suttling-houses, commonly used by the officers of the garrison. The great fire, by which a large portion of this celebrated edifice was destroyed, took place on the 30th of Oct. 1841, and extended to the Grand Storehouse, the Table, or Bowyer Tower, with two stores on each side of it, and the Butler's Tower: in the armoury, which was 345 feet long, were no less than 280,000 stand of arms, ready for use, besides a vast quantity of military trophies, many of them ancient and of great historical interest; and during the conflagration, the regalia, used at coronations, which were kept in the Jewel Office, were hurriedly, but safely, removed. The government is entrusted to a Constable, generally a person of high rank, under whose command are a lieutenant and a deputy-lieutenant, the latter being called the governor, with several subordinate officers, besides forty wardens, who bear the same rich antique uniform as was worn by the corps at its formation by Henry VII.

The Mint, originally situated within the limits of the Tower, and the business of which was afterwards for some time carried on at Soho, near Birmingham, now stands at the north-eastern corner of Tower Hill, on the site of the old Victualling-Office; it contains steam-engines, and all the numerous mechanical works for facilitating the operations of the coinage.

BRIDGES AND TUNNEL.

The bridges which unite the southern with the northern part of the metropolis are remarkable for their architecture, magnitude, and solidity.

New London Bridge, begun March 15th, 1824, and completed Aug. 1st, 1831, under the superintendence of Mr. Rennie, at a cost of £506,000, exclusively of the expense of approaches, and of removing the old bridge, is an elegant and substantial edifice of Haytor granite, 928 feet long, and, within the abutments, 782 feet, with five noble arches, of which the centre has a span of 152 feet, and the four others one of about 135. The approaches at each end are carried over arches, and communicate with spacious streets, and that on the Surrey bank of the river, from exposing to the view the whole of St. Saviour's church, possesses much grandeur. The old bridge was founded in 1176, and originally supported a street of houses with a chapel, entrance gateways, &c., which remained with various alterations till 1756, when it was cleared of the whole of its buildings.

Southwark Bridge is a magnificent structure of cast-iron, with stone piers and abutments, designed by Mr. Rennie, and consists of three arches, of which the central rises 24 feet, with a span of 240 feet, and each of the side arches is 210 feet in the span: the whole was completed in March, 1819, at an expense, including the approaches, of £800,000, being one of the most stupendous works of the kind ever formed of such materials. Many of the solid castings weigh ten tons each, and the total weight of the iron employed is about 5780 tons. The abutments are laid in radiating courses, with large blocks of Bramley-Fell and Whitby stones.

Blackfriars Bridge was named, at the time of its foundation, "Pitt's bridge," as a testimony of the respect entertained by the citizens of London for the character and talents of that eminent statesman, William Pitt, the first Earl of Chatham, whose name was accordingly inscribed on a plate laid under the foundation-stone. The first stone was laid by the Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Chitty, on the 31st of Oct. 1760; and in 1770 the work was completed, at an expense of £160,000, which was defrayed by a toll for several years. The bridge has nine elliptical arches; the span of the central arch is 100 feet, those on each side decreasing gradually towards the shores, being respectively 98, 93, 83, and 70 feet wide, leaving a clear water way of 788 feet.

Waterloo Bridge, which is longer than any of the other bridges over the Thames, affords a fine level passage across the river, and, from the beauty and simplicity of the design, and its stability, is calculated to remain a monument of architectural skill down to remote ages. The original projector was Mr. George Dodd, but in consequence of a misunderstanding between him and the company, the execution of the work devolved on Mr. Rennie; it was commenced in 1811, and completed in 1817, at an expense, including the approaches, much exceeding £1,000,000 sterling. The bridge consists of nine elliptical arches, each of 120 feet span, and 35 feet elevation; it is 42 feet broad, being of the same width as Blackfriars bridge, and its length is 1242 feet, being 19 feet longer within the abutments than Westminster bridge.

Westminster Bridge, built between the years 1739 and 1750, at a cost of £389,500, is 1223 feet long, and 44 wide, and consists of thirteen large, and two small, semi-circular arches, with fourteen intermediate piers and abutments: on its top are twenty-eight semi-octagonal recesses, twelve of which are covered by demicupolas. The two middle piers contain each 3000 solid feet, or 200 tons of Portland stone. The central arch is 76 feet wide, the others diminish in width by 4 feet equally on each side, and the two smaller ones close in shore are each about 25 feet wide. At the period of its erection this bridge was esteemed one of the noblest structures of the kind in the world: its architect was M. Labyrie, an ingenious native of Switzerland; but, although not a century old, like that of Blackfriars, it exhibits evident marks of decay, from the decomposition of the stone.

Vauxhall Bridge, commenced in 1813, and completed in 1826, at an expense exceeding £300,000, is a light and elegant structure, consisting of nine arches of cast-iron, each of 78 feet span, having between 11 and 12 feet rise, and resting on rusticated stone piers laid with Roman cement; the whole length is 809 feet. This bridge, as well as those of Southwark and Waterloo, was erected by an incorporated company of shareholders, who are authorised to levy a toll.

The Hungerford and Lambeth Suspension Foot Bridge, completed in 1844, originated in the increased traffic between the opposite shores of the Thames, occasioned by the erection of Hungerford Market and the steam-packet piers on the north side. This elegant structure, which is after a design by J. K. Brunel, Esq., F. R. S., is about 14 feet wide, and 1342 feet 6 in. long, extending from Hungerford stairs to the Belvidere-road, Lambeth: of this length, 676 ft. 6 in. form the central span, between the two piers. The piers are 55 feet in height above the foot-path, and 84 above high water, and form two handsome towers in the Italian style, with the chains passing through the attic of each; at the abutments, on each side of the river, the chains are secured in huge masses of granite. The cost of the masonry was, by contract, £60,000; of the iron work, which exceeds 700 tons in weight, £17,000; of the approaches, £13,000; and the entire expense has been estimated at £102,254.

Thames Tunnel. The idea of forming a subway under the bed of the Thames, to connect Rotherhithe with the opposite shore at Old Gravel-lane, Wapping, which had been abandoned after a fruitless attempt in 1809, was revived on a more extended scale, by Mr. Brunel, now Sir I. M. Brunel, Knt., in 1824; and the sum of £200,000 was raised by transferable shares of £50 each, which led to the commencement of the work in March, 1825. The undertaking was checked, however, by several accidents: after the tunnel had been completed to the extent of 400 feet, it was filled with water by an irruption of the river, in 1827, and again in 1828; and Sir I. Brunel's attempt, like that of his predecessor, was, after a great expenditure of money, and the loss of several lives, discontinued in 1828, and thought to be entirely relinquished. The works remained for more than seven years in a state of suspense; but after clearing the tunnel of the water, the structure of the double archway was found to be in a perfectly sound and satisfactory state, and the operations were consequently resumed, and the whole of the tunnel, which is 1200 feet in length, was completed at an expense of £446,000, and opened to the public, for foot passengers, on the 25th of March, 1843. The tunnel consists of two arcades, forming distinct ways for going and returning, and each containing a roadway and footway, lighted by gas; the form of the arcade is cylindrical, and from its base to the level of the river at high water, the height is 75 feet, which circumstance, in addition to the unfavourable nature of the ground through which the excavation is made, rendered the formation of the tunnel one of the most adventurous and arduous enterprises in the art of engineering ever attempted.

ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION.

At what precise period London was constituted the head of a DIOCESE is uncertain, but it is evident that it acquired the distinction not long after the introduction of Christianity into Britain. It appears to have been at first an archbishopric, but after the metropolitan power was transferred to Canterbury, in consequence of the conversion to Christianity of Ethelbert, King of Kent, by Augustine, London sank into a bishopric, and Melitus was made the first bishop, in 604. The diocese was co-extensive with the ancient kingdom of the East Saxons, comprehending the counties of Middlesex and Essex, and part of Hertfordshire. Under the ecclesiastical arrangements provided by the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV, c. 77, it will consist of the city of London, the county of Middlesex, nine parishes in Essex, the town of Deptford, and seven other parishes in Kent, the borough of Southwark, and eighteen parishes in Surrey. Though locally in the province of Canterbury, it is exempt from the visitation of the archbishop; and the Bishop of London enjoys precedence over all the other bishops, ranking in dignity next to the Archbishop of York. The ecclesiastical establishment is composed of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, five archdeacons, thirty canons or prebendaries (three of whom are residentiary, and, with the dean, constitute the chapter), twelve petty or minor canons, six vicars-choral, a subdean, and inferior officers. The jurisdiction of the bishop extends over 603 benefices, and he has the patronage of the archdeaconries, chancellorships, precentorship, treasurer-ship, non-resident canonries, and seventy-nine benefices, besides six others alternately: the resident canonries are in the gift of the Crown. The income of the bishop is £11,700; the income of the dean, who is also a canon of St Paul's, amounts to £2974, and the net revenue of the Dean and Chapter to £9000; the Dean and Chapter possess the patronage of thirty-four benefices, with eleven others alternately. The twelve petty canons were incorporated as a body politic, in 1399, by letters-patent of Richard II.; they are governed by a warden, chosen from among themselves, and have a common seal.

a Christchurch was formerly a part of St. Saviour's parish, and with it now forms the poor law union of St. Saviour's. The parish extends into the East Division of the hundred of Brixton, but the entire population is given above.

b The parish, under the Poor Law, has a separate board of 18 guardians.

c St. Olave's parish extends into the city of London, and, with the parishes of St. Thomas and St. John Horsleydown, forms the poor law union of St. Olave, under the care of 15 guardians.

There are likewise numerous extra-parochial and independent liberties; namely, in the city Without the Walls, Barnard's Inn, Bridewell Hospital and Precinct, Clifford's Inn, Furnival's Inn, Gray's Inn, Lincoln's Inn, Serjeants' Inn (Chancery-lane), Staple Inn, White Friars' Precinct, Inner Temple, and Middle Temple. Adjacent to the city are, St. Catherine by the Tower (Precinct), Old Artillery Ground Liberty, Charter-House, Ely-place, Norton-Falgate Liberty, Rolls Liberty, Old Tower Without (Precinct), and East Smithfield Liberty. In the city and Liberty of Westminster are, the Close of the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, Duchy of Lancaster (Precinct), Privy Gardens, and Whitehall, and the Verge of the palaces of St. James' and Whitehall.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL, the chief ecclesiastical edifice of the metropolis, and of the empire, and the masterpiece of its architect, Sir Christopher Wren, is a magnificent structure, occupying the highest and most central spot of ground in the city, and nearly covering the site of the ancient cathedral built by Bishop Maurice, which was destroyed by the fire of 1666. The commission for the erection of the present edifice is dated in 1673, the interval between the fire and that period having been employed in endeavouring to repair the old fabric, which was at length found impracticable. The first stone of the structure, which was built from the third design of the architect, was laid June 21st, 1675; the walls of the choir and side aisles were finished in ten years, together with the porticoes on the north and south sides; and the lantern was crowned with the last stone in 1710, in the lifetime of the architect, by his son Christopher. The building was erected at the national expense, and cost a million and a half of money; the iron balustrade surrounding the churchyard, which, with its seven iron gates, weighs 200 tons, cost £11,202; and the extent of ground occupied is two acres and sixteen perches. The edifice is wholly constructed of the best Portland stone, in the form of a Latin cross, 514 feet long, and 216 broad, and from the intersection rises a stately cupola, towering in majestic proportion above the rest of the structure, and universally admired for its grandeur and elegant proportions; the cupola is 215 feet high, 145 in diameter, and 430 in circumference, and is ornamented with 32 columns below, and a range of attic antæ above, the exterior circuit of which is flanked by a noble balustrade. From its summit rises a lantern, adorned with large Corinthian pillars, surrounded at the base by a gallery, and terminating in a superb gilt ball and cross, the height of which from the floor of the church is 404 feet. The other principal architectural features of the exterior are, the two grand semicircular porticoes at the north and south ends of the transept, and a magnificent entrance at the western end. The great western entrance is composed of a double story of twelve lofty Corinthian columns below, and eight of the Composite order above, supporting a grand enriched pediment, representing the conversion of St. Paul, and crowned with a colossal figure of that saint, and other statues; the whole stands upon an elevated base, the ascent to which is by a flight of 22 black marble steps, extending the entire length of the portico. At each of the northern and southern extremities of this elevation is an elegant campanile turret, of two stories, of light pierced workmanship, terminating in a dome formed by curves of contrary flexure, and surmounted with a gilt pine-apple. In a spacious area in front is a statue of Queen Anne. The north and south sides, which have an air of uncommon elegance, comprise richly decorated windows and niches, and are ornamented with scrolls, fruitage, and other suitable enrichments. The interior of the edifice, which consists of a nave, choir, side aisles, transept, side chapels, &c., is of correspondent beauty, and, like the exterior, is constructed in the purest style of classical architecture. The concave of the grand cupola, painted by Sir James Thornhill, exhibits designs illustrative of some of the most remarkable occurrences in the life of St. Paul; the space beneath the great dome has lately been appropriated to the reception of monuments and statues of British heroes, and other illustrious dead, which, being composed of the finest marbles, and generally of good design, add to the rich appearance of this part of the cathedral. In the crypt under the church, and immediately below the centre of the dome, is the tomb of Admiral Lord Nelson.

The PAROCHIAL CHURCHES may, for the most part, be divided into two classes, namely, those built by Sir Christopher Wren, or his pupils, since the great fire, and those which escaped that calamity. Of the former, the following most deserve notice. St. Mary-le-Bow, in Cheapside, which, and St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, possess the most elegant steeples of any in London, is a successful endeavour to perpetuate the origin of its name of Le Bow, which arose not only from the body having been erected on arches, or a Norman crypt (which still remains), but from the edifice having a steeple, or lantern, resting on bows. This beauty is retained in the present structure, the spire of which is partly supported by flying buttresses, Corinthian columns, and an elegant circular gallery, terminating in a lofty spire: the whole being a masterly display of the five orders. The steeple of St. Bride's, which is of a totally different form, but equally beautiful, consists of a series of elegant stories, diminishing in exact proportion as they ascend; with the spire, it originally reached the altitude of 234 feet, but was lately reduced, on account of its having been damaged by lightning. The chaste and elegant church of St. Stephen, Walbrook, which stands on the site of an older edifice, built in 1420, and burnt down by the great fire, deserves notice on account of the unrivalled beauty of its interior, which, for propriety of elevation, simple grandeur of style, and tasteful embellishment, stands alone among the religious structures of the metropolis; the dome springing from the intersection is supported by eight arches, rising from as many Corinthian columns, so disposed as to give to the whole an effect of great lightness and spaciousness. Over the altar is a fine painting, by West, of the Stoning of St. Stephen.

The above-named churches are amongst the finest of the 50 built by Sir Christopher Wren after the conflagration in 1666. The following claim notice either for their architectural character, or historical interest. St. Michael's, Wood-street, which is of the Ionic order, was erected in 1669; the original tower has of late years been replaced by a clumsy spire. So early as the year 1359, the church was liberally endowed; and Stow asserts that the head of James IV. of Scotland was buried here, after the battle of Flodden Field. St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, which has a large western tower with angular pinnacles, occupies the site of an old church refounded by Alderman Keeble, in the fifteenth century: Judge Jeffreys was buried in it. St. Mary's-at-Hill, Lower Thames-street, only partially destroyed by the great fire, is remarkable for containing some old and curious records, extracts from which have been published; it has a plain square brick tower. St. Vedast's, Foster-lane, which possesses a very handsome stone spire, of exact symmetry, contains an altar-piece of singular elegance; the railing before it is peculiarly rich; the border that surrounds the nimbus, or glory, is composed for the most part of three cherubim, half immersed in clouds, and six winged infants, in the highest possible relief, one sounding two trumpets, and the others bearing palm branches, the carving being either from the chisel of Gibbons, or some successful rival of that great artist. St. Sepulchre's, Snow-hill, is a spacious stone structure, modernised from the remains of the former church built in 1440, and which escaped the great fire; it has a fine groined porch, or entrance, and a lofty square tower with tall angular pinnacles, which, together with the interior, show that it must, before its modernisation, have been a noble edifice of English architecture. St. Mary's Woolnoth, Lombard-street, is a fine specimen of the Tuscan order, erected by Nicholas Hawksmoor, a pupil of Sir Christopher Wren. The exterior is of stone; the northern elevation is ornamented with large semi-circular rusticated arches, and the western end has a double tower with Composite columns, a balustrade, and other ornaments: the interior is of exquisite proportion, and chastely decorated. St. Michael's, Cornhill, has a beautiful tower, which renders it one of the most conspicuous features of the city. It is surmounted by four fluted turrets, and is admirably light and elegant; and the various orders of architecture are harmoniously combined. There is a monument in it to the memory of Fabian, the chronicler, who was an alderman of London. St. Lawrence's, Jewry, rebuilt in 1677, is a neat edifice, of which the interior has lately been rendered very elegant, and contains a monument of Archbishop Tillotson. St. Peter's, Cornhill, according to an inscribed brass plate in it, was the first Christian church erected in Britain, and is said to have been built by King Lucius, so early as the year 179. The present structure is plain but neat, and has a steeple of red brick, with a lofty spire terminating in a large key, the emblem of the patron saint. St. Benet's, Paul's Wharf, was erected in 1181, and rebuilt in 1682, and is said to contain the remains of Inigo Jones. St. Swithin's, Cannon-street, a small but elegant church, with a tower and spire, was built in 1680, on the site of one of very ancient foundation, and attracts additional notice from the famous "London Stone" being placed in front of it. Christ Church, Newgate-street, is a spacious edifice of stone, with a lofty tower, and is much frequented on account of the singing by the scholars of Christ's Hospital, who attend divine service in it, and whose combined voices, from their great number, produce an extraordinary effect. Previously to the dissolution of monasteries, this was the site of the Grey friars' church, which was 300 feet long, and decorated with noble monuments; the portion rebuilt was the choir only of the ancient structure. St. Alban's, Wood-street, is a handsome stone edifice, with a lofty turreted tower, and, within, is in good proportion, containing a richly-ornamented altar-piece, and a pulpit finely carved. The Saxon king, Athelstan, is said to have had a palace adjoining this church, and his name, corrupted and abridged, is thought to be preserved in Addle-street, formerly called King Adel-street, running by the side of it. St. Margaret Pattens, Rood-lane, was rebuilt in 1687; the carving of the altar-piece is by Grinlin Gibbons. St. Michael's, College-hill, celebrated as the burial-place of the famous mayor, Richard Whittington, who here founded a college, has a tower surmounted by a singularly beautiful turret, decorated with Corinthian columns; the ceiling, which is finely coved, is said to be the largest ceiling of any church in London unsupported by a single column; the altar-piece comprises carving by Gibbons.

Some of the churches which escaped the great fire are of very considerable architectural merit, and most of them contain curious and interesting monuments; they are as follow:—

St. Andrew Undershaft, Leadenhall-street, which obtained its adjunct from a May-pole, or shaft, formerly set up on every first of May, and which was higher than the church steeple, is in the later English style, and was rebuilt in 1522, at the expense of William Fitz-William, founder of the noble house of Wentworth. The interior is decorated with great taste; the ceiling is adorned with angels, and the compartments over the pillars which support it are painted in imitation of basso-relievo. The eastern window is richly ornamented with stained glass, in five compartments, representing the sovereigns Edward VI., Queen Elizabeth, James I., Charles I., and Charles II.; and the pulpit is a fine specimen of carving. The most remarkable monument is that of John Stow, the London historian, who is represented sitting at study. St. Helen's, Bishopsgate-street, affirmed by Dr. Stukeley to stand on the site of a church which existed in the time of the Roman dominion in Britain, and was dedicated to the Empress Helena, was the conventual church of an adjoining priory of Benedictine nuns, part of which was appropriated to the use of the parishioners. It is chiefly remarkable for its ancient and curious monuments. St. James', Duke's-place, was built in the reign of James I., on the site of the priory of the Holy Trinity at Aldgate, from the materials of the conventual buildings. St. Bartholomew's the Less and the Great were both conventual churches, situated near Smithfield, and founded by Rayhere, said to have been jester to Henry I., who has a tomb, with his effigy, in the latter. St. Bartholomew's the Less, which belonged to the hospital of St. Bartholomew, has been altered and modernised so much that it retains no ancient feature worthy of description. St. Bartholomew's the Great is a fine specimen, and the only one remaining in London, of massive Norman architecture, the nave being supported by ponderous low round columns; the present church is only the choir of that of the priory. St. Giles', Cripplegate, erected in 1546, on the site of the ancient church which was built by Alfune, first master of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in 1090, and was burnt down in the year 1545, is a light well-proportioned structure, containing the remains of Speed the historian, and Fox the martyrologist, and in which Oliver Cromwell was married.

THE ABBEY, AND CHURCHES WITHOUT THE CITY PROPER.

These exhibit as great a variety in their age and construction as those within the limits of the city, and may be divided into three classes; the churches of ancient erection, those of the reign of Queen Anne and her successors, and the newly-built churches of his late Majesty's reign. The churches of the first class are, in the City and Liberties of Westminster, the abbey church of St. Peter, St. Margaret's, St. John's the Baptist (in the Savoy), and the Temple church; in Southwark, St. Saviour's church; and in other parts of the town and suburbs, St. Pancras and Stepney churches; to which, though different in style, may be added St. James', Westminster, and St. Anne's, Soho. The principal churches built in the reign of Anne and her successors, George I., II., and III., are those of St. Martin; St. George, Hanover-square; St. Giles-in-the-Fields; St. George, Bloomsbury; St. Mary-le-Strand; St. Clement Danes; St. Paul, Covent Garden; and St. John the Evangelist, Millbank; all of which are in Westminster or its liberties; St. George's, St. Thomas', St.

Mary's, Bermondsey, and Christ churches, situated in Southwark; and on the northern and eastern sides of the metropolis, the churches of Bishopsgate, Spitalfields, Shoreditch, St. Luke, St. James Clerkenwell, St. John Clerkenwell, Aldgate, Whitechapel, Bethnal-Green, Limehouse, St. George-in-the-East, Shadwell, and Wapping, for a description of which see the separate articles on most of those places.

London contains no churches of the Anglo-Saxon period, excepting small portions of Westminster Abbey Church, concealed from view in consequence of their subterranean situation. Those religious edifices in the Anglo-Norman style, and of later English architecture, most deserving of notice in Westminster, Southwark, and the suburbs, are the following:—

WESTMINSTER ABBEY, or, more properly, the collegiate church of St. Peter at Westminster, is ascribed to Sebert, King of the East Saxons. Edward the Confessor rebuilt the church in 1065; and by Pope Nicholas II. it was appointed the place of inauguration for the kings of England. On the general suppression of religious houses, Henry VIII. converted the Benedictine abbey attached to this church into a college of Secular canons, under the government of a dean, and afterwards appointed a bishop, making it the head of a diocese, comprising the entire county of Middlesex, except Fulham, which was retained by the Bishop of London; but this establishment was, a few years afterwards, dissolved by Edward VI., who restored the college, which was again changed by Queen Mary into an abbey. Elizabeth put an end to that institution in 1560, and founded the present establishment, which is a college, consisting of a dean and eleven Secular canons, or prebendaries, who have the patronage of the six minor canonries and of twenty-four benefices, with one other, alternately: the net revenue amounts to £19,543. A school was attached to the collegiate establishment by Elizabeth for 40 scholars, called the Queen's, to be educated in the liberal sciences, preparatory to their removal to the university; private scholars are also admitted, and some of the most illustrious characters in the kingdom have received their education here. To the establishment also belong choristers, singing men, an organist, and twelve almsmen. It is supposed that a school was annexed to the abbey so long ago as the time of Edward the Confessor. The present CHURCH was built by Henry III. and his successors, and completed by the last abbot, with the exception of the two towers at the western entrance, which are the work of Sir Christopher Wren, and the northern doorway, called "the beautiful gate," which was erected at the expense of the unfortunate Bishop Atterbury. Its length is 360 feet, the breadth of the nave 72 feet, and the length of the transept 195 feet. Some late improvements have exposed this venerable structure to the view, by pulling down the houses on its northern side, and forming a square before it, neatly planted with low shrubs. On entering the western door, the whole body of the church, highly impressive from its loftiness, lightness, and symmetry, presents itself at one view, terminated at the further end by the fine painted window over the portico of Henry the Seventh's chapel. The nave is separated from the choir by a screen; the choir, in the form of a semi-octagon, was formerly surrounded by eight chapels, but there are now only seven, that which was then the central chapel at present forming the porch of that of Henry VII. The roofs of the nave and transept are supported by two rows of arches, one above the other, resting on beautiful lofty clustered columns of Purbeck marble. Corresponding with the central range of pillars are demi-pillars in the side walls, which, as they rise, spring into semi-arches, and meet others opposite in acute angles; by which means the roof is thrown into a variety of segments of arches decorated with ornamental carvings. The side aisles receive light from a middle range of windows, which, with the four large ones at the ends of the nave and the transept, give light to the whole of the main building. The great western window is splendidly painted, representing figures of the patriarchs Moses and Aaron, the arms of Edward the Confessor, those of Westminster, and other devices. The choir, one of the most beautiful in Europe, is terminated towards the east by the ancient high altar, beyond which, at a small distance, is seen the magnificent shrine of Edward the Confessor, rising from the centre of the chapel which bears his name. The pavement before the altar-table is a splendid specimen of ancient Mosaic work, and one side of the inclosure is formed by the venerable tombs and effigies of Aymer de Valence, Edward Crouchback, the monuments of King Sebert, Anne of Cleves, &c. The choir is inclosed on the northern and southern sides by handsome stalls, the floor being paved with black and white marble, and the roof ornamented with white tiles, divided into compartments, which are bordered with gilt carved work. The ceremony of the coronation of the kings and queens of England is performed in this part of the abbey. The best executed monuments are the productions of Roubilliac, Rysbrach, Flaxman, Westmacott, and Bacon. In the southern extremity of the transept are monuments to the memory of many of the most eminent British poets, whence this spot has received its name of Poets' Corner; and here are, amongst others, the names and memorials of Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Milton, Dryden, Butler, Thomson, Gay, Goldsmith, Addison, Johnson, &c.; with the tombs of Handel and Garrick. In the southern aisle the most remarkable monuments are those of Dr. Watts, W. Hargrave, Esq., and Captain James Cornwall. At the western end of the abbey are those of Sir Godfrey Kneller, Dr. Mead, Sir Charles Wager, the Earl of Chatham, &c. On the northern side of the entrance into the choir is a monument of Sir Isaac Newton, and near it that of Earl Stanhope. Near the great gates, and opposite the tomb of the Earl of Chatham, lie the remains, about twelve feet from each other, of the two great political rivals, Charles James Fox and William Pitt, the monument of the latter of whom is over the western entrance. A monument to Lord Mansfield is erected under one of the lofty arches at the northern end of the transept.

Around the choir are eight chapels, dedicated respectively to St. Benedict, St. Nicholas, St. Paul, St. Erasmus, St. John the Baptist, St. John the Evangelist, St. Michael, and St. Andrew; and in them is a variety of tombs, erected to the memory of distinguished persons: the three last-named chapels have been converted into a single one. Besides these are two others deserving particular description, viz., the chapel of Edward the Confessor, and Henry the Seventh's Chapel. Edward the Confessor's Chapel stands immediately behind the altar of the church, upon an elevated floor, leading to which there is a flight of steps. It is remarkable for containing the shrine of its patron saint, King Edward the Confessor, and the tombs of several of the ancient English monarchs, from which circumstance it has been denominated "the Chapel of the Kings." The saint's shrine, erected pursuant to the orders of Henry III., by Peter Cavalini, stands in the centre, and was curiously ornamented with mosaic work of coloured stones, with gilding and other embellishments, but only some fragments now remain. Of the regal monuments around, that of Henry III. is distinguished by large panels of polished porphyry, inclosed with mosaic work of scarlet and gold, and that monarch's effigy of brass gilt, the size of life. The remains of Edward I. are contained in a plain coffin of grey marble. The tomb of Edward III. has his statue of brass gilt, and is surrounded by statues of his children, and others. There is a tomb erected to the memory of Richard II. and his queen, Anne of Bohemia, with their effigies. Editha, consort of the Confessor; Eleanor, the affectionate wife of Edward I.; and the heroic Philippa, consort of Edward III., have tombs with their effigies, the tombs of brass gilt, and the effigies of alabaster. The tomb of Henry V. is inclosed in a beautiful chantry chapel. The coronation chairs, and the stone brought from Scone by Edward I.; the sword and shield of King Edward III.; the saddle and helmet used by Henry V. at the battle of Agincourt; and various models of churches, by Sir Christopher Wren, are shown among the curiosities here. Along the frieze of the screen of the chapel are fourteen legendary sculptures, relating to the history of Edward the Confessor, which were executed in the reign of Henry III., and are well worthy the attention of the antiquary.

Henry the Seventh's Chapel, universally admitted to be one of the richest specimens of later English architecture in the kingdom, adjoins the eastern extremity of the abbey. It was erected as a mausoleum for himself and his family by the king whose name it bears, on the site of a smaller chapel, dedicated, like the present, to the Virgin Mary, and cost £14,000, a sum estimated to have been equal to a quarter of a million of our present currency. The exterior of the edifice is remarkable for richness and variety, which are greatly increased by fourteen buttresses, with crocketed turrets, projecting from the several angles of the building, and are beautifully ornamented with canopies, niches, and other decorations: these buttresses add strength as well as beauty to the edifice, being connected with the upper part of the walls of the nave by pointed arches. The interior, lighted by a double range of windows of magnificent dimensions and elegant workmanship, consists of a nave and two small aisles, and is entered by a flight of black marble steps, under a noble arch, that leads to a pair of large wrought brazen gates, thickly plated with gold, each panel being adorned with a rose and portcullis alternately. The nave is 99 feet long, 66 broad, and 54 high, and terminates at the eastern end in a curve, having five deep recesses, entered by open arches. The lofty stone ceiling, with its innumerable ornaments, excites the highest admiration. Numerous oratories, canopies, and other embellishments, adorn the sides and ends of the chapel. In the centre stands the altar-tomb of Henry VII., executed by Torregiano, in basaltic stone, ornamented with the royal effigy, and surrounded by a magnificent screen of the same material, the whole of which is said to have cost £10,000. Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, Mary, Queen of Scots, Margaret of Richmond, several of the Brunswick family, and numerous other royal and distinguished persons, have been interred within this celebrated chapel.

St. Margaret's Church, an elegant specimen of the architecture of the period of Edward IV., stands near the northern entrance of the abbey, and is remarkable for its beautiful eastern window of painted glass, representing the Crucifixion, which was presented by the magistrates of Dort, in Holland, to Henry VII., and intended for his chapel, then in progress of erection; but he dying before it was finished, after passing through the hands of various owners, it was at last purchased for its present situation for the sum of £420. A board in the church is inscribed to the memory of Sir Walter Raleigh, who was beheaded in 1618, in Palace-yard adjoining. The members of the house of commons attend divine service here on particular occasions. The Temple Church, dedicated to St. Mary, supposed to have been originally founded in 1185, and subsequently either partly or wholly rebuilt by the Knights Templars, in 1247, has, after various dilapidations and injudicious repairs, been completely restored to its pristine character, and was opened for divine service in November, 1842. This highly interesting structure consists chiefly of two portions, of which the one, a circular tower, forming a vestibule to the other part, is a beautiful specimen of the middle and transitional styles of Norman architecture, and of the various gradations whereby it passed into the early English style, of which the eastern, or second, portion of the church is one of the purest and most elegant specimens extant. The western entrance to the circular tower is by a deeply-recessed and elaborately-enriched Norman doorway. From the basement of the interior rises a series of six clustered and filleted columns of Purbeck marble, supporting a triforium embellished with a series of intersecting arches resting on slender shafted columns; and immediately above the main columns, are six openings into a gallery behind them, in which have been deposited the numerous monuments that previously disfigured the walls. The clerestory is lighted by a range of six circular-headed windows, of which one is filled with stained glass; and the groined roof is ornamented with paintings in appropriate devices. On the tessellated pavement are several recumbent effigies of Knights Templars, and behind the columns is a circular aisle, the walls of which are adorned with a series of arches, resting on a platform of stone, and having, in the spandrels, human heads of grotesque character. From the circular tower, three lofty and finely-pointed arches lead into the nave and aisles of the eastern portion of the church, or choir, which is appropriated to the performance of public worship; the nave is separated from the aisles by beautiful ranges of clustered columns of Purbeck marble, and is lighted on each side by a series of five lofty triple lancet windows; and at the east end are three similar windows, of which the central one, immediately above the altar, is of larger dimensions. The eastern windows are all embellished with stained glass, representing scriptural subjects, most minutely detailed, and various emblematical devices illustrative of the order of Knights Templars; in the side windows are several shields of armorial bearings, in stained glass, and on the north side, the central window has been made to form a recess for the organ, which has been removed from its former situation, where it impeded the principal entrance from the circular tower. The roof is richly groined, and elaborately painted; and between the windows are slender shafts of Purbeck marble, rising from plinths, and supporting the ribs of the groining of those portions of the roof which cover the aisles. Among the numerous distinguished characters whose remains have been interred in the church, are Plowden, Selden, Lord Thurlow, and Dr. Mead.

St. John's the Baptist, now almost the only remnant of the palace of the Savoy, in the Strand (which was rebuilt in 1245, and converted into an hospital in 1509, when the present church appears to have been erected), has a beautiful roof, divided into panels, on which numerous religious and heraldic devices are carved, and contains several ancient monuments of the Willoughby, Howard, and Compton families; it was very tastefully repaired in 1820, and other embellishments have been just completed. St. Saviour's, Southwark, formerly collegiate, is the most spacious parochial church in the metropolis, and one of the finest specimens of ancient architecture; it has a nave, aisles, choir, transept, and Lady chapel. The old nave was recently swept away, and a new building erected in its stead, which is divided from the transepts by a screen reaching to the roof; it contains a magnificent organ, a genuine part of the old pile, although lately enlarged. The Lady chapel has been renovated at a very great expense, defrayed by subscription, and is considered one of the handsomest specimens of the early English style now subsisting. A portion of the church appears to be of the period of Henry II. or III., and another portion of that of Henry IV., in whose reign it was partly rebuilt. Twenty-six pillars, in two rows, support the roof of this interesting edifice; and the chancel, and galleries in the walls of the choir, are adorned with arches, in a similar manner to Westminster Abbey. The tower, which is sustained on four very strong pillars, is 150 feet high, to the top of the large angular pinnacles, and contains a ring of twelve fine-toned bells. During the progress of embellishment and repairs, in the month of July, 1830, the remains of Dr. Lancelot Andrews, Bishop of Winchester, who died Sept. 21st, 1626, were discovered in a state of great preservation, in a leaden coffin, walled up with brick, within his monument in Bishops' chapel; a subterraneous passage leading from the church was also exposed to view soon afterwards. Gower, one of the ancient English poets, has a small monument in the church, and several other eminent men lie interred here. The churchwardens of St. Saviour's, with others of the parish officers, form a corporate body, by charter of Henry VIII., granted at the dissolution of the college, or priory of St. Augustine canons here, when the inhabitants purchased the conventual church, and made it parochial. St. James', and St. Anne's, Soho, are remarkable, the former for containing a beautiful marble font, sculptured by Grinlin Gibbons; and the latter as the burial-place of Theodore, King of Corsica, who lies in the churchyard, beneath a gravestone inscribed with some affecting lines from the pen of Lord Orford.

Although Sir Christopher Wren was the architect principally employed in rebuilding the churches after the great fire of London, yet the erection of a few in different parts of the metropolis was confided to his contemporaries. There were also several good churches built in the succeeding reigns, by other architects; and the following, as the most interesting of these, are entitled to a brief notice. St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, which has been invariably admired for its portico, as the finest of any church in London, and is entitled to a comparison with the best works of Sir Christopher Wren, was erected between the years, 1721 and 1726, from a design by James Gibbs, and unites the light and picturesque beauty of the modern temple with the sober grandeur and solidity of Grecian architecture; the formation of Trafalgar-square has opened to the public a good view of this splendid edifice, which previously was much obscured by numerous buildings. St. George's, Hanover-square, is also remarkable for a very fine portico of the Corinthian order, consisting of six columns, with an entablature and pediment; and the steeple is an excellent piece of architecture; over the altar-piece is a painting of the Last Supper, attributed to Sir James Thornhill. St. Mary's-le-Strand, though sometimes censured for its affected display of the five orders of architecture, and otherwise too lavish ornament, is a handsome edifice, erected by Gibbs, in 1717, just after his return from Italy. St. Clement Danes has a lofty steeple by Gibbs, and the body of the church is said to have been designed by Sir Christopher Wren. St. Paul's, Covent Garden, which was originally erected by Inigo Jones, at the expense of the Earl of Bedford, and on the 17th of Sept., 1795, was burnt down, was rebuilt in imitation of the original edifice, and has a noble massive portico of the Tuscan order, with an interior of great neatness and simplicity: Butler, the author of Hudibras, and Dr. Wolcot, better known under the assumed name of Peter Pindar, lie buried in the churchyard. St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, erected from a design by Henry Flightcroft, is constructed entirely of stone, in a simple yet elegant style, with a lofty handsome steeple, and was finished in 1734, at an expense of £10,000; the entrance gateway has a fine sculptured entablature, representing the Day of Judgment. St. George's, Bloomsbury, erected by Mr. Nicholas Hawksmore, and finished in 1731, is a singular, and not very harmonious, compound of the Tuscan and Corinthian orders, constructed entirely of stone, with a good portico in front, and a pyramidal steeple, grotesquely ornamented. St. John's the Evangelist, Millbank, designed by Sir John Vanbrugh, is remarkable for having four steeples, one at each corner, which give it rather a whimsical appearance; several of its details, however, are beautiful.

The churches erected since the commencement of the present century are numerous, and some of them are eminent specimens of architectural display, particularly St. Pancras', Mary-le-Bone, All Souls' (Langham-place), St. Luke's (Chelsea), St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, recently rebuilt, &c.; but those erected within the last few years, a period particularly remarkable for the number of new churches, are principally edifices in a simple and unadorned style, with few pretensions to beauty of architecture, or richness of ornament. One built in Berwick-street, in the parish of St. James', Westminster, and consecrated July 23rd, 1839, is the largest that has been erected in the metropolis for several years; the cost of its erection and the purchase of the site having exceeded £14,000. There are in various parts of the metropolis about 450 places of worship, of which 250 belong to the Establishment, and the remainder to Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, Swedenborgians, Unitarians, Welsh Calvinists, and others. There are also churches in connexion with the establishment of Scotland, Roman Catholic chapels, synagogues, and Foreign churches and chapels.

COLLEGES, SCHOOLS, AND ESTABLISHMENTS FOR INSTRUCTION AND STUDY OF VARIOUS KINDS.

London contains a university, two colleges, 45 free schools with perpetual endowments, seventeen schools for poor and deserted children, and upwards of 200 parochial schools, in which the children are both clothed and educated; besides numerous national and Lancasterian schools, above 500 Sunday schools, and about 4000 private schools in and near the metropolis.

Seal of the University.

The University of London, Somerset House, was originally instituted by charter granted on the 28th of Nov. 1836; but on the 5th of December, 1837, a second charter was bestowed, by which the former was revoked, and some of its details were modified. Its prominent objects are the advancement of religion and morality, and the promotion of useful knowledge; and it is intended to hold forth to all classes and denominations an encouragement for pursuing a regular and liberal course of education, by conferring academical degrees. The senate consists of a chancellor, vice-chancellor, and 36 fellows; and examiners in the classics, mathematics, natural history, chemistry, &c., have been appointed, for granting the several degrees of Bachelor of Arts, Master of Arts, Bachelor of Laws, Doctor of Laws, Bachelor of Medicine, and Doctor of Medicine, and to examine for medical degrees in the four branches of medicine, surgery, midwifery, and pharmacy. The chancellor is appointed by the Crown; and the vice-chancellor, whose office is annual, by the senate, from among the fellows. When the number of fellows shall be reduced below the number of 25, the members of the senate are empowered to elect 12 more, in order to complete the number of 36: the Queen is visiter.

King's College, so named from its having been founded under the immediate patronage of George IV., who presented the proprietors with the site, on the condition that the college should be completed in conformity with the design of Somerset House, of which it now forms the eastern wing, was erected at an estimated expense, as given by the architect, Sir Robert Smirke, of £140,000, exclusively of £17,000 for the purchase and removal of houses next the Strand, to make room for the principal front, and £10,000 for furniture; making, with additional items, £170,000, besides the cost of furnishing the library and museum. The funds for the erection and support of the institution were raised by donations, and by shares of £100 each, the dividends on which are not to exceed four per cent., the surplus to be applied exclusively to the benefit of the college. The design of the institution is, to afford to the youth of the metropolis a course of instruction similar to that pursued at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The principal, with a competent number of professors, is appointed by the council, among the members of which, as perpetual governors, are, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, Secretary of State for the Home Department, Speaker of the House of Commons, Deans of St. Paul's and Westminster, and the Lord Mayor. By this body all the fundamental regulations respecting the discipline and course of education are approved, and the Archbishop of Canterbury is perpetual visiter. A valuable museum of philosophical instruments and astronomical apparatus, originally formed by George III. at the Royal Observatory in Kew Gardens, was lately presented to the institution by her Majesty, and was opened by the Prince Albert, in June 1843. Attached to the college is a preparatory school, which is well attended.

University College was established with a view to afford a liberal education principally to students who are excluded from honours at Oxford and Cambridge by the statutes of religious conformity: the students are not admitted until they are able to perform certain exercises, and are divided into three classes, according to the different departments of literature in which they are engaged. The institution is governed by a council of 24, six of whom are chosen annually, and this body appoints the professors. The funds of the institution must be not less than £150,000, nor more than £300,000; each proprietor has the right of appointing one pupil, and receives four per cent. on every share. The building, the first stone of which was laid on the 30th of April, 1827, by the late Duke of Sussex, the contract for its completion being £107,000, occupies, with its appendages, seven acres of ground, near the New road, purchased for £90,000. That portion which has been already erected consists entirely of stone, but all the parts of the original design have not yet been completed; the theatres, lecture-rooms, and apartments of the interior, are all of elegant architecture, and commodiously adapted to their respective purposes. A scholastic department, in addition to the collegiate, was subsequently established, as preparatory to the latter. The University has received a valuable addition to its museum from Gore Clough, Esq., who has presented for the use of the students of the New North London Hospital, built in connexion with it, a museum, consisting of many valuable specimens and preparations of morbid anatomy, midwifery, and casts, with numerous prints and drawings, collected at an expense of nearly £3000.

Westminster School, situated within the precincts of Westminster Abbey, was founded in 1560, by Queen Elizabeth, for 40 scholars, who receive an education preparatory for the Universities, beside whom many of the sons of the nobility and gentry are educated, as private scholars. Eight boys are elected annually on the foundation; and four more, called "Bishop's boys," who wear gowns of a different colour from those of the "King's scholars," are appointed by the dean, on the establishment of Dr. Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1628, who directed an annual pecuniary allowance to be made to each, which is withheld until the boys are entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, when the Dean and Chapter add so much as will make up £20 a year for four years. The bishop also endowed four scholarships in the same college, for boys of the school, preference being given to those on his own foundation, each of the value of £20 per annum, for four years. The other University advantages are, eight studentships and scholarships at Corpus Christi and Trinity Colleges, Cambridge, the former of the value of from £50 to £60 per annum, the latter £25; three scholarships at St. John's College, founded by Sir Robert Wood, Knight, in 1659; a second nomination to three more at Corpus Christi College, of the annual value of £20 each, founded by Archbishop Parker, in 1569; and a rent-charge of £20, assigned by Dr. Triplett, in 1668, towards the support of four boys from this school at the University.

The Charter-house, which comprises an hospital as well as a school, is so named from the word Chartreuse, the site having been occupied by a convent of Carthusian monks. It was built and endowed in the reign of James I., by Thomas Sutton, a merchant of great opulence and liberality; and the purchase and completion of the buildings cost upwards of £20,000. The establishment of this noble seminary consists of a master, a preacher, two schoolmasters, and 44 scholars, who are supported free of every expense. The boys, presented by the Governors in rotation, are instructed in classical learning, and wear an academical dress, resembling that of the scholars of Eton and Westminster; and besides those on the foundation, numerous boys are received, the sons of private gentlemen, whose education is paid for. The hospital is for 80 decayed gentlemen, who have been merchants, or military officers, each of whom is allowed £14 a year, with a gown, provisions, fuel, and two handsome apartments: they dine in a common hall, and attend prayers daily in the chapel. The buildings occupy the whole site of the monastery, which, with its gardens and grounds, was of great extent; and several portions of the monastic edifice, still remaining, present a very antique and venerable appearance. From the revenue of the institution, 29 exhibitioners, at either of the Universities, are allowed £80 per annum for the first four years, and, if they graduate regularly, £100 per annum for the next four years. It has also ten exhibitions at Christ-Church, Pembroke, Worcester, and University Colleges, Oxford, founded by Dame Elizabeth Holford, in 1720; and its governors have the patronage of nine ecclesiastical benefices. A district church, dedicated to St. Thomas, has just been erected on part of the land attached to the buildings, of which the net income of the incumbent is £120: the patronage has been vested in the Bishop of London.

St. Paul's School, at the east end of St. Paul's, church-yard, was founded in 1509, by the celebrated Dr. Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, for the free education of 153 boys, by a master, an usher, and a chaplain, under the direction of the Mercers' Company, who are perpetual trustees, the master of the company being senior surveyor of the school. The revenue is upwards of £5000; in addition to which the company are in the receipt of £1000 annually, on an average, arising from £18,834. 15. three per cent. reduced annuities, and the produce of tithes in the county of Northumberland, bequeathed by Viscount Campden, about 1685, for the endowment of exhibitions at Trinity College, Cambridge, in behalf of the school, for which nine exhibitioners are allowed £100 per annum each for five years. There are also an unlimited number of exhibitions of the value of £50 a year each, tenable for seven years, at either university; one of £30 a year at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, founded by John Stock, Esq., in 1781, tenable for seven years; five at Trinity College, Cambridge, of £10 per annum each, founded by Mr. Perry; four scholarships at Corpus Christi College, founded in 1766, by George Sykes, Esq.; and two exhibitions of £10 per annum each, jointly with the free grammar school at Dorchester, at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Dr. Gower, for clergymen's sons. The school has also an interest in Sir Robert Wood's scholarships, in default of candidates from the schools at Canterbury and Westminster. The premises were rebuilt in 1824, entirely of stone, in an elegant style, and with several enlargements, including a fine arcade for the recreation of the boys.

Merchant Tailors' School, founded in 1561, by Sir Thomas White, and liberally endowed by him and other members of the company, is conducted by a principal and three under masters, who teach the classics, and by two writing-masters, recently appointed, for whom a room has been constructed out of some smaller apartments previously occupied by the junior masters. The number of boys is limited to 250, who are presented by the members of the court, each exercising the privilege in rotation; the boys pay £5. 2. each on admission, and £2. 2. per quarter, with some other trifling charges: one-half of the admission fees is set apart for founding exhibitions at the Universities. It has 37 fellowships at St. John's College, Oxford; six scholarships at Pembroke College, Cambridge, of the value of £40 a year each, tenable for seven years, founded by the Rev. C. Parkyn; six civil-law fellowships of £50 per annum each, at St. John's College; two exhibitions of £50 per annum each, one at St. John's College, and the other at Pembroke College, founded by Dr. Stuart; five Divinity scholarships of £4. 8. each, founded by Walter Fish; four of £4 per annum each, founded by John Vernon, in 1615; and one scholarship of £4 per annum, founded by John Wooler, all ten at St. John's College; and an exhibition, of uncertain value, to either University, arising from the amount of donations by individuals educated at the school. There are also a by-fellowship and two scholarships at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, founded by Thomas Holwey, for boys from Eton or Merchant Tailors' school; and it has an interest in Sir Robert Wood's scholarships, in default of boys from Canterbury and Westminster schools. The buildings of the establishment, situated on the east side of Suffolk-lane, Cannon-street, consist of the school, apartments for the usher, a house for the head master, a library, and a chapel.

Christ's Hospital, Newgate-street, founded by Edward VI. in 1552, on the site of a dissolved monastery of Grey friars, is the noble and celebrated establishment commonly denominated the Blue-coat school, from the costume of the children supported and educated in it. This institution, famed for its antiquity, extent, and high character, occupies the site of the Grey friars' monastery, the buildings of which, having gone to decay, have just been rebuilt in conformity with the original style. Upon the foundation, in London and at Hertford, there are generally from 1300 to 1400 boys, who are clothed, boarded, and educated. The lord mayor and corporation of London are governors and directors ex officio, and there are other governors, amounting in all to about 350, who must be donors of £400 and upwards. The New Hall, from a design by Mr. John Shaw, is one of the grandest and most imposing modern attempts at later English architecture; it stands on the site of the little cloisters of the monastery, measuring more than 180 feet in length, and of proportionate height and width. The structure is of stone; and the style, agreeing with the date of the charity, has been copied from the Hall of Hampton Court palace, from which noble model, however, it differs in many respects, though in strict accordance with the style adopted: the houses in Newgate-street directly in front have recently been taken down, and the site is now occupied by a pair of handsome iron gates, by which an opening has been made so as to expose the whole of this elegant pile. The staircases, and a fine cloister beneath, correspond, and concur with the interior of the Hall itself, to render this one of the most magnificent banqueting-rooms in England. There is an establishment at Hertford, to which the younger boys are generally sent, preparatory to their entering on the foundation in London. The revenue of the hospital, arising from landed and funded property purchased with the donations of numerous private individuals, amounts to about £45,000. There are six exhibitions at Pembroke College, Cambridge, each of the value of £90 for the first four years, and £50 for the last three years, each scholar receiving £50 for an outfit; an exhibition of £70, with the same outfit, at any college in Oxford, every seventh year; two scholarships of £40 per annum each, at Pembroke College, Cambridge, founded by Mr. Sergeant Moses; six of £10 per annum each, three at Emanuel College, and three at Christ's College, Cambridge, founded by John Brown in 1662; and two exhibitions of £12 per annum, at Emanuel College, founded by Emanuel Richards, the holders of which receive also an extra allowance.

The City of London School, in Milk-street, Cheapside, was established in 1837, for the purpose of furnishing a liberal and useful education for the sons of respectable persons, engaged in professional, commercial, or trading pursuits, between the ages of seven and fifteen years. The general plan of instruction includes the English, Latin, Greek, French and German languages, besides writing, arithmetic, book-keeping, geography, mathematics, history, and incidental subjects; the Scriptures are read and taught in the school, and the business of each day is commenced and terminated with prayer. In addition to the fees from pupils, the establishment is supported by an income of £900 per annum, from estates left by John Carpenter, clerk to the city in the time of Henry VI.; and eight free scholarships have been attached to the school, as rewards of merit, to be determined by an examination at Midsummer, and the candidates for which must be between 11 and 15 years of age, and have been at least three years at the school. The advantages of each scholarship are equal to £35 per annum, besides a premium of £50 on the successful candidate leaving the establishment.

The edifices in which many of the other schools are held are handsome, and the pupils numerous.

HOSPITALS, AND OTHER CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

London contains many hospitals for the sick and diseased; a still greater number of almshouses for the maintenance of the aged; asylums for the support of indigent persons of various other descriptions; and numerous dispensaries for gratuitously supplying the poor with medicine and medical aid at their own dwellings; exclusively of which, the Livery Companies alone distribute above £64,000 annually in charities, and there is a multitude of institutions for the relief of the distressed, of a less public and prominent nature. The aggregate amount of the sums annually expended in public charities in London is estimated at little less than £1,000,000 sterling. The hospitals were chiefly founded by the munificence of private individuals; some of them being endowed with permanent revenues, and others supported by annual or occasional voluntary subscriptions. The almshouses were built and endowed either by individuals or by the incorporated companies. Many of the hospitals are buildings of immense extent, and imposing architecture, and their internal regulations are worthy of their magnitude and importance: the medical assistance is the best the profession can supply; the attendance ample, and the rooms and wards, bedding, &c., clean and wholesome. The almshouses and other institutions for the support of the aged and indigent exhibit not merely an appearance, but the real possession, of competence and ease. The hospitals and other institutions for the benefit of the sick, diseased, maimed, and afflicted, are as follow:—

St. Bartholomew's Hospital, which was incorporated in the last year of the reign of Henry VIII., formerly belonged to the priory of St. Bartholomew, in Smithfield, founded in 1102 by Rayhere, said to have been jester to King Henry I. The present edifice was constructed by Gibbs in 1729, and consists of four magnificent piles of stone building, forming the four equal sides of a quadrangle, and connected by stone gateways. Persons injured by accident are received into the hospital at all hours, and those afflicted with disease are admitted on petition. During the year 1843, 5372 in-patients, 16,937 out-patients, and 16,924 casualty patients, derived benefit from the institution. St. Thomas' Hospital, of ancient monastic foundation, but re-founded by Edward VI., stands in High-street, Southwark, and was rebuilt in 1693, in three beautiful squares, to which the governors, in 1732, added a fourth magnificent pile of building at their own expense. It is now composed of four quadrangular courts, comprising numerous wards, with a chapel and parochial church; and a new wing was recently built in a style corresponding with the other architectural improvements made at the southern approaches to new London bridge. The annual expenditure is about £10,000, and the number of persons relieved in 1843 was 40,825. St. Thomas' and St. Bartholomew's Hospitals are both under the controul of the lord mayor and aldermen. Guy's Hospital, which stands at a short distance from St. Thomas', was founded by Thomas Guy, Esq., citizen of London, who expended £18,793 on its erection during his lifetime, and endowed it with the immense sum of £220,000 at his death. The building consists of a centre and two wings, with a separate edifice in the rear for lunatic patients, and it includes thirteen large wards, a hall and chapel, a theatre for lectures, a laboratory, a museum of anatomical preparations, and a library; it can make up 550 beds, and affords relief to 2000 out-patients yearly. The London Hospital, in Whitechapel-road, was first established in 1740, and the present building was erected in 1759, when the charity was incorporated. The patients relieved are sick and wounded seamen, and other persons connected with the river and maritime affairs; their number amounts annually to many thousands. The building is extremely large, and possesses an extensive front towards the road. The Middlesex Hospital, situated in Charles-street, Oxford-street, was built in 1745, for the reception of sick and lame patients, the relief of lying-in married women and of out-patients, and the admission at all hours of persons wounded by accidents: in 1792 an addition was made to it by a beneficent individual, for affording relief to persons afflicted with cancers, who, if they choose, may remain in the hospital for life; and in 1836 the charity was incorporated. The wings of the building have been lately extended to about thirty feet, and its exterior has been improved in appearance by stuccoing it, and adding a little to its height; it is capable of receiving 300 patients. The Westminster Hospital "for the relief of the sick and needy from all parts," was founded in 1719, in James-street, Westminster, from which it was lately removed to the corner of Prince's-street, where a handsome and substantial edifice of stone has been erected, opposite to the grand entrance to the abbey; the charity was incorporated in 1836. The New Bethlehem Lunatic Hospital, Lambeth, founded by Henry VIII., and removed from its old situation in Moorfields, in 1812, is on a scale of real magnificence, the grand front being 580 feet in length, and resembling rather a palace than an erection for the purposes of charity. The building is of brick, and comprises a centre and two wings, the former being surmounted by a dome, and decorated with an Ionic portico of six columns supporting the arms of the United Kingdom; the whole was completed at an expense of about £100,000, from a design by Mr. Lewis. It is capable of receiving 460 patients, and is under the government of the mayor and aldermen; the annual income is about £18,000, and at the commencement of the year 1844, there were in the hospital 181 curables, 84 incurables, and 90 criminals. St. Luke's Hospital, also for lunatics, established by voluntary contributions, "for the relief of all indigent lunatics," on account of the inadequacy of the last-mentioned establishment, is a noble building, situated in Old-street, with a front 493 feet long, remarkable for simple grandeur. Its interior arrangement constitutes a perfect model for similar charities; the number of patients is limited to 300. The original building was erected in 1732, on the north side of Upper Moorfields, and the present was commenced in 1751, but not completed till 1786, at an expense of £55,000. Bridewell Hospital occupies the site of Bridewell palace near Fleet-street; before the fire of London it consisted of several quadrangles, and it is even now of great extent. The establishment was founded by Edward VI. for the relief of distress, and the punishment of vagrants, and is still used as a house of correction for dissolute persons, committed by the mayor and aldermen, and idle apprentices, committed by the chamberlain of the city; and for the temporary maintenance of distressed vagrants till they can be passed to their places of settlement. It is under the government of the corporation. During the year 1843, 804 criminals, or disorderly persons, were received into the establishment, for the purpose of correction and labour; 23 apprentices, committed by the chamberlain; and 183 poor persons, committed on account of vagrancy. And in the same year, a new house of occupation was opened in St. George's Fields, where the honest and industrious poor are instructed in useful trades.

Besides these principal hospitals there are several others of considerable magnitude. St. George's Hospital, near Hyde Park Corner, was instituted in 1733, and the edifice was lately rebuilt on a magnificent plan; the charity was incorporated in 1834; the number of in-patients, during the whole of 1842, was 3440, and of out-patients 7092. The Charing-Cross Hospital, King William-street, was founded in 1818, and the present building was erected in 1831; the charity has two branches, namely, a dispensary for the relief of the sick poor at their own homes, and an hospital for the reception of those more severely afflicted. The King's College Hospital, situated in Portugal-street, Lincoln's Inn, was opened April 13th, 1840, and is a great benefit; and in addition to these, are, the North London Hospital, in connexion with University College, founded in 1834; the Royal Free Hospital, instituted in 1828, and removed in 1843, from Greville-street, Hatton Garden, to healthier and more extensive premises in Gray's Inn Road; the Metropolitan Free Hospital, Carey-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, established in 1836; the London Fever Hospital, Pancras Road, opened in 1803; the Seamen's Hospital, for sick and diseased seamen in the port of London, who are accommodated on board the "Dreadnought," moored off Greenwich, established in 1821, and incorporated in 1833; the Small Pox and Vaccination Hospital, King's Cross, instituted in 1746; the Royal Jennerian and London Vaccine Institution, Providence-row, Finsbury-square, founded in 1806; the National Vaccine Establishment, Russell-place, Fitzroy-square, founded in 1809; the Home for Confirmed Female Invalids, Bird Cage Fields, Stamford-hill; the Hospital for Consumption, and Diseases of the Chest, near the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, instituted in 1841; the Sanatorium, Devonshire-place House, New Road, also opened in 1841; the Metropolitan Convalescent Institution, Sackville-street, established in 1843; Invalid Asylum for Respectable Females in London and its vicinity, established in 1825, and situated in High-street, Stoke-Newington; and the Lock Hospital, Asylum, and Chapel, situated formerly in Grosvenor-place, but now at Westbourne-green, Paddington, and of which the first was instituted in 1746, the second in 1787, and the third in 1764. The number of patients in the chief metropolitan hospitals in June, 1841, was as follows: St. Bartholomew's, 386; St. Thomas', 241; Guy's, 443; London, 313; Middlesex, 212; Westminster, 143; St. George's, 312; King's College, 101; Charing-Cross, 89; North London, 101; Fever, 29; Small Pox, 25; Dreadnought, 168; total, 2563; and the number of persons employed in these establishments was 775; making a grand total of 3338. The Lying-in Hospitals and Charities are numerous, and some of the buildings are exceedingly spacious and handsome; they include Queen Charlotte's Hospital, Manor House, Lisson-green, Marylebone, instituted in 1752; Queen Adelaide's, Queen-street, Golden-square, in 1828; the Queen Adelaide and British Ladies' Institution, Chapel-place, Cavendish-square, in 1829; the City of London Hospital, corner of Old-street, City-road, in 1750; the British Hospital for Married Women, Brownlow-street, Long Acre, in 1749; the General Hospital, York-road, Lambeth, founded in 1765, and incorporated in 1830; the Royal Maternity Charity, Little Knight-riding street, Doctors' Commons, established in 1757; the Charlotte-street General Lying-in and Sick Dispensary, near Rathbone-place, in 1778; the Newman-street Institution, in 1787; and the Mother and Infants' Friend Society, parish of St. Swithin, London Stone, in 1812.

LIBRARIES.

London possesses a great number of public libraries, independently of those attached to different charitable foundations.

The British Museum, a national repository, as well of antiquities and curiosities as of books and manuscripts, was established by act of parliament in 1753. Its originator was Sir Hans Sloane, who bequeathed his museum to the nation, on condition that parliament should pay £20,000 to his executors, and provide a house for its reception. This was accomplished by means of £85,000 raised by lottery for the purpose; and other collections being added, the whole were deposited in the noble mansion formerly belonging to the Duke of Montague, in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, which had been purchased for the purpose. To the Sloanean museum parliament has added, at various times, the Cottonian library, given by Sir R. Cotton to the public, and removed from Cotton House, Westminster; Major Edwards' library; the Harleian library; Dr. Burney's rare and classical library, and the Lansdowne manuscripts. Various literary men and others have also increased the treasures of the establishment by donations and legacies: George II. gave the whole of the important library of books and manuscripts which had been gradually collected by the kings of England, from Henry VII. to William III.; George III. presented a large and valuable assortment of pamphlets, published between the years 1640 and 1660; and Garrick bequeathed to the Museum his collection of old plays. Some of the principal private donations are, Dr. Birch's library, left by will, together with £522. 18. per annum in the funds for ever; a select library of classical works, by Thomas Tyrwhitt, Esq.; a similar bequest by Sir William Musgrave; and a magnificent collection of books and prints by the late Rev. M. Cracherode. The most recent, and one of the most important donations, is that of the magnificent library collected by George III., and presented by George IV., for the reception of which an extensive and elegant gallery was lately built. Numerous other libraries, and valuable collections of pieces of ancient sculpture, curiosities, &c., have been added, by gift or purchase, rendering the British Museum, at the present time, in books, manuscripts, sculpture, antiquities, and the curiosities of art and nature, one of the richest in Europe. The immense number, and splendid binding, of the works in the royal library, amounting to 60,000 volumes, many of them most costly and exquisite, are in harmony with the fitting-up of the apartment in which they are placed, and, with the books in the other apartments, form a collection of nearly 170,000 printed volumes, and 20,000 volumes of manuscripts. The expenditure of the entire establishment in 1841, was £33,700.

The London Institution was formed in the autumn of 1805, by the exertions of a few public-spirited individuals, as a public library for the more especial use of the city; and a charter of incorporation was obtained in Jan. 1807. The temporary house fixed upon for this purpose, until a suitable building could be erected, was, in the first place, the old mansion of Sir Robert Clayton, in the Old Jewry, and subsequently a house in King's Arms-yard, Coleman-street. In 1815, the present elegant building, which has the advantage of a peculiarly fine situation, in Finsbury-circus, was constructed, partly from the funds of the society, and partly from the voluntary contributions of such of its members as were friendly to the measure: the first stone was laid by the lord mayor, S. Birch, Esq., accompanied by the civic state officers, and the proprietors; and the edifice was completed and opened in 1819. The acquisition of a fine library, the diffusion of knowledge by means of lectures and experiments, and the providing for the subscribers a reading-room, furnished with the best English and foreign periodicals, are the principal objects of the institution; to accomplish which, nearly 1000 gentlemen and merchants subscribed 75 guineas each. The Red Cross-street Library was founded for Protestant dissenting ministers by Dr. Williams, about the year 1716, and, in consequence of gifts and purchases since that time, now contains about 20,000 volumes, for the most part on Theological subjects. Sion College, London Wall, is both a charitable and a literary institution. The building was originally an hospital for blind paupers, and, after passing through various hands, was purchased for the purpose of erecting Sion College, for the use of the London clergy, who were incorporated by Charles I. The purchase was made in consequence of the will of Dr. Thomas White, vicar of St. Dunstan's in the West, who left £3000 for the purpose. The library was the gift of the Rev. John Simpson, rector of St. Olave's, Hart-street, one of Dr. White's executors; but it was afterwards considerably increased, both before and after the fire of London, which destroyed a great number of the books. It now consists of a very extensive collection, like the preceding, chiefly of a Theological kind: all rectors and vicars within the city are fellows of the college.

LITERARY, PHILOSOPHICAL, AND OTHER LEARNED AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTIONS, &c.

The number of these is very great, and is constantly increasing. The first in consequence and antiquity are, the Royal Society, and the Society of Antiquaries, the meetings of both of which are held at Somerset House; and next in order are, the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, situated in John-street, Adelphi; the Royal Institution of Great Britain, Albemarle-street; the Royal Society of Literature, St. Martin's-place; and the London Institution, already described. Of other important societies, may be named, the Royal Asiatic Society, Grafton-street, Bond-street; the Shakspeare Society, St. Martin's-place; the Ælfric Society, Piccadilly; the Camden Society, Parliament-street; the Percy Society; the Parker Society; the Philological Society; the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, Bedford-square; the Numismatic Society, Tavistock-street, Covent Garden; the Statistical Society, Regent-street; the Art-Union, Trafalgar-square; the Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden-street, Hanover-square; the Royal Geographical Society, Waterloo-place; and the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane. There are likewise, the Entomological Society, Old Bond-street; the Horticultural Society, Regent-street; the Linneæan Society, Soho-square; the Royal Botanic Society, lately incorporated, and having gardens within the inner circle of the Regent's Park; the Botanical Society, Bedford-street; the Zoological Society, Hanover-square; the Geological Society, Somerset House; the Royal Agricultural Society of England, Hanover-square; the Society for the Promotion of Agriculture, Regent-street; the Royal Astronomical Society, Somerset House; the Philosophical Society; the Harveian Society, Edward-street, Portman-square; the Hunterian Society, Blomfield-street, Finsbury; the Phrenological Society; the Meteorological Society, Old Bond-street; the Scientific Society, Gray's Inn-square; the Royal Polytechnic Association, Cavendish-square; the British Association for the advancement of Science; the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George-street, Westminster; the Royal Institute of British Architects, Grosvenor-street; the Mathematical Society, Devonshire-street, Bishopsgate; and Gresham College, for which last a handsome building was erected in 1843, in Basinghall-street, at a cost of £5000. The chief Literary and Scientific Institutions are, the Russell Institution, Great Coram-street; the Mechanics' Institute, Southampton-buildings; the City of London Literary and Scientific Institution, Aldersgate-street; the Westminster, Great Smith-street; the Western, Leicester-square; the Crosby Hall, in the city; the Marylebone, Edward-street, Portman-square; the Cadogan, Sloane-street, Chelsea; the Eastern, Commercial-road; a second named the Eastern, Hackney-road; and institutions at Islington, Poplar, and Southwark. The Medical and Surgical Institutions consist of, the College of Physicians, founded in 1518, and removed in 1825 from the fine building by Sir Christopher Wren, in Warwick-lane, to Pall Mall East, where an elegant structure in the Grecian-Ionic style was erected by Sir R. Smirke; the Surgeons' College, Lincoln's-Inn-square, lately remodelled and enlarged; the Apothecaries' Company and Hall, Blackfriars; the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, Berners-street; the Medical Society, Bolt-court, Fleet-street; the Royal Medico-Botanical Society, Sackville-street; and the Westminster Medical Society, also in Sackville-street. The principal Theatres of Anatomy and for Medical lectures are, Dr. Bell's theatre, in Great Windmill-street; Grainger's theatre, Webb-street, in the Borough; and those of the several hospitals: and in different other places numerous miscellaneous lectures are delivered on various branches of medical science. The number of periodicals and newspapers published in London is about 280. The Public Exhibitions of Paintings are those of the Royal Academy, lately removed from Somerset House to the New National Gallery; the Gallery of the British Institution, Pall-Mall; the Society of Painters in Water Colours, Pall-Mall East; the New Society of Painters in Water Colours; the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street; the National Gallery; the various Panoramas, &c. Of these, The National Gallery was begun by the purchase, by government, of the Angerstein collection of pictures, subsequently to which were bought some of the finest paintings of Correggio, A. Caracci, Murillo, Titian, &c.; and twenty additional paintings were presented by Sir George Beaumont, including a beautiful landscape by Rubens. A long, though for the purposes of its erection inadequate, building, called the National Gallery and Royal Academy, was lately built on the site of the King's Mews, fronting Charing-cross. The gardens of the Zoological Society, the Colosseum, and other objects of interest in the environs, are noticed in the articles on the several suburban districts.

ANTIQUITIES.

The antiquities of London, which were for the most part destroyed in 1666, but were, till within the last 70 years, still numerous, have of late, through the extension of commercial enterprise, and the progress of modern improvement, externally almost disappeared. The MONASTERIES, forming the first class, amounted to nearly 50, and included the following orders. The Convents of Monks were those of St. Peter, Westminster, founded by Sebert, in 605, for Benedictines; St. Saviour, Bermondsey, by Ailwin Child, in 1082, for Cluniacs; St. Mary of the Graces, of Eastminster Abbey, Tower-hill, by Edward III., in 1359, for Cistercians; and the Chartreuse, or Charter-house, near Smithfield, by Sir Walter Manny, Knt., in 1371, for Carthusians. The Nunneries were those of St. Mary, Clerkenwell, by Jordan Briset and wife, in 1100, for Benedictines; St. John the Baptist Holywell, Shoreditch, by Richard I., in 1186 (refounded by Sir Thomas Lovel, Knt., in 1510), for Benedictines; St. Helen, Bishopsgate-street, by William Basing, in 1212, for Benedictines; and St. Clare, or Nuns Minoreesses, Minories, by Blanch, Queen of Navarre, in 1203. The Friaries were, the Franciscan, Newgate-street, by John Ewin, mercer, in 1225; Carmelite, Fleet-street, by Sir Richard Grey, in 1241; Dominican, by Hubert de Bourgh, in 1242, in Holborn, and refounded at Ludgate, by Archbishop Kilwarby, in 1279; Augustine, Throgmorton-street, by Humphrey Bohun, in 1253; and Crouched or Crutched, Hart-street, Tower-hill, by Ralph Hosier and Richard Laberne, in 1298. The Colleges were those of St. Mary Overy, or St. Saviour, Southwark, by Mary Overy, in 1000, for Augustine canons; St. Martin-le-Grand, by Ingelric and Girard, in 1056, for Augustine canons; Holy Trinity, Aldgate, by Queen Maud, in 1108; London College, Guildhall, by Peter Fanlone, Adam Francis, and Henry Frowich, in 1299; Corpus Christi, St. Lawrence, Pountney-lane, by Sir John de Pountney, in 1346; St. Michael's, Crooked-lane, by Sir William Walworth, in 1380; the Holy Ghost and St. Mary, College-hill, Thames-street, by Sir Richard Whittington, Knt., in 1418; and Jesus College, St. Paul's Cathedral. The Hospitals were those of St. John of Jerusalem, Smithfield, by Jordan Briset and wife, in 1100; St. Giles-in-the-Fields, Bloomsbury, by Queen Matilda, in 1102, for lepers; St. Bartholomew, Smithfield, by one Rayhere, in 1102; St. Thomas of Acon, Cheap-side, by Thomas Fitz-Theobald de Heily and wife, in 1170; St. Mary, Norton-Falgate, by Walter Brune and wife, in 1179, for Canons Regular; Knights Templars, Holborn, and afterwards Fleet-street, in 1185, refounded in 1245; St. Mary, Bethlehem, Bishopsgate-street, by Simon Fitz-Mary, in 1246; Elsnige Spital, London Wall, by William Elsnige, in 1329; St. Thomas, Southwark; St. James, Pall-Mall; and the Savoy, for lepers and infirm. The Priory was that of St. Bartholomew, Smithfield, by Rayhere, in 1102, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine. There was a Domus Conversorum, Rolls Chapel, Chancery-lane, founded by Henry III., in 1322, for Converted Jews. The Guilds, or Fraternities of Priests, &c., were those of All-hallows, Barking, Tower-street; Leadenhall, Leadenhall-street; St. Peter, Cornhill; St. Augustine's Papey, Camomile-street; Holy Trinity, Aldersgate-street, &c. There were also in London the five cells, or hermitages, of St. Catherine, Wapping; St. James-in-the-Wall, Cripplegate; St. Mary Rouncival, Charing Cross; the hermitage of St. James, opposite, and Our Lady of Pien, Westminster.

Of the above, the following only exhibit any external remains.—Westminster abbey, independently of its fine church and cloisters, still retains its beautiful chapter-house, the shell of the great hall, the abbot's residence (now the deanery), to which are attached the ancient kitchen, and the celebrated Jerusalem chamber; the abbey close, with numerous old buildings, and the exterior walls of its spacious gardens. The remains of Bermondsey abbey consist of a few fragments of walls, and the side of the east gate leading into Grange-walk. The Charter-house retains its original gateway in Charter-house-square, several of the monks' cells, now blocked up, part of the exterior wall surrounding the convent and gardens, and other inferior parts incorporated in walls and passages, &c. Clerkenwell nunnery has a few square yards of ancient stone wall next Corporation-row. "The Nonnes Quies," at St. Helen's, still exists, with the original nuns' seats of oak, and the ancient grating, through which they see divine service performed from the vaulted crypts beneath the hall of the nunnery. Of the nunnery in the Minories very considerable remains were discovered after a fire in 1797, and there yet exists a portion of the south, or street front of the abbey mansion, behind the houses in the Minories, besides much of its reverse front, now modernised into Haydon House. Blackfriars' has diminished to a solitary piece of dingy stone wall, standing at the top of a passage in Glo'ster-court, St. Andrew's Hill. Of the White friars' there are only a few fragments of wall behind the houses in Bouverie-street, partly incorporated with the buildings of the Bolt-in-Tun inn. The Augustine friars' has the fine nave of its church now occupied as a Dutch place of worship. Of Crutched friars' there remain Sir John Milbourn's almshouses, which adjoined the east end of the friary church; they have a curious tablet of the Virgin Mary, encircled by angels. The remains of St. Mary Overy's, which have partially given way to the approaches to new London bridge, consisted, besides the fine conventual church, of a considerable length of ancient stone vaulting, supporting a chapel, or hall; and various detached parts, in doors, archways, &c., in Montague-close. Part of the vaulting of Corpus Christi College remains between St. Lawrence Pountney churchyard and Suffolk-lane. The priory, or college, of the Holy Trinity, Aldgate, retains part of the south aisle of its Norman church, in a passage leading from Duke's-place to St. James' churchyard. The priory of St. Bartholomew the Great has the whole choir of its Norman church converted into the present church; also its east cloister, the shell of its dining-hall, with fine vaults beneath, and various smaller parts: the fratriy, galleries, prior's house, and various other remains, were destroyed by fire, in May 1830. Of the Temple, there remain the very beautiful church, recently renovated, with its circular vestibule, and the tombs of the ancient cross-legged knights, parts of the cloisters entering into it, and some old Norman arch-work incorporated in the walls of the Inner Temple Society's kitchen. The Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem retains its large and well-known gateway from St. John's-lane, the choir of the conventual church converted to the present parochial church of St. John (beneath which is the fine original crypt), with part of the chapels of the south aisle, and some smaller remains. St. Mary's Spital has the abutment of its principal gateway still standing at the corner of White Lion-street. Elsnige Spital has part of its entrance porch and steeple incorporated in the present church of St. Alphage. In St. James' palace may still be discerned many parts of the hospital. The Savoy church is that of its ancient hospital. Of the Domus Conversorum there still remains the old chapel, called the Rolls chapel; and the hall of the Holy Trinity, Aldersgate, now Trinity Chapel, is all that exists of the smaller monastic foundations.

Amongst the remaining metropolitan antiquities, which are too reduced in number to render a classification necessary, may be enumerated several large fragments of the Walls of London, at the back of Fore-street, in Cripplegate churchyard; in the burial-ground of St. Alphage, London Wall; at the back of the houses in Falcon-square; beneath the houses next Aldersgate, and in St. Botolph's churchyard there; at the back of the Old Bailey; at the Cock in the Corner, Ludgate; and at the back of George-alley, next Tower-hill: the last, which is by far the largest, oldest, and most perfect portion, is intermixed with an abundance of Roman brick. There are some crypts, or stone arched cellars anciently belonging to religious structures, or mansions: one of the finest specimens of the former was the priory of Lewes chapel, Tooley-street, lately demolished for the approach to the New London Bridge; there are also remains of another subterranean chapel, or church, beneath the house at the north-east corner of Leadenhall- street. The most remarkable crypts belonging to ancient mansions are the vaults beneath Gerrard's hall, Basing-lane, and at Crosby House, Bishopsgate-street; the great hall, with much of the superstructure, of the latter princely residence is also standing, and may rank as the finest example of domestic architecture in London. The churches which, either wholly or in part, exhibit good specimens of ancient building, and were not conventual, are, Bow church, Cheapside, which still retains its Norman crypt; and St. Sepulchre's, which possesses a beautiful groined avenue from Snow-hill. There are also various ancient parts, or incorporations, deserving notice in the churches of St. Olave, Hart-street; St. Giles, Cripplegate; St. Andrew Under-Shaft, &c. Of the ancient military architectural remains in various parts of the Tower of London, a brief account has already been given; besides which there were, until destroyed very recently, vestiges of camps and fortified earthworks at Highbury, near White Conduit-house and Battle-bridge, and at the descent from Gray's-Inn-lane, the Fleet ditch, &c. The remains of Roman roads connected with the metropolis are nearly obliterated, but may be still imperfectly traced by the diligent investigator, particularly in the old bridle way of Hagbush-lane, and in the continuation of Eald-street, through Shoreditch church-yard, by Bethnal-green, &c. The most celebrated remnant of antiquity, however, of all which appertains to London, is the supposed Roman milliary, in Cannon-street, denominated London stone, which, whether of Roman or British origin, was undoubtedly once of considerable magnitude, and is the first and oldest of our metropolitan antiquities. Of the Roman antiquities recently discovered, the most numerous, various, and interesting are those that were found in 1834, 5, and 6, in the course of the operations connected with the new thoroughfare across the heart of the city, from London bridge to the line of the old wall at Moorgate; adjoining St. Clement's church, in St. Clement's-lane, East Cheap, a tessellated pavement was met with, and in other places were discovered different kinds of earthenware vessels, specimens of Samian ware, coins, knives, and vast numbers of iron instruments. More lately, in pulling down the French Protestant church in Thread-needle-street, a very perfect piece of tessellated pavement was laid open, apparently at the depth of about nine or ten feet below the level of the floor of the church; the colours were remarkably fresh and glowing, and among them a deep yellow or tawny predominated. About the same time, a curious part of the old Roman wall of London was laid open, when digging for the extension of the Blackwall railway, behind the Minories. The wall proved to be $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet thick, and principally consisted of five courses of squared stones, regularly laid, with two layers of flat bricks below them, and two similar layers above; the stones were a granulated limestone, such as might have been procured from the chalk quarries of Greenhithe or Northfleet, and the bricks, which were evidently Roman, had as fine a grain as common pottery. In 1842-3, vestiges of Roman buildings were discovered in digging for the foundation of the Royal Exchange, and of the new French Protestant church, Aldersgate-street; and other relics were turned up during excavations in St. Paul's churchyard, Cheapside, Cornhill, Paternoster-row, Blackfriars, Cateaton-street, Lad-lane, &c.

EMINENT MEN.

Among the distinguished natives of the metropolis may be enumerated the following:—Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland, an English historian, who lived at the time of the Norman Conquest; Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury; Matthew of Westminster, a monkish historian of the fourteenth century; Geoffrey Chaucer, the first great English poet, born in 1328; Dr. John Colet, the founder of St. Paul's school, born in 1466; Sir Thomas More, author of a political romance, entitled "Utopia," lord chancellor under Henry VIII., in whose reign he was beheaded for denying the king's supremacy, born in 1480; John Leland, the English antiquary; John Stow, author of the "Survey of London," born in 1525; William Camden, author of the "Britannia," born in 1551; Edmund Spenser, author of the "Faery Queen," born about 1553; Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, the father of modern philosophy, born in 1561; Edward Alleyn, a celebrated actor, the founder of Dulwich College, born in 1566; Inigo Jones, the reviver of a taste for classical architecture in England, born in 1572; Dr. John Donne, a distinguished poet and divine, born in 1573; Ben Jonson, the dramatist, poet-laureate in the reign of James I., born in 1574; John Milton, the author of "Paradise Lost," born in 1608; Algernon Sidney, a republican writer, executed on account of the Rye-house plot, in 1683, born about 1617; Abraham Cowley, the poet, born in 1618; Sir William Temple, eminent as a statesman and public writer, born in 1629; Dr. Isaac Barrow, a celebrated divine and mathematician, born in 1630; Dr. Edmund Halley, celebrated as a mathematician and an astronomer, born in 1656; Daniel Defoe, the author of "Robinson Crusoe," born in 1660; Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury, a distinguished writer on morals and metaphysics, born in 1671; Colley Cibber, a dramatic writer and actor, poet-laureate to George I., born in 1671; Sir John Vanbrugh, an eminent architect and dramatist, born about 1672; Alexander Pope, the poet, born in 1688; George Lillo, a goldsmith, who wrote "George Barnwell," and other popular dramas, born in 1693; Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield, distinguished as a statesman and a cultivator of polite literature, born in 1694; William Hogarth, the painter, born in 1698; Dr. John Jortin, a learned theological writer, born in 1698; Dr. Philip Doddridge, an eminent dissenting divine and scripture commentator, born in 1702; John Dollond, the inventor of an achromatic telescope, born in 1706; *Dr. T. in 1744; Sir William Jones, a celebrated Orientalist and juridical writer, born in 1746; the Hon. Anne Seymour Damer, born in 1748; Capel Loft, a poet and miscellaneous writer, born in 1751; Dr. John Milner, a learned Catholic prelate, born in 1752; Sir Samuel Romilly, distinguished as a lawyer and a statesman, born in 1757; George Morland, the painter, born in 1764; the Right Hon. George Canning, born in 1770; and Lord Byron, the author of "Childe Harold," and other poems, born in the year 1788.

LONDON-COLNEY, a chapelry, in the union of ST. ALBAN'S, parishes of ST. PETER and ST. ALBAN'S, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Barnet. This place derives its name from its situation on the road to London, which crosses the river Colne here, by a substantial brick bridge of seven arches. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £65, and an excellent glebe-house; it is in the patronage of the Countess of Caledon, to whom also the impropriation belongs. The chapel is a handsome modern edifice, in the later English style, dedicated to St. Peter, erected by subscription, and grants of £400 from the Parliamentary Commissioners, and £500 from the Incorporated Society; the site was given by the Earl of Hardwicke, who settled £40 per annum towards the support of the minister. A national school was built by the late Earl of Caledon, and endowed with £20 per annum by the Countess Dowager of Hardwicke.

LONDON, LITTLE, a hamlet, in the parish, union, and hundred of ANDOVER, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 105 inhabitants.

LONDONTHORPE (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union and soke of GRANTHAM, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Grantham; containing 182 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage not in charge, united, with that of Great Gonerby, to the vicarage of North Grantham: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1795.

LONG BENTON, NORTHUMBERLAND.—See BENTON, LONG.—And all places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

Longborough (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of STOW-ON-THE-WOLD, Upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Stow; containing 625 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2903 acres, the surface of which is hilly, and the soil in many places stony, but a large portion of the land is of good quality: there is a considerable stone quarry, which the inhabitants claim the right of working, and the produce of which is extensively used for building. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Seasoncote united, valued in the king's books at £5. 15., and in the gift of Lord Leigh and Sir Charles Cockerell, Bart., the former having two presentations, and the latter one; net income, £221. The glebe consists of about 60 acres, to which there is a house. The church has been enlarged and repaired, and is now a neat edifice. A parochial school is supported by Lord Leigh and the vicar. The Fosse-way passes by the village, and near it is a long camp, from which the place is supposed to have derived its name.

Longburgh, a township, in the parish of BURGH-UPON-THE-SANDS, union of CARLISLE, ward, and E. division, of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Carlisle; containing 124 inhabitants.

Longcot, a chapelry, in the parish and hundred of SHRIVENHAM, union of FARRINGDON, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Great Farringdon; containing 504 inhabitants, and comprising 1865a. 1r. 23p. The tithes were commuted for land and an annual money payment in 1796. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary.

Longden, a chapelry, in the parish of PONTESBURY, union of ATCHAM, hundred of FORD, S. division of SALOP, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Shrewsbury; containing 371 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron, John Homfray, Esq.; appropriators, Portionists of Pontesbury. The chapel, dedicated to St. Ruthen, is a plain building, containing 140 sittings, of which 35 are free.

Longdon (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of LICHFIELD, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Lichfield; containing 1183 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from London to Liverpool, and comprises by admeasurement 4455 acres; the surface is undulated, and the scenery picturesque, being richly ornamented with fine wood. The pastures are of good quality, and the arable lands produce excellent wheat and barley. The Trent and Mersey canal passes about two miles northward of the church. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 5.; net income, £186; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Lichfield. The appropriate glebe contains $49\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and the vicarial nearly 29 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, and contains a beautiful Norman arch. Portions of this parish, and of Cannock, were in 1837 assigned as a district to the chapel at Gentleshaw, in Longdon. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and the Society of Friends have a very ancient burial-ground at Gentleshaw. A national school has been established. St. Mary's almshouses, ten in number, were founded by Mrs. Jane Cotton. At Castle Ring, a point in the Marquess of Anglesey's park at Beaudesert, are the remains of a British encampment.

Longdon, a township, in the parish and union of LEEK, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Leek; containing 405 inhabitants.

Longdon (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Upton; containing 598 inhabitants, of whom 520 are in the township. The parish comprises by measurement 3903 acres, of which 125 are common or waste: the road from Upton to Gloucester passes through the village, and the river Severn runs within a mile and a half. Sandstone of a very soft kind is quarried, and is used chiefly for fences. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Castle-Morton annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The tithes have been commuted for £845; the appropriate glebe contains 94 acres, and the vicarial 26, to which there is a glebe-house. The nave of the church was rebuilt in 1787, of brick; the tower and spire are of hard sandstone, and the former contains a peal of six good bells, recast in 1835. A school was founded in 1630, and endowed with land by Giles Godwin, Esq., now producing £34 per annum.

LONGDON-UPON-TERNE (ST. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, Newport division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Wellington; containing 99 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Wellington to Ercall Magna and Wem, and comprises 796a. 1r. 32p. The Shrewsbury canal passes through the village, and is here crossed by the river Terne. The living is a donative; net income, £182; patron and impropiator, Duke of Sutherland: the tithes have been commuted for £210. The church is a very small and plain edifice, built about 1776.

LONGFIELD (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of DARTFORD, hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Dartford; containing 128 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 17. 6.; net income, £193; patron Bishop of Rochester. The church contains the remains of the beneficent Archdeacon Plume, founder of the professorship at Cambridge which bears his name.

LONGFLEET, a tything, in the parish of CANFORD MAGNA, borough and union of POOLE, hundred of COGDEAN, Wimborne division of DORSET, 1 mile (N. N. E.) from Poole; containing 1281 inhabitants. A chapel has been erected, chiefly at the expense of Lord de Mauley, aided by a grant of £500 from the Incorporated Society.

LONGFORD (ST. CHAD), a parish, in the hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY; containing, with the townships of Alkmonton and Hollington, the liberty of Hungry-Bentley, and the hamlet of Rodsley, 1249 inhabitants, of whom 568 are in the township of Longford, 10 miles (W. by N.) from Derby. The parish comprises 5813a. 2r. 37p., of which the far greater portion is pasture, with a very small quantity of arable and woodland; the soil is in general fertile. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 8. 9.; net income, £260; patron, Earl of Leicester; impropiator, Rev. Dr. Longton: the glebe contains 200 acres, to which there is a house. The church has some portions in the Norman style, and three stone stalls in the chancel. In 1687, Sir Robert Coke, Bart., founded an almshouse for six persons, and endowed it with £55 per annum. In 1688, Lady Catherine Coke bequeathed land, producing £32 per annum, for education; and there is another school, supported by charity. The foundations of an ancient religious house may be traced at Alkmonton.

LONGFORD, a hamlet, in the parishes of ST. CATHERINE and ST. MARY-DE-LODE, Upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county, of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. E. by N.) from Gloucester; containing 409 inhabitants, of whom 170 are in St. Catherine's.

LONGFORD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, Newport division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Newport; containing, with the townships of Brockton and Stockton, 209 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Thomas Leake, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £144. 16. 6., and the glebe comprises 52 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, with a house.

LONGFORD, a hamlet, in the parish of BRITTFORD, union of ALDERBURY, hundred of CAWDEN and CADWORTH, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 76 inhabitants.

LONGHAM (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from East Dereham; containing 333 inhabitants. It comprises 1304a. 1r. 23p., of which 1045 acres are arable, 200 pasture, and 34 woodland: 300 acres of common were inclosed in 1814. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £30; patron and impropiator, Earl of Leicester, whose tithes have been commuted for £285. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains some remains of a richly-carved screen, separating the nave from the chancel. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is supported by the Earl of Leicester. Some traces of a Roman road exist, in removing part of which, in 1816, numerous skeletons were discovered.

LONGHAM, a hamlet, in the parish of HAMPRESTON, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, partly within the liberty of WESTOVER, S. division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, but chiefly in the hundred of CRANBORNE, Wimborne division of DORSET; containing 519 inhabitants.

LONGHIRST, a township, in the parish of BOTHAL, union of MORPETH, E. division of MORPETH ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. E.) from Morpeth; containing 210 inhabitants. The township is the property of the Duke of Portland and the Lawson family, and comprises 1702a. 2r. 34p., having chiefly a strong clayey soil, of which 1186 acres are in tillage, 420 in grass, and 96 covered with wood; the surface is flat, but is embellished with a little old wood and nearly 100 acres of plantations made by Wm. Lawson, Esq., and the district is rendered interesting from its containing that gentleman's handsome seat, called Longhirst House. This mansion, of which the first stone was laid in 1824, was erected under the direction of the present proprietor, Mr. Dobson being the architect, and is a highly-finished edifice in the Grecian style, presenting many excellent architectural features, and containing spacious apartments; the gardens are on the east, well sheltered, and have the Bothal burn running through them. A good sandstone quarry is wrought in the township, and belongs to Mr. Lawson, who also possesses a seam of coal, which is worked by drifting, for consumption on the spot; and there is likewise a shed for the manufacture of draining-tiles, &c. The tithes have been commuted for £251. 5.

LONGHOPE, UPPER and LOWER (ALL SAINTS), in the union of WESTBURY, duchy of LANCASTER, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Newent; containing 929 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2835 acres, of which 459 are common or waste. May Hill, within its limits, forms a landmark from the Bristol Channel. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £9. 7. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Archdeacon of Llandaff and the Rev. John Probyn : the tithes have been commuted for £396. 17., and the glebe comprises 17 acres, to which there is a house. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans ; and a school is partly supported by the clergyman.

LONGMEADOW, a hamlet, in the parish of BOT-TISHAM, union of NEWMARKET, hundred of STAINE, county of CAMBRIDGE ; containing 57 inhabitants.

LONGNEY (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WHEATENHURST, Upper division of the hundred of WHITSTONE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Gloucester ; containing 490 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the navigable river Severn, and comprises 1440 acres, whereof a considerable portion consists of orchard grounds, for the number of which the parish is noted. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown ; net income, £100 ; improPRIATORS, Trustees of certain charities. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1812.

LONGNOR, a parish, in the union of CHURCH-STRETTON, hundred of CONDOVER, S. division of SALOP, 8 miles (S.) from Shrewsbury ; containing 243 inhabitants, and comprising about 800 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to that of Lee-Botwood. The church was a free chapel belonging to the abbey of Haughmond, and was purchased of the vendees of the crown soon after the Dissolution, by the then proprietor of Longnor Hall. A school was endowed in 1774, with the interest of £200, by Sir Richard Corbett, Bart., who left other bequests for the benefit of the poor. This is the birthplace of the Rev. Samuel Lee, an eminent self-taught linguist, and professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge.

LONGNOR, a market-town and chapelry, in the parish of ALSTONFIELD, union of LEEK, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 10 miles (N. E.) from Leek, and 162 (N. N. W.) from London ; containing 485 inhabitants. The town is situated in the most northerly part of the county, near the source of the river Manifold ; and here a small canal terminates, which commences in the parish of Sheen, where it joins the Manifold. The market is on Tuesday : fairs are held on the Tuesday before Feb. 13th, Easter-Tuesday, May 4th and 17th, Whit-Tuesday, and a cheese-fair on November 12th. The living is a perpetual curacy ; net income, £102 ; patron, Vicar of Alstonfield ; improPRIATORS, the family of Crewe. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. Giles, is a neat edifice of stone, with a lofty pinnaced tower : in the cemetery is a tombstone to the memory of W. Billinge, a native of Fairfield, who, after long military service, died in 1791, at the age of 112 years. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans ; and a small school is endowed with about £6 per annum.

LONGPARISH (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of WHERWELL, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (S. W.) from Whitchurch ; containing 811 inhabitants, and including the tything of East and West Aston, Forton, and Middleton. It is intersected by the river Test, and comprises 4987*a.* 1*r.* 31*p.*, of which about 3206 acres are arable, 1500 woods, and the remainder pasture and meadow ; the surface is flat, and the soil gravelly. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8 ; net income, £226 ; patron and improPRIATOR, the Rev. Dr. Woodcock. There is a place of worship for Baptists ; and a parochial school is supported by the vicar.

LONGPORT, commonly styled a borough, in the parish of St. PAUL, CANTERBURY, but partly in the hundred of WESTGATE, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, contiguous to the eastern side of the city of Canterbury.

LONGPORT, a manufacturing district and considerable village, in the township and parish of BURSLEM, union of STOKE-UPON-TRENT, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD. This place was anciently called Longbridge, from a number of stepping-stones forming a causeway across the meadows ; but after the construction of the Trent canal, a branch of which passes through the district, its name was changed to Longport. On the banks of the canal are several wharfs ; and there are likewise some very considerable manufactories for earthenware, china, and flint glass. The new church of St. Paul, Burslem, stands on rising ground near this place ; and the Wesleyans have a place of worship here.

LONGRIDGE, a township, in the parish of NORHAM, NORHAMSHIRE, union of BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, county of DURHAM, though locally to the northward, and for electoral purposes attached to the N. division, of Northumberland, 4 miles (S. W.) from Berwick ; containing 68 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road between Berwick and Cornhill, and not far from the river Tweed, which separates England from Scotland. The township comprises about 470 acres of land. The tithes have been commuted for £122. 19. 6., payable to the Dean and Chapter of Durham.

LONGRIDGE, a chapelry, in the parish of RIBCHESTER, union of PRESTON, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 7 miles (N. E.) from Preston. This place is situated on the road from Preston to Clitheroe, near the river Ribble : freestone is quarried to a considerable extent, and weaving is carried on. A railway was recently opened to Preston, chiefly for the conveyance of stone from the celebrated "Delphs" in the vicinity ; the line is about seven miles long, and is on a slope the whole of the way to Preston. A festival, or guild, is held on St. Lawrence's-day ; and there are fairs on March 16th, April 16th, the Monday preceding Holy-Thursdasy, and Nov. 5th, for cattle, pedlery, &c. The living is a perpetual curacy ; net income, £107 ; patrons, Trustees of the late W. Hulme, Esq. : the glebe contains 40 acres, to which there is a house. A new tower was built to the church in 1841. Parochial schools are supported by subscription. Here was an ancient hospital for a master and brethren, dedicated to the Virgin Mary and Our Saviour.

LONGSHAW, a township, in the parish of LONG HORSLEY, union of MORPETH, W. division of MORPETH ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Morpeth ; containing 48 inhabitants. In the 13th of Henry VI. Richard Thornton and others had a grant of free warren here ; the estate is now, and has been for several centuries, the property of the Fenwick family. The township comprises about 670 acres, and is situated on the left bank of the Font, which at this place is finely covered with oak wood: the land consists of two farms; the soil is poor and clayey. There are some remains of the ancient residence of the Fenwicks.

LONGSTOCK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of STOCKBRIDGE, hundred of KING'S-SOMBOURN, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 1 mile (N.) from Stockbridge; containing 497 inhabitants. It comprises nearly 2000 acres, chiefly arable land. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 15.; patron and impropiator, the Rev. Sir John Barker Mill, Bart. The great tithes have been commuted for £433, and the vicarial for one of £315, and the glebe contains 2 acres, to which there is a house.

LONGSTONE, GREAT, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Bakewell; containing 521 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patron, Vicar of Bakewell; appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Lichfield. The vicarial tithes of Great and Little Longstone were commuted for land in 1810. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. Giles, contains several monuments to the family of Eyre, earls of Newburgh. A school is partly supported by an endowment of £20 per annum.

LONGSTONE, LITTLE, a township, in the parish and union of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bakewell; containing 174 inhabitants.

LONGSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE.—See STOW, LONG.—And other places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

LONGTHORPE, a chapelry, in the parish of St. JOHN THE BAPTIST, PETERBOROUGH, union and soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (W.) from Peterborough; containing 251 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

LONGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of PENWORTHAM, union of PRESTON, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Preston; containing 1719 inhabitants. It comprises 3132 acres, of which 146 are common or waste land. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £148; patron, L. Rawstorne, Esq. Rent-charges, as commutations for the tithes, amounting to £336, have been awarded, of which £328 are payable to the impropiator, and £8 to the curate of Penwortham. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A free school, now on the national plan, was founded and endowed in 1793, by Robert Moss, with a bequest of £400; the present room was built by subscription, in 1817.

LONGTON, a township, in the parish and union of STOKE-UPON-TRENT, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Newcastle-under-Lyme; containing 10,393 inhabitants. The township comprises an area of about four square miles, of which two-thirds are pasture, and the remainder arable, with a trifling portion of woodland. —See LANE-END, and STOKE.

LONGTOWN, a market-town, and the head of a union, in the parish of ARTHURET, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Carlisle, and 309 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 1990 inhabitants. This place is eminently indebted to the liberality and public spirit of the late Dr. Graham, who was mainly instrumental in raising it from the state of a poor village to its present condition. It is a small town on the south bank of the river Eske, over which is a stone bridge, near the junction of that river with the Liddel. The situation is pleasant and healthy, the houses are neatly built, the streets are spacious, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. Many of the lower class are employed in weaving for the manufacturers at Carlisle. The market, originally held on Thursday, is almost disused, except for provisions; but there is another on Monday, principally for bacon and butter. A fair takes place on the Thursday before Whit-Sunday, for horses; and there are statute-fairs on the Thursday in Whitsun-week, and the Thursday in Martinmas, for hiring servants. The county magistrates hold a meeting on the last Thursday in every month; and courts leet and baron are held at Easter and Michaelmas, at the former of which constables are appointed. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. In 1754, Lady Widdrington gave £8 per annum for a schoolmaster at Longtown; and a girls' school is supported by Lady Graham. The poor law union of Longtown comprises 14 parishes or places, and contains a population of 9722.

LONGTOWN, a chapelry, in the parish of CLODOCK, union of DORE, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 17 miles (S. W. by W.) from Hereford; containing 869 inhabitants. The chapelry is situated near the eastern base of the Black mountains, and not very distant from the junction of the Eskley and Olchon streams with the river Munnow; it contains 6104 acres, of which 307 are common or waste. Courts baron for the parish and hundred are held here annually. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £68; patron, vicar of Clodock; impropiator, Sir V. Cornwall, Bart. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £279, and the vicarial for £119. 2. 9. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. There are some few vestiges of a castle; and to the eastward is an eminence called Money Farthing Hill.

LONGWATHBY (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Penrith; containing 273 inhabitants. The parish is separated from that of Edenhall by the river Eden, over which is a bridge of three lofty arches, built in 1686; it comprises 1987a. 1r. 13p., whereof 844 acres are meadow and pasture, 74 old grass land, 490 arable, 24 wood, and the remainder common and waste. The village is situated on the road from Penrith to Newcastle, viâ Alston-Moor and Hexham. The living is annexed to that of Edenhall; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. The church was erected by subscription, in 1718, on the site of a more ancient edifice, and was thoroughly repaired in 1835.

LONGWOOD, a chapelry, in the parish and union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Huddersfield; containing 2418 inhabitants. The chapelry is situated on the north of the Colne, and comprises about 1000 acres, consisting chiefly of a narrow ridge rising rapidly from the banks of a rivulet, and extending for nearly three miles. An eminence called Slack, is supposed, from the discovery of a Roman altar dedicated to Fortune, a bath, and hypocaust, with a tessellated pavement nearly a yard in thickness, and other antiquities, dug up here some years since, to have been connected with the station of Cambodunum, by most antiquaries placed at Almondbury. The soil is generally gravel, with a slight mixture of clay, and fine grit sandstone is abundant. The population is chiefly employed in the manufacture of woollen-cloth, for which there are several scribbling and fulling mills, and also in the making of fancy goods, which is carried on extensively. The village is neatly built, and the surrounding scenery is in some parts boldly romantic: the road from Huddersfield to Manchester passes near it, as does the canal from Huddersfield to Ashton-under-Line. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Huddersfield, with a net income of £150. The chapel, now a district church, dedicated to St. Mark, is a small plain edifice, with a campanile turret, erected in 1749, by subscription, and containing 420 sittings. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Methodists of the New Connexion. A free school was founded and endowed in 1731, by William Walker; the annual income is about £100, in addition to the school-house.

LONGWORTH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of FARRINGTON, partly in the hundred of GANFIELD, and partly in that of Ock, county of BERKS, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Abingdon; containing 1063 inhabitants, of whom 550 are in the township. The parish comprises about 2200 acres, and, with the chapelry of Charney and the hamlet of Draycot-Moore, 4312a. 6p.: the river Isis bounds it on the north; the surface in general is flat, and the soil in some parts sandy, and in others clayey. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £27. 1. 10½.; net income, £682; patrons, Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford: the glebe contains about 60 acres. A school on the national plan is endowed with £7 per annum. At Charney is a chapel of ease, in the Norman style. In the parochial register is an entry, July 16th, 1625, of the baptism of Bishop Fell, whose father was rector of Longworth.

LONGWORTH, a township, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Bolton; containing 149 inhabitants.

Seal and Arms.

LOOE, EAST, a sea-port, incorporated market-town, and chapelry, having separate jurisdiction, in the parish of St. Martin, union of Liskeard, locally in the hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 16 miles (W.) from Plymouth, and 232 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 926 inhabitants. This place was formerly the only sea-port in Cornwall of any note, excepting Fowey, and hence was derived its name, Lo; in Cornish, signifying a port. In the reign of Edward III. it furnished twenty ships and 315 mariners towards the equipment of the English fleet for the siege of Calais. Its situation is beautifully romantic, on the eastern bank of Looe bay, near the mouth of the river Looe, over which is a narrow bridge of thirteen stone arches, 141 yards in length, and only six feet wide, built about the year 1400, and connecting the boroughs of East and West Looe. The sea view is very fine, and the land scenery richly diversified; the air is salubrious, and the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water. On the beach is a fort mounted with ten guns; and opposite to the town is Looe Island, or St. George's, which is much frequented by flocks of sea-fowl during the spring. The pilchard fishery is carried on to a considerable extent; the exports consist of tin, copper, and lead-ore, bark, timber, salt, pilchards, and pilchard oil; and coal, culm, and limestone are imported. Here is a custom-house. Much advantage is derived from the Liskeard and Looe canal, recently completed. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on Feb. 13th, July 10th, Sept. 10th, and Oct. 10th.

East Looe, which is a borough by prescription, received a charter of incorporation from Elizabeth, in 1587, which was confirmed by others of James I. and II. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, eight aldermen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, with a town-clerk, four serjeants-at-mace, and inferior officers. The borough, conjointly with Fowey, sent a representative to a great council at Westminster, in the reign of Edward I., but members were not returned to parliament until the 13th of Elizabeth, from which period two were sent; but the borough was disfranchised in the 2nd of William IV. The mayor, late mayor, deputy mayor, recorder, and deputy recorder, are justices of the peace. Sessions are held once or twice a year, at which prisoners charged with petty larceny are tried; and the charter of James II. gives the mayor and aldermen authority to hold a court of record every three weeks, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £100, but no business has been transacted in the court for many years. There is a common gaol for felons and debtors. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of St. Martin's. The ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Kyn, was rebuilt in the year 1806, and is a small handsome structure. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Wesleyans.

LOOE, WEST, a chapelry, and formerly a representative borough and market-town, in the parish of Talland, union of Liskeard, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 16 miles (W.) from Plymouth, and 231 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 616 inhabitants. This place, also called Port Pighan, a corruption of Port Vechan, the "Little Port," is situated on the bank of the river, opposite to East Looe, with which it is connected by a bridge. The town is of inconsiderable size; the harbour is small but commodious, and is defended by a strong battery; the river is navigable for vessels of 100 tons' burthen, and is in two branches just above the bridge. The pilchard fishery is carried on; and copper-ore is brought hither from the mines of Caraton, to be shipped in small vessels. A cattle-fair is held on May 6th. A charter of incorporation was granted by Elizabeth, in 1573, under which the municipal body consists of a mayor and eleven burgesses, who are empowered to choose a steward, with a town-clerk, and other officers; the mayor and steward are justices of the peace. A court leet, with view of frank-pledge, is held; and the charter authorises the mayor to hold a court for the recovery of debts under £5, every week, but no proceedings have taken place in the court for several years. There is a small prison, called the Dark house. The borough first sent members to parliament in the 6th of Edward VI., from which period it returned two representatives; but it was disfranchised by the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45. The chapel, dedicated to St. Nicholas, has been converted into a guildhall. There are places of worship for Independents and Bryanites. A mathematical free school, now conducted on the national system, was founded in 1716, by the trustees under the will of John Spreccott, Esq., who, in 1730, bequeathed the sum of £1000 for charitable uses; £30 per annum were appropriated for instruction, and the appointment of the master, after the death of the original trustees, was vested in the heirs of Charles Trelawney, Esq., and the proprietor of Trelawney House. In the vicinity of West Looe are the remains of a mound, supposed to have been on the line of a Roman road, and some vestiges of military works.

LOOSE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of MAIDSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of the county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Maidstone; containing 1416 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 960 acres, of which about 278 are arable, 149 meadow and pasture, 216 hop-grounds, and 48 wood. A very considerable improvement has been made, by the formation of a new road, at a great expense, in order to avoid two steep and dangerous hills over which the former road passed. Fruit, particularly filberts, is produced for the supply of the London markets. Three paper-manufactories employ about 190 persons; and here is a quarry of ragstone. A stream of water runs through the parish, which, in the space of two miles and a half, turns no less than twelve mills. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the appropriator; net income, £492. The church has been enlarged, and contains 80 free sittings. Two schools are supported by subscription.

LOPEN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CHARD, hundred of SOUTH PETHERTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 2 miles (S. by W.) from South Petherton; containing 506 inhabitants. The parish is situated at a short distance south of the road from London to Exeter, through Ilchester and Ilminster, and comprises by computation 476 acres, about two-thirds of which are arable, and the remainder pasture and orchard-grounds. The village lies between two hills, gently rising on each side of it, and moderately wooded. The manufacture of coarse linen is carried on to a considerable extent. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £77; patron and impropiator, Earl Poulett, whose tithes have been commuted for £200. The church, which was built before the Reformation, has been frequently repaired, and was enlarged in 1834, by the addition of an aisle.

LOPHAM, NORTH (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of GUILT-CROSS, W. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. E.) from East Harling; containing 815 inhabitants. It comprises 1957a. 1r. 8p., of which 900 acres are in the grounds of Lopham Park, one of the seats of the Duke of Norfolk, who is lord of the manor. The manufacture of linen is carried on. The living is a rectory, with that of South Lopham annexed, valued in the king's books at £17. 0. 5.; net income, £619; patron, George H. Barrow, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Mary Williamson, in 1696, bequeathed land, now producing £14 per annum, for apprenticing children.

LOPHAM, SOUTH (ST. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union and hundred of GUILT-CROSS, W. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from East Harling; containing 724 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1932a. 2r. 27p.; and within its limits is Lopham Ford, where the river Waveney and the smaller Ouse have their source, within a few yards of each other. The hemp and linen manufacture is carried on. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of North Lopham. The church is an ancient structure, chiefly in the decorated English style, with a Norman tower between the nave and chancel, and an enriched Norman arch on the south porch. Fifty-three acres of land were allotted, at the inclosure of the parish, to the poor, and for the repair of the church.

LOPPERWOOD, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW-FOREST, hundred of REDBRIDGE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 176 inhabitants.

LOPPINGTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of WEM, hundred of PIMHILL, N. division of SALOP, 3 miles (W.) from Wem; containing 612 inhabitants. The number of acres is 3305; the river Rhoden runs through the parish, the surface of which is in general flat. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £6. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £97. 18., and the vicarial for £117. 13.; the glebe comprises 24 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LORBOTTLE, a township, in the parish of WHITTINGHAM, union of ROTHBURY, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Rothbury; containing 114 inhabitants. This place is situated in the southern extremity of the parish, and upon the Lorbottle burn, which runs into the Coquet river. Lorbottle House is a neat mansion.

LORTON (ST. CUTHBERT), a parish, in the union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Brackenthwaite and Wythop, 635 inhabitants, of whom 394 are in the township of Lorton, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Cockermouth. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £76; patron, Earl of Lonsdale.

LOSCOW, with CODNOR, a township, in the parish of HEANOR, union of BASFORD, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Alfreton; containing 1738 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LOSTOCK, a hamlet, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Great Bolton; containing 625 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £2. 13. 6., payable to the Bishop of Chester.

A Sunday school is partly supported by an endowment of £8 per annum. Here are the remains of a very ancient mansion called Lostock Hall, bearing date 1560, and supposed to have been the residence of the Andersons; the royal arms, with the date 1590, are over the highest oriel window.

LOSTOCK-GRALAM, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Northwich; containing 574 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes westward of the place.

Seal and Arms.

LOSTWITHIEL (ST. BARTHOLOMEW), an incorporated market-town, and a parish (formerly a representative borough), having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the E. division of the hundred of POWDER, union of BODMIN, E. division of CORNWALL, 6 miles (S.) from Bodmin, 26 (S.W.) from Launceston, and $236\frac{1}{2}$ (W. S. W.) from London; containing 1186 inhabitants. This place is supposed by some to have been the Roman station called by Ptolemy Uzella, but this opinion does not appear to be warranted by the discovery of any certain traces of Roman residence. According to tradition, Lostwithiel was so named from having been the residence of Withiel, anciently earl of Cornwall, who had a palace at Penknight, now part of the borough, but in the parish of Lanlivery. In the reign of Richard I., the town was held under the earl of Cornwall, by Robert de Cardinham, who procured for it the privilege of a market; and Richard, Earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry III., made Lostwithiel, including Penknight, a free borough. His son Edmund, Earl of Cornwall, was a great benefactor to the town, in which he erected a shire-hall, an exchequer-office, and other handsome buildings, and ordered that the coinage and sale of the tin from the Cornish mines should take place at Lostwithiel only, and that all county meetings should be held here. These exclusive privileges, however, were not preserved inviolate, for, in 1414, the burgesses complained to the parliament that the men of Bodmin, Truro, and Helston, had caused tin to be sold at those towns, and that the prior of Bodmin had then recently procured the county meetings to be held at Bodmin; and although these grievances were redressed, Lostwithiel was gradually deprived of its exclusive advantages. In the summer of 1644, the place was the head-quarters of the parliamentary general, the Earl of Essex; previously to which a battle had been fought near the town, in which a body of the king's troops, under Sir Richard Grenville, was defeated by Lord Robartes. Dugdale asserts that the parochial church was profaned by the republican soldiers, and injured by an explosion of gunpowder.

The town is situated in a beautiful vale, on the banks of the river Fowey, and upon the road from Plymouth to Falmouth, and comprises two parallel streets, extending from the river to the foot of a steep hill; it is lighted and paved, and there is a good supply of water. The houses are chiefly built of stone, and covered with slate, which abounds in the neighbourhood. A regatta, with a ball, takes place in August; and assemblies are held in the winter. The wool-combing business affords employment to about twenty persons, and there is also a large tan-yard; but the chief trade consists in the conveyance of the iron-ores and mineral produce of the district to the port of Fowey, for shipment to Wales, and the bringing from that place of timber, coal, lime, limestone, sand, and other articles, for the supply of the adjacent country, in which the increased number of mines has added greatly to the commercial prosperity of the town. About three miles distant are the extensive mines of Lanescoot and the Fowey Consols, surpassing, in the variety, extent, and power of their machinery, all others in the kingdom, their produce amounting to an eleventh part of all the copper-ore furnished by the mines of Cornwall. The river Fowey, over which is a commodious bridge, is navigable to the quay at spring tides. The market is held on Friday; and the establishment of a corn market, free of toll, was recently attempted, but only a very small quantity is brought for sale: the market-house was erected at the expense of Viscount Mount-Edgcumbe, in 1781. Fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, are held by charter, on July 10th, Sept. 4th, and Nov. 13th, and on the Tuesday before the fourth Sunday in Lent, which last has been established only since 1829. The borough contains portions of the adjoining parishes of Lanlivery and St. Winnow. A charter of incorporation was granted by James I., in 1623, and renewed by George II., in 1738, under which the corporation consists of seven aldermen or capital burgesses, including the mayor and seventeen assistants, or common-councilmen. The mayor, late mayor, and recorder are justices of the peace; and the first-named is also coroner. A court leet is held annually by the mayor, when presentments are made concerning matters relating to the borough and the river; and all persons having boats on the river are required to yield suit and service to the court. There are petty-sessions generally on Friday. The quarter-sessions for the county, formerly held here in the summer, were, a few years since, removed to Bodmin. In the old shire-hall, erected by the Earl of Cornwall, and in which the stannary parliaments were held, is the original stannary court-room, with a prison adjoining, which is the only one in the county belonging to the stannaries. The town-hall is a neat building, with a prison underneath, erected in 1740, at the cost of Lord Mount-Edgcumbe. The borough first returned members to parliament in the 33rd of Edward I., and then ceased till the 4th of Edward II., from which time the returns were made regularly until the period of the Reform act in the 2nd of William IV., when it was entirely disfranchised.

The parish comprises 110a. 1r. 27p.; the soil is fertile, and there are quarries of stone and slate, but of very moderate quality. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £2. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe: the tithes have been commuted for £40, and some land purchased by royal bounty produces £42 per annum. The church is a handsome edifice, in the early English style, with a lantern tower at the west end, surmounted by a fine octagonal spire erected in the fourteenth century; it contains an ancient stone font, on the sides of which are sculptured grotesque figures and armorial bearings, rudely executed, and now much defaced. There are places of worship for Bryanites, Independents, and Wesleyans; also a school with an endowment of £5 per annum, and a national school for girls, supported by subscription. About a mile northward of the town, on the edge of a lofty hill, are the magnificent and venerable ruins of Restormel Castle, supposed to have been erected by Robert, Earl of Montaigne, and anciently the residence of the earls of Cornwall. At the commencement of the great civil war, although then ruinous, it was garrisoned for the parliament, and was taken by the royalist general, Sir Richard Grenville, in August, 1644. The remains are comprised within a circular area, 110 feet in diameter; the walls are nine feet thick, surrounded by a deep moat, and at the southern entrance, where was formerly a drawbridge, are two arches supporting a square tower; traces of suites of apartments and stone staircases are visible, and the whole, being richly overgrown with ivy, presents a very picturesque appearance. The chapel of the Holy Trinity, anciently appendant to the castle, is also in ruins.

LOTHERS, county of DORSET.—See LODERS.

LOTHERSDALE, an ecclesiastical district, in the parishes of CARLETON and KILDWICK, union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWXCROSS, W. riding of YORK; containing 955 inhabitants. This place is situated in a deep valley, and consists of several detached houses scattered irregularly on its acclivities. Some quarries are wrought, and a lead-mine is also in operation. A church was erected in 1838, on a site of one acre in extent, given by the Earl of Burlington, who is lord of the manor, and was endowed with £1000 by the Rev. Walter Levitt, vicar of Carleton, and a rent-charge of £20 on the glebe lands of the living: patron, the Vicar of Carleton. There are places of worship for Methodists and the Society of Friends; and a national school, erected in 1842, is partly supported by subscription.

LOTHERTON, a chapelry, in the parish of SHERBURN, Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Tadcaster; containing 564 inhabitants. This township, which includes all the eastern portions of the town of Aberford, comprises 1052 acres, whereof 57 are common or waste land; it is chiefly the property of R. O. Gascoigne, Esq., who is lord of the manor. Lotherton Hall, the seat of Capt. Wm. Ramsden, is a handsome mansion in a well-wooded demesne. The tithes have been commuted for £55. 18., of which £10 are payable to the vicar, and £45. 18. to the prebendary of Fenton in York cathedral.

LOTTISHAM, a tything, in the parish of DITCHEAT, union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of WHITESTONE, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 132 inhabitants.

LOUDWATER, a chapelry, in the parish and union of HIGH WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from High Wycombe. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £132; patrons, Trustees of W. Davis, Esq., by whom the chapel was built and endowed, in 1788.

LOUGHBOROUGH (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICES-

TER; containing, with the township of Knight-Thorpe and the hamlet of Woodthorpe, 10,170 inhabitants, of whom 10,025 are in the town, 11 miles (N.) from Leicester, and 109 (N. W.) from London. The name is probably derived from Lough, a lake, or a large extent of meadow occasionally overflowed. The noble family of Despenser, anciently possessors of the manor, obtained the grant of a market and fairs for the town. In 1564, the assizes for the county were held here, on account of the plague raging at Leicester at that time. From its size and population this may be considered the second town in the county, and it was so reckoned three centuries ago; it is a great thoroughfare, being situated on the road from London to Manchester, and having a principal intermediate station on the line of the Midland-Counties' railway. The buildings in general are of brick, and the fronts of many of the houses are modern; plaster, which is made of alabaster obtained from the quarries of Burton-on-the-Wolds, is mostly used for the floors of the lodging-rooms. The streets are paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. A neat theatre has been built, and there is a subscription library. The manufactures comprise hosiery of all kinds, cotton goods, and bobbin-net lace: the manufacture of what is termed patent Angola hosiery is confined chiefly to the town, for which article (originally invented by Mr. Richard Cartwright in 1792) a patent was obtained by the manufacturer, and the machinery is worked here under his license, giving employment to nearly 2000 persons. The Loughborough canal, which communicates with the Union canal, the Leicester navigation, the river Soar, and the lime-works at Barrowhill, has been very beneficial, and abundantly profitable to the proprietors; the shares, which originally cost but £120 each, have been sold for £4500, and are now worth £1800. There are some quarries of slate in the neighbourhood. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on Feb. 14th, March 28th, April 25th, Holy-Thursday, Aug. 12th, and Nov. 13th, for horses, cows, and sheep; March 24th and Sept. 25th, for cheese; and Nov. 14th, a statute-fair for hiring servants. An ancient cross and the old market-house having been removed, the market-place is now open. The town is under the superintendence of a constable, headborough, meadow-reeves, and street-masters, all chosen at the court leet and court baron of the lord of the manor, which are held annually. The petty-sessions for the hundred are held here weekly; and the town is the place of election for the northern division of the shire.

The LIVING, which is now divided into two parts, is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £40. 16. 3.; net income, £1848; patrons, Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge: the tithes were commuted for land in 1759. The mother church is a handsome edifice, in the later English style, and has a fine tower, built by subscription, towards the close of the sixteenth century. An additional church was consecrated Sept. 4th, 1837, and contains 840 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £500 in aid of the expense. The place was divided into two separate and distinct parishes under the 58th of George III., cap. 45, and the new church was endowed out of the revenues of the mother church. There are places of worship for General and Particular Baptists, Independents, the Society of Friends, Wesleyans, and Unitarians; and a Roman Catholic chapel, in the Grecian style, with a residence for the minister, has been erected from a design by Mr. Flint, at an expense of £2200. The free grammar school is endowed with land, originally bequeathed by Thomas Burton, in 1495, for the maintenance of a chantry in the parochial church, but appropriated at the Reformation to the endowment of a free grammar school, the repair of public bridges in the parish, and in aid of parochial rates; the rental is about £1400 per annum. The school comprises a Latin school, a school in which reading, writing, and arithmetic are taught, a national school for boys, and a similar school for girls. Two exhibitions, of £30 each, or one of £60, to Jesus' College, Cambridge, are attached to the institution: the school-house is a handsome building, erected near the churchyard in 1830, at an expense of £1500. A free school for girls was founded in 1683, by means of a bequest from Bartholomew Hickling, and endowed with land; and, in 1717, Joseph Clarke bequeathed land, directing the proceeds to be applied to instruction. Various benefactions have been made, at different periods, for apprenticing children, and for the poor, from which about £290 per annum are expended. The union of Loughborough comprises 24 parishes or places, 13 of which are in the county of Leicester, and 11 in that of Notts, and contains a population of 24,606. An urn of Roman construction was dug up a short time since by one of the monks of St. Bernard's convent, filled with Roman coins, some of which were of the year 244. Dr. Richard Pulteney, a distinguished physician and writer on botany, was born here in 1730. Alexander Wedderburn, an eminent lawyer, on his elevation to the bench as lord chief justice of the common pleas, was created Baron Loughborough, in 1780.

LOUGHRIGG, with RYDAL, a township, in the parish of GRASMERE, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ambleside; containing 343 inhabitants. It lies between the rivers Brathay and Rothay, from which it rises boldly into a lofty and romantic fell, commanding fine views of lake scenery.

LOUGHTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Fenny-Stratford; containing 361 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Chester and Holyhead road, and comprises about 1500 acres; the surface is gently undulated, and the soil is a strong clay. Limestone is quarried for the roads. About 150 women and children are employed in making pillow-lace. The London and Birmingham railway passes at a small distance from the church. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £228; patrons, Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge: the tithes were commuted in 1769, for 250 acres of land, to which a house is attached. The Baptists have a place of worship.

LOUGHTON (ST. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of EPPING, hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, 14 miles (N. E. by N.) from London; containing 1333 inhabitants. The parish contains 4000 acres, of which nearly one-half is uninclosed within Epping Forest, and the remainder is arable and pasture land in nearly equal portions; the surface is varied, and the scenery of pleasing character. Loughton Hall, once the residence of Queen Anne of Denmark, was destroyed by fire in December 1836, after having been completely reinstated by the present owner at a large expense; it was an Elizabethan pile of considerable beauty, and the front and ceiling of the inner hall, and the stone staircase, which were highly admired, were designed by Inigo Jones. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 3. 9.; income, £458; patron, W. Whitaker Maitland, Esq. The church, rebuilt in 1825, is a neat structure, and contains some old brass effigies of the Stonard family. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a national school. Almshouses were founded by a bequest of the late lady of the manor, Mrs. Ann Whitaker; and some tenements were purchased a few years since by subscription, for the deserving poor.

LOUGHTON, a chapelry, in the parish of CHETTON, union of CLEOBURY-MORTIMER, hundred of STOTTESDEN, S. division of SALOP, 9 miles (N. E. by E.) from Ludlow; containing 113 inhabitants. It comprises 1010 acres, of which 44 are common or waste. The tithes have been commuted for £85. Here is a small national school.

LOUND, with TOFT, a township, in the parish of WITHAM-ON-THE-HILL, union of BOURNE, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bourne; containing 225 inhabitants, of whom 58 are in the hamlet of Lound.

LOUND, a township, in the parish of SUTTON, union of EAST RETFORD, liberty of SOUTHWELL and SCROOBY, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 4 miles (N. by W.) from East Retford; containing 438 inhabitants. The township comprises by measurement 2112 acres; and the river Idle intersects it on the east. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LOUND (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, E. division of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Lowestoft; containing 412 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the Rev. George Anguish: the tithes have been commuted for £407, and the glebe comprises 22 acres, to which there is a house. A school is partly supported by the rector.

LOUTH (ST. JAMES), a market-town and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 28 miles (E. N. E.) from Lincoln, and 150 (N. by E.) from London; containing 8935 inhabitants. The ancient Latin name of this town was Original Corporation Seal.

Luda, from its vicinity to the Lud, a small stream formed by the junction of two rivulets. It was distinguished for the number of its religious houses previously to the Reformation, and the inhabitants were the first to resist the measures enforced by Henry VIII. for their suppression. In 1536 they took part in the insurrection called the "Pilgrimage of Grace;" and the prior of Barlings, their leader, the vicar of Louth, four other priests, and seven laymen, were executed at Tyburn in the following year. A destructive plague, which raged here in 1631, from April until the end of November, swept away 754 persons. The town is pleasantly situated in a fertile vale eastward of the wolds, bounded on the north and south by chalk hills, which command beautiful, extensive, and varied prospects. It is neat and well built, the houses being chiefly of brick and covered with tiles; the streets are paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water from several springs in the neighbourhood; the air is highly salubrious. Great improvements have been made of late years, among which is the addition of splendid frontages to many of the buildings in the principal streets, that of the King's Head hotel, from a design by R. Willoughby, attracting much admiration. Gas-works were completed in April, 1826, by a company of proprietors, with a capital of £9000, raised in £50 shares, under an act passed in 1825, in which year, also, another act was procured for lighting, paving, and watching the town, under the provisions of which many beneficial alterations have been carried into effect. Assemblies and concerts are held in the mansion-house, which contains an elegant suite of apartments, ornamented in the Grecian style; and a mechanics' institute, consisting of about 200 members, is well supported by the inhabitants, and has offices in the extensive building in Mercer-row, erected in 1833, and which also comprises a subscription newsroom and library, a savings' bank, and a large apartment for public meetings.

The town, from its position in the centre of a rich grazing and agricultural district, has continued to increase in the extent of its trade, the population having been more than doubled since the commencement of the present century. A carpet and blanket factory, a paper-mill, soap-house, and several tanneries and roperies, afford employment to a considerable number of persons; there are likewise a few worsted manufacturers and wool-staplers, and in the vicinity are extensive quarries of limestone, of which large quantities are burnt for farming purposes. At Riverhead, also, are spacious granaries, and coal and timber yards. In 1761 an act of parliament was obtained for cutting a canal between the town and the Humber, which was completed at an expense of £12,000; and by means of this mode of communication vessels of considerable burthen regularly trade with London, Hull, and several parts of Yorkshire, carrying out corn and wool, and bringing back coal, timber, iron, grocery, and other articles of commerce: in 1828, an act was passed for maintaining and improving this navigation. The wool market is a commodious building, opened in June, 1825. The general market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, and there is a market for sheep every Friday during the spring and autumn; the market-place occupies a large area in the centre of the town. Fairs are held on the third Wednesday after Easter, August 5th, and November 22nd. A charter was granted to the town by Edward VI. in the 5th year of his reign, who vested the government in a warden and six assistants. This was confirmed in the 5th of Elizabeth, who gave to the corporation "the manor of Louth and divers lands there," of which the annual value then was £78. 14. 4½, reserving to the crown the annual payment of £84; and their privileges were subsequently confirmed and extended by James I. The municipal government is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the borough is divided into two wards, and the number of magistrates is five. The general quarter-sessions for the southern parts of the division of Lindsey are held here and at Spilsby alternately; petty-sessions occur weekly in the mansion-house, and there is a court of requests for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The guildhall was erected at a cost of £1460, about the year 1815, when the old hall, a small square edifice, was taken down; and a sessions' house, gaol, and house of correction for the division of Lindsey, were built in 1827, at a considerable expense, near the site of the old prison; the sessions'-house is a handsome pile, with a portico of Roman-Doric architecture.

The parish is co-extensive with the borough, and comprises, exclusively of roads, 2560a. 3r. 25p., of which 1160 acres are arable, 527 meadow, 791 pasture, and 77 building-ground. The living of St. James is a discharged vicarage, with that of St. Mary's united, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Louth in the Cathedral of Lincoln (the appropriator), and valued in the king's books at £12; net income, £300. There were formerly two churches, dedicated respectively to St. Mary and St. James, of which the latter still remains, and is one of the finest structures in the county, exhibiting a remarkably good specimen of the later English style; at the east end is a window of seven lights, with very beautiful tracery, and at the western extremity is a lofty tower, with a rich crocketed spire, the building of which was completed about 1516: the spire, having been blown down some years ago, was rebuilt on the original plan. The burial-ground has not been used for upwards of half a century, the churchyard formerly belonging to the church of St. Mary being the general place of interment. A commodious vicarage-house was lately erected by the Rev. E. R. Mantell, vicar; and the hermitage attached to the old vicarage-house, with its cloisters, chapel, dormitory, &c. has disappeared. Holy Trinity church, erected in 1834, chiefly through the exertions of one individual, forms a handsome specimen of architectural display; it is a brick edifice, with an octagonal tower, contains 600 sittings, and cost £1800, raised by subscription, to which Isaac Smith, Esq., was a large contributor: the patronage is vested in certain Trustees. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Primitive and Association Methodists, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics.

The free grammar school was founded by Edward VI., and endowed with the property of some ancient guilds in the town, consisting of about 350 acres of land, with the tolls of markets and fairs; the income is nearly £800 per annum, of which sum one-half is appropriated to the master, one-quarter to the usher, and one-quarter to the maintenance of twelve women, who reside in almshouses under the schoolroom. By the 136th clause in the Municipal act, the warden and six assistants are continued a corporate body for the regulation of the school, and remain seized of all the lands, tolls, and tenements granted by Edward VI. Another school, founded in 1562, by Richard Hardie, is endowed with lands of which the income is about £90. A third, for boys, was instituted and endowed by the will of Dr.

Robert Mapletoft, Dean of Ely, in 1677, with a rent-charge of about £40 per annum: Thomas Espin, F.S.A., whose views of the cathedral, churches, and ruins in the county, are much admired, was master of the school for 30 years, and on his death, in 1822, was interred in a mausoleum near his late residence in the town. A national school was erected in 1818, an infants' school in 1835, and a British school in 1846. The poor law union of Louth comprises 88 parishes or places, containing a population of 29,588 persons: the workhouse occupies a pleasant site at the head of Broad-bank, in the immediate vicinity, and was built in 1837, at a cost of £6000, for the reception of 350 paupers. About a mile from the town is the hamlet of Louth-Park, containing 87 inhabitants, where are some slight vestiges of an abbey, founded by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1139, for monks of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; it was a cell subordinate to Fountains Abbey, in Yorkshire, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £169. 5. 6.

LOVEDALE, a township, in the parish and union of PENKRIDGE, E. division of the hundred of CUTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD.

LOVERSALL, a parish, in the union and soke of DONCASTER, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Doncaster, on the road to Worksop; containing 159 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2150 acres, of which 720 acres, with the manor and hall, are the property of the Rev. Alexander Cooke, and 1300 acres that of Miss Elizabeth Banks; the surface is varied, and the scenery is generally of pleasing character, and in many parts beautifully picturesque. Loversall Hall, the seat of the Rev. A. Cooke, is a handsome mansion of stone, in a well-wooded demesne; and St. Catherine's, the seat of Miss Banks, is a spacious and elegant structure, in the later English style of domestic architecture, embellished with porticos, turrets, and pinnacles, and beautifully situated on an eminence commanding extensive and richly-diversified prospects: in the grounds is St. Catherine's well, much celebrated in former times, and from which the house derives its name. The substratum abounds with limestone, which is quarried for the roads and for building. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron, the Vicar of Doncaster. The church, originally a small ancient structure, was enlarged in the reign of Henry VIII., by the addition of a chapel on the south side of the chancel, by the Wyrall family; it contains an altar-tomb over the remains of the founder; in the chancel is a recumbent effigy of a knight, probably one of the Middleton family, and in the churchyard is a table monument with a cross fleuri.

LOVINGTON (St. Thomas à Becket), a parish, in the union of WINCANTON, hundred of CATSASH, E. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Castle-Cary; containing 239 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 799 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £76; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Wells, whose tithes have been commuted for £215, and who have a glebe of 14 acres. John Whitehead, in 1715, bequeathed land, and James Clarke subsequently gave a house, for a school, the income of which is now about £12 per annum.

LOW ABBOT-SIDE, county of York.—See ABBOT-SIDE, LOW.—And all places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

LOWDHAM, SUFFOLK.—See PETTISTREE.

LOWDHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, S. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Nottingham; containing, with the townships of Caythorpe and Gunthorpe, 1483 inhabitants, of whom 819 are in the township of Lowdham. A road from Nottingham to Newark passes through the village, which is a polling-place for South Nottingham, and the hamlet of Gunthorpe is bounded by the navigable river Trent, near which Caythorpe is situated. A part of the population is employed in the manufacture of stockings. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 4.; net income, £276; patron and impropriator, Earl Manvers. The tithes, with certain exceptions, were commuted for land in 1765; appropriate tithes have been commuted under the recent act for a rent-charge of £26, and vicarial for £14; the vicarial glebe consists of about 104 acres, to which there is a house. The church has been enlarged. A chapel of ease at Gunthorpe was taken down about 30 years since. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, and Independents.

LOWE, with DITCHES, a township, in the parish and union of WEM, Whitechurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 1 mile (N. W.) from Wem; containing 98 inhabitants.

LOWER ALLITHWAITE.—See ALLITHWAITE, LOWER.—And all places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

LOWESBY (All Saints), a parish, in the union of BILLESDON, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Leicester; containing, with the chapelry of Cold Newton, 220 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 1. 5½.; net income, £98; patron and impropriator, Sir F. G. Fowke, Bart. Here is a small national school.

LOWESTOFT (St. Margaret), a sea-port, market-town, and parish, in the incorporation and hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, E. division of SUFFOLK, 44 miles (N. E. by N.) from Ipswich, and 115 (N. E. by N.) from London; containing 4647 inhabitants. The name of this town, anciently Lothnwestoft, or Laystoft, is derived either, as some suppose, from Lothbroch, a noble Dane, who obtained a part of the kingdom of the East Angles, and resided here; or, according to others, from Low-toft, a market, formerly held beneath the cliffs. In 1349, the great plague which devastated the continent of Europe, raged here with such fury that not more than one-tenth of the inhabitants escaped the contagion; and in 1547 and 1579 the same malady again prevailed. In 1605, it suffered severely from fire, and during the usurpation of Cromwell it was exposed to heavy exactions from its attachment to the royal cause. In 1643, Cromwell entered the town at the head of 1000 cavalry, and seizing several persons, sent them prisoners to Cambridge. In the war with the Dutch, two sanguinary engagements took place off the coast in 1665 and 1666, and two of the British admirals on that occasion were natives of Lowestoft. In consequence of the repeated occurrence of shipwreck, two lighthouses were erected by the Trinity House; one of which is on the cliff, built in 1676, and the other on the beach beneath. By steering in such a direction as to make the upper and lower lighthouses coincide, vessels are guided to a channel of a quarter of a mile in breadth between the holme and Barnard sands. A life-boat, which is maintained by voluntary contribution, has been stationed here for some years, and has been instrumental in preserving the lives of numerous shipwrecked mariners. There were formerly forts at the north and south ends of the beach, and at the Ness.

The town is situated on a lofty cliff, bordering on the North Sea, and consists principally of one well-paved street, nearly a mile in length, and of several small ones, which diverge from it obliquely, the whole being well lighted with gas. The houses, for the most part of brick, are neat and modern, and the inhabitants are supplied with water, chiefly from wells; the air is salubrious, especially for invalids, and the shore gradually descending to the sea, and having a firm bottom, is commodious for bathing. There are a theatre, a spacious assembly-room, and a subscription reading-room, and library. A bathing-house, fitted up with hot and cold baths, was erected by subscription in 1824, and is a handsome building of pebble stones, with rusticated angles, situated at the south end of the High-street, on the beach. The trade principally arises from the mackerel and herring fishery, in which about 80 boats, of from 40 to 50 tons' burthen each, are engaged, employing about 800 men. Large quantities of mackerel are sent to London; and about 40,000 barrels of herrings, many of which are forwarded to the metropolis and other home markets, and to Italy, are cured and smoked in houses at the base of the cliff, extending the whole length of the town. There are breweries, and rope and twine manufactories of considerable extent; and ship-building is carried on. Agreeably with the provisions of an act of parliament obtained in 1827, for forming a navigable communication between Lowestoft and Norwich, a cut was made from the sea to Lake Lothing near the town, which forms a harbour capable of receiving vessels of about 200 tons' burthen, opened by the admission of the sea, on the 18th of May, 1831. The market is on Wednesday, for grain and provisions; and toy-fairs are held on May 12th and October 10th. The county magistrates hold petty-sessions weekly, and manorial courts occasionally take place. The town having been part of the ancient demesnes of the crown, the inhabitants are exempted from serving on juries out of it. There are a commodious town-hall and a market-cross.

The parish comprises 1485 acres, of which 196 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £10. 1. 0½., and in the gift of the Bishop of Norwich: the tithes have been commuted for £351, and the glebe comprises 4½ acres, to which there is a house. The church is a large and handsome structure in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a wooden spire covered with lead, and a south porch; it contains a fine east window of stained glass, a large brass eagle, formerly used as a reading-desk, and a very ancient font. In 1698, a chapel of ease was rebuilt by subscription, near the centre of the town, but it has been lately used for parochial purposes, a new church having been erected by subscription in 1833, a handsome structure in the early English style, containing 1263 sittings, of which 939 are free. Here are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. A free school was founded and endowed in 1570, by Thomas Annot, with £16 per annum. Another school, on the east side of the High-street, was founded and endowed by Mr. John Wilde, in 1735; the bequests now produce £121 per annum, and the surplus, with other parish property, amounting in the aggregate to £271, is applied to the augmentation of the salary of the master of Annot's school, and other charitable uses. There are also schools supported chiefly by the vicar, and some bequests and institutions for the poor, among which are, a Fisherman's Hospital, a neat building below the cliff, erected in 1838, for six aged masters of fishing vessels; and a dispensary and infirmary, built in 1840. In the centre of the High-street are vestiges of a religious house, consisting of a curious arch, and cellars with groined arches, evidently part of an ancient crypt. The surrounding cliffs abound with organic remains, such as the bones and teeth of the mammoth, and the horns and bones of the elk; with cornua ammonis, and with shells and fossils of various kinds. The celebrated William Whiston, professor of mathematics at Cambridge; and Mr. Potter, the learned translator of Æschylus and Euripides, were vicars of the parish, as was also, for the space of 51 years, John Tanner, brother of the author of the Notitia Monastica; he greatly embellished the church, and purchased the inappropriate tithes for the benefit of his successors.

LOWESWATER, a parochial chapelry, in the union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Cocker-mouth; containing, with the hamlet of Mockerkin with Sosgill, 436 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises by computation 2480 acres, of which about 250 are woodland; there are, besides, 3000 acres of common or waste. The river Cocker runs along the deep and extensive vale of this place, which is bounded by lofty mountains, and contains the picturesque lake of Loweswater, part of Crummock Lake, and Scale Force; the last, the most stupendous cataract in this celebrated region, falls to the depth of 156 feet, and sinks into a great chasm surrounded by rocks overhung with trees. A lead-mine was lately opened. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £49; patron, Earl of Lonsdale. The chapel was erected by subscription, in 1827, on the site of an ancient edifice founded by a prior of St. Bees, to which parish this was formerly a chapelry. On a hill near Mockerkin, a school, now on the national plan, was erected in 1781, and endowed by Mary Mirehouse with £8. 8. per annum.

LOWICK, a chapelry, in the parish and union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Ulverstone; containing 374 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £90; patron, J. Everard, Esq.

LOWICK (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of THRAPSTON, hundred of HUXLOE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from Thrapston; containing 430 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 1955 acres. Drayton House, here, is a noble specimen of the prevailing style of architecture in the time of Henry VI. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 8. 11½.; net income, £308, with a glebe-house; patrons, the Sackville family: the tithes were commuted for land in 1771. The church is a handsome edifice, in the later English style, with a remarkably elegant tower crowned by pinnacles, and a large octagonal lantern; the windows exhibit some brilliant specimens of stained glass. There is a very splendid monument of richly-carved alabaster, to the memory of Edward Stafford, Earl of Wiltshire; and in the chancel is an elegant one to Lady Mary Mordaunt, Duchess of Norfolk, afterwards wife of Sir John Germain, Bart., of Drayton House, to whom also there is a monument of great beauty. Here was a chantry, or college, of Secular priests, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, founded by an ancestor of the above earl, about the time of Edward II., and granted at the Dissolution to Sir Edward Montague. A school was established by Sir John Germain, who endowed it with £50 per annum; and his second wife, Lady Elizabeth, further gave £40 per annum and a school-house.

LOWICK, a parish, in the union of GLENDALE, E. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Wooler; containing 1941 inhabitants. It comprises about 12,000 acres, of which the soil is chiefly a loamy clay: coal and lime are obtained. The village stands nearly in the centre of the parish, and consists principally of one irregular street of detached houses; the road from Wooler to Berwick passes a little to the west, in which direction also, about a mile from Lowick, is the hamlet of Barmoor. Barmoor Castle, the seat of Francis Sitwell, Esq., is a stately structure, beautifully situated amidst rising plantations. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church was rebuilt in 1794. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians; and a national school has been recently built on a site presented by Henry Gregson, Esq.

LOW-QUARTER, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-IRELETH, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5 miles (W.) from Ulverstone; containing 644 inhabitants.

LOWSIDE, or LOWHAND, a township, in the parish of WHICKHAM, union of GATESHEAD, W. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Newcastle-upon-Tyne; containing 1192 inhabitants. The ancient vill and manor of Farnacres, in this township, gave name to a resident family, and was, in Bishop Hatfield's time, held by Robert Umfraville, who, in 1428, obtained license to found a chantry in a chapel here, to which the Hospital of Frereside was annexed in 1439: after the Dissolution Farnacres was added, by purchase, to the Ravensworth estate. The village of Dunston is situated in the township.

LOWSIDE-QUARTER, a township, in the parish of ST. BEES, union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND; containing 299 inhabitants. The township lies between the river Ehen on the east, and the Irish Sea on the west, and contains the venerable remains of Egremont Castle, built soon after the Conquest, by William de Meschines, the first Baron of Copeland, and still exhibiting traces of its ancient strength and grandeur. The township comprises 1940 acres, of which 95 are common or waste. As commutations of the tithes, rent-charges have been awarded, amounting to £138. 6. 3., of which £132 are payable to an impropiator, and £6. 6. 3. to the curates of St. Nicholas', Holy Trinity, and St. James', Whitehaven.

LOWTHER (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 4½ miles (S.) from Penrith; containing, with the townships of Hackthorpe, Melkinthorpe, and Whale, 470 inhabitants, of whom 216 are in the township of Lowther. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Lowther, and comprises 3515 acres. It formerly contained a village of the same name, which was demolished in 1682, by Sir John Lowther, who soon afterwards built another, called New-town, where carpet and linen manufactories were established, but without success. Here is the princely mansion of Lowther Castle, the residence of the family of that name. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 7. 3½., and in the gift of the Earl of Lonsdale: the tithes have been commuted for £95, and the glebe contains 260 acres, to which there is a house. The church was almost wholly rebuilt in 1686, and the tower underwent considerable repairs and alterations in 1824. Richard Lowther, in 1638, gave £100 in support of a school; and subsequently, Mr. Allgood left a rent-charge of £10, for a similar purpose. Two schools for girls have together an endowment of 20 guineas a year.

LOWTHORP (ST. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of DICKERING, E. riding of YORK, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Great Driffeld; containing 164 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1960 acres of land. The ancient Hall, formerly the residence of the St. Quintin family, was taken down in 1826. The village, which is small, is to the south of the road from Driffeld to Bridlington. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £64; patron and impropiator, W. T. St. Quintin, Esq. In the church was a college, or chantry, for a rector, six chaplains, and three clerks, founded in the reign of Edward III., by Sir John Haselarton. The chancel of the church has long been without a roof, and within its ruinous walls grow two large ash-trees.

LOWTON, a chapelry, in the parish of WINWICK, union of LEIGH, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 6 miles (N.) from Warrington; containing 2150 inhabitants. It contains 1785 acres by admeasurement, of which about 250 are arable, 750 meadow, 735 pasture, and part of the rest wood. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £126, with a glebe-house; patron, Rector of Winwick: the tithes have been commuted for £107. The chapel is dedicated to St. Luke. A school is endowed with land producing £24 per annum.

LOXBEAR, a parish, in the union and hundred of TIVERTON, Cullompton and N. divisions of DEVON, 4½ miles (N. W.) from Tiverton; containing 144 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of Sir T. D. Acland, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £112, and there are 20½ acres of glebe. The church has a rich Norman doorway and a font in the same style. There was formerly a chapel at Leigh, in the parish. A small school is supported by subscription, for the children of the poor.

LOXHORE (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of SHERWILL, Braunton and N. divisions of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Barnstaple; containing 306 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$; net income, £177; patron, S. P. Bruce Chichester, Esq.

LOXLEY, a liberty, in the parish and union of UTTOXETER, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Uttoxeter.

LOXLEY (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, Snitterfield division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Stratford; containing 318 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by a detached portion of the county of Worcester, and comprises 1700 acres by admeasurement; the surface is in general hilly, and the soil partly a sandy loam and marl, and partly clay resting upon limestone, which is abundant. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £190; impropiator, J. Milward, Esq. The glebe contains 100 acres. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and a national school is supported by subscription. British and Roman coins have been frequently found. Charles I. slept at the old mansion-house of Loxley the night before the battle of Edge-Hill, and many of those slain in the engagement were buried in the churchyard here.

LOXTON (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Axbridge; containing 168 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1149 acres, of which 95 are arable, 741 pasture, 94 woodland, and 155 common; the soil is, to a considerable extent, a strong clay, and the principal article of traffic is Cheddar cheese. The village is situated close to the Mendip range of hills, from which fine views are obtained of the surrounding country. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 15. 5., and in the gift of Archdeacon England and the Rev. D. S. Moncrieffe, of whom the latter is incumbent: the tithes have been commuted for £183, and the glebe contains 65 acres. A school is partly supported by the interest of £100.

LOXWOOD-END, a hamlet, in the parish of WISBOROUGH-GREEN, union of PETWORTH, partly in the hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, but chiefly in that of BURY, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Horsham; containing 218 inhabitants. The chapel, erected about 1540, was nearly rebuilt and enlarged in 1822. The Arun and Wey Junction canal passes near the village.

LOYNTON, a hamlet, in the parish of NORBURY, union of NEWPORT, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 50 inhabitants.

LUBBESTHORPE, a chapelry, in the parish of AYLESTONE, union of BLARY, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Leicester; containing 83 inhabitants. The chapel is demolished.

LUBENHAM (All Saints), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S.

division of the county of LEICESTER, 2 miles (W.) from Harborough; containing 578 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Lutterworth to Harborough, and comprises 2700 acres: the Union canal passes along the eastern boundary. Part of the population is engaged in the manufacture of silk plush. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 5.; net income, £84; patron and impropiator, Richard Mitchell, Esq. Here is a national school; and £26 per annum, the produce of a portion of Gabriel Newton's charity at Leicester, are appropriated to the clothing of children.

LUCCOMBE, or LUCKHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Minehead; containing, with the hamlets of Doverhays and Horner, 580 inhabitants, of whom 40 are in the hamlet of West Luccombe. The parish comprises 3564 acres, of which 1343 are common or waste; the soil of the cultivated lands is richly fertile, the surface is finely undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by the river Horner, which flows through a romantic dell into the sea about a mile to the east of Porlock. The hill of Dunkerry, here, which belongs to the greywacke formation, rises to the height of 1700 feet. The substratum is chiefly a coarse red sandstone, much of it conglomerate, and in many places intersected with veins of limestone, sometimes in large masses, and frequently containing iron-ore; beautiful specimens of marble are found in the limestone quarries. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 3. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £365, and the glebe comprises 60 acres, to which there is a house. The church, an ancient edifice in the later English style, has been completely restored, and contains some monuments to the family of Worth, of Worth, near Tiverton, who have a manor-house near the church, and one to the Rev. Henry Bryan, rector of the parish, and chaplain to Charles II.

LUCKER, a parochial chapelry, in the union of BELFORD, N. division of BAMBROUGH ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Belford; containing 210 inhabitants. This place, anciently Loce, comprises about 1300 acres of good land; the surface is generally level, and the soil various: there are quarries of excellent lime and sandstone. The village, which is small, is pleasantly situated on the west bank of the Waren rivulet, which empties itself into the North Sea at Waren Mills. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £62, with a neat parsonage-house; patron, Duke of Northumberland; impropiator, Thomas Foster, Esq. The church, built in 1760, is a plain edifice with a bell tower. There is a national school.

LUCKINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish and hundred of KILMERSDON, union of FROME, E. division of the county of SOMERSET; containing 76 inhabitants.

LUCKINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MALMESBURY, hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Malmesbury; containing 329 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1625 acres: stone of good quality is quarried for building and for the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the family of Jones: the tithes have been commuted for £292. 15., and the glebe comprises 51 acres, to which there is a house. The church, a neat structure in the later English style, has been enlarged by the addition of an aisle, and the tower has been raised since its original erection. A school is partly supported by the interest of £100. There is a spring possessing medicinal properties, and in the neighbourhood are some barrows.

LUCTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (N. W.) from Leominster; containing 183 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the left bank of the river Lug, and intersected by the road from Ludlow to Kington, and comprises by measurement 1011 acres, of which about one-third is woodland, and the rest nearly equally divided between arable and pasture; the soil is partly clay, and partly loam, and limestone is quarried. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Governors of Lucton Free Grammar School (the impropiators), with a net income of £58: the tithes have been commuted for £135; the glebe comprises 20 acres. The free school was founded in 1708, by John Pierrepont, Esq., a native of the place, who endowed it with land and tithes producing an income which, in 1835, amounted to £1736; attached to it is an exhibition of £50 per annum for four years, at any college in Oxford or Cambridge. A parochial school is supported by subscription.

LUDBOROUGH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of LUDBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Louth; containing 321 inhabitants. It is situated on the road between Grimsby and Louth. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 19. 4½; net income, £388; patron, R. Thorold, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1774; the glebe contains between 300 and 400 acres, to which there is a house. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LUDDENDEN, a chapelry, in the parish and union of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (W. by N.) from Halifax. The chapelry comprises the township of Midgley, and the upper portion of that of Warley; the surface is boldly varied, rising into hills of lofty elevation, commanding extensive views, and the scenery is marked with features of rugged grandeur: stone of excellent quality is extensively quarried. The inhabitants are principally employed in various cotton, woollen, worsted, paper, and corn mills; and the Rochdale canal and the Leeds and Manchester railway, which latter runs past Luddenden-Foot parallel with the canal, afford facilities of conveyance. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, and rebuilt in 1821, at an expense of £3000, raised by subscription, is beautifully situated in a sequestered and romantic dell; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, crowned by pinnacles, and contains 1000 sittings. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Halifax; net income, £150, with a handsome parsonage-house, built in 1841. There are places of worship for Independents, and Wesleyans of the Old and New Connexion. The Rev. Dr. Watkinson, curate, in 1752, bequeathed a house and several cottages in Leeds, and six cottages in Hunslet, all now producing £30 per annum, for distribution in bread to poor widows; he also presented a complete service of communion plate of massive silver.

LUDDENHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of FAVERSHAM, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 2 miles (N. W. by W.) from Faversham; containing 235 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £385. 4., and the glebe contains about 2 acres. The church is in the early English style.

LUDESDOWN (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of NORTH AYLESFORD, hundred of TOLTINGTROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 5½ miles (W. by S.) from Rochester; containing 275 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 11. 3.; net income, £330; patron, J. A. Wigan, Esq.

LUDDINGTON (St. Oswald), a parish, in the union of GOOLE, W. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Crowle; containing, with the tything of Garthorpe, 982 inhabitants. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £382; patrons, the family of Lister. The tithes for the townships of Luddington and Garthorpe were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1796. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LUDDINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of OLD STRATFORD, union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 3½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Stratford; containing 122 inhabitants, and comprising 1071 acres. The navigable river Avon runs through the township. Here was formerly a chapel, of which the ruins are still visible.

LUDDINGTON-IN-THE-BROOK (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of OUNDLÉ, partly in the hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, but chiefly in that of POLEBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Oundle; containing 139 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1026 acres, of which 620 are in the Northamptonshire portion. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 9., and in the gift of Lord Montagu: the tithes, with certain exceptions, were commuted for land in 1807; the glebe contains 200 acres, valued at about £245 per annum.

LUDFORD, a parish, in the parliamentary borough and union of LUDLOW, partly in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, but chiefly in that of MUNSLÖW, S. division of SALOP; adjoining the town of Ludlow, and containing 300 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the roads from London to Ludlow, and from Bristol to Liverpool, and comprises about 1700 acres, of which 536 are in the Herefordshire portion. The river Teme flows by the church, forming at this place the boundary line between the two counties, and separating the parish from Ludlow; an old but substantial bridge crosses the stream, near to which once stood the monastery of St. John. Greywacke stone is quarried. Several fairs are held for horses and cattle, butter, hops, cheese, &c. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Miss Barker; net income, £105. The church is an ancient structure, much ornamented, and supposed to have been built in the reign of Henry I. An hospital for six persons was founded in 1672, by Sir Job Charlton, who endowed it with lands now let for £63 per annum; it was incorporated, and had a common seal, but the distinction has long ceased to exist. A saline spring rises at Saltmore out of the red marl, and is esteemed for eruptive and scorbutic complaints. During the Protectorship, Fox, the parliamentary general, seized the estate of Ludford Park, and resided at the mansion.

LUDFORD MAGNA (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, E. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Market-Rasen; containing 367 inhabitants. The parish, with Ludford Parva, comprises 3750 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 18. 4.; net income, £189; patron and impropiator, G. F. Heneage, Esq. The glebe contains 40 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is supported by subscription. Roman coins have been discovered in the neighbourhood.

LUDFORD PARVA (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, E. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Market-Rasen; containing 303 inhabitants. The living is a sinecure rectory; net income, £119; patron, Ayscoghe Boucherett, Esq. The church has been demolished.

LUDGERSHALL (St. Mary), with TETCHWYCH, a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by W.) from Brill; containing, with the hamlet of Kingswood, 566 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 16. 8.; net income, £259; patron, Rev. Thomas Martyn. Here was formerly an alien priory, a cell to the great hospital of Santingfield, in Picardy, and which, at the suppression, was given to King's College, Cambridge.

LUDGERSHALL (St. James), a parish, and formerly a representative borough and market-town, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of AMESBURY, Everley and Pewsey, and S. divisions of WILTS, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Andover, and 71 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 554 inhabitants. This place, once called Lurgeshall, and Lutgashall, was anciently of considerable extent, and is supposed to have been the residence of some of the Anglo-Saxon kings. A castle existed soon after the Norman Conquest, in which, about 1141, the Empress Matilda took refuge, in her flight from Winchester towards the castle of Devizes. No mention of the fortress occurring subsequently to the reign of Henry III., it is believed to have been dismantled shortly after that period, for the purpose of curtailing the power of the barons; but there are still some slight vestiges of it in a farm-yard in the vicinity. The town, which is small, occupies a delightful situation on the verge of the county. The market, on Wednesday, has long been disused; but there is a small pleasure-fair on July 25th. Ludgershall, which is a borough by prescription, sent representatives to all the parliaments of Edward I., to three of Edward II., and to three of Edward III.; between the 9th of Richard II. and the 9th of Henry V. no return was made, but from the latter period the returns were regular, until the 2nd of William IV., when it was totally disfranchised. A bailiff is appointed at the court leet held by the steward of the manor on Michaelmas-day, when two constables are also chosen.

The parish is situated on the road from Devizes to Andover, and comprises by measurement 1771 acres, of which 50 are coppice-wood; the soil is chalky in some parts, and in others a strong red loam; the surface is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into hills of moderate elevation. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 6. 8.; net income, £274; patron, Sir Sandford Graham, Bart. The church is in the early English style; and contains some very ancient monuments. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and schools are supported by subscription. The poor have the benefit of an estate producing £20 per annum. A few years since, the great seal of England used in the reign of Stephen was found in the vicinity.

LUDGVAN (St. Paul), a parish, in the union of PENZANCE, W. division of the hundred of PENWITH and of the county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Marazion; containing 3190 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the shore of Mount's bay, in the English Channel, and is intersected by the road between Penzance and Truro; it comprises 4544 acres by admeasurement, of which 1204 are common or waste. A kind of granite, peculiar to the locality, is quarried for building and for repairing the roads; and there are several mines, of which one is in operation. A fair is held in October. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £30. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Heirs of the last Duke of Bolton: the tithes have been commuted for £808, and the glebe contains $38\frac{1}{2}$ acres, to which there is a house. The church, which is ancient, has a Norman arch over the south entrance, and was enlarged in 1840, by the addition of an aisle; the tower is handsome, and forms a good landmark at sea. In the churchyard is an old cross. The Baptists, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, have places of worship; and a national school is supported. Remains of an earthwork are still to be seen, thrown up during the war in the reign of Charles I., across the road leading to Marazion, by the parliamentarians engaged in the siege of St. Michael's Mount. There are also some remains of Castleandinas, an ancient fortification, the diameter of which is 400 feet from east to west, and the principal ditch 60 feet wide; it occupies the summit of the highest hill in this part of the county, and commands fine views of the sea. At Collurian are the remains of a chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas; and on the same estate is a chalybeate spring. A Roman patera was found some years since on the glebe. Dr. Borlase, the learned antiquary, and historian of Cornwall, was rector of the parish for nearly fifty-two years, and was buried in the chancel of the church in 1772; and Sir Humphry Davy, late president of the Royal Society, whose parents were also buried here, resided in the parish in early life.

LUDHAM (St. Catherine), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of HAPPING, E. division of NORFOLK, 13 miles (N. E. by E.) from Norwich; containing 924 inhabitants. This place, after the dissolution of the abbey of St. Bennet at the Holme, to which the manor belonged, was given by Henry VIII. to the bishops of Norwich, who made the grange an episcopal residence. An accidental fire broke out on the 10th of August, 1611, and destroyed the greater part of the house, with many valuable books and manuscripts relating to the see; but the palace was restored and considerably enlarged by Bishop Harsnet, who built a chapel of brick, which, after the desertion of the place as an episcopal residence, was converted into a granary, and the remainder of the edifice into a farm-house, now called Ludham Hall. The parish is bounded by the rivers Bure and Thurne, and comprises 2977 acres, of which 1913 are arable, 959 pasture, and 40 woodland. The village had formerly a market and a fair, granted to Bishop Redman, in the reign of Elizabeth; the market is discontinued, but the fair is held on the Thursday and Friday after Trinity, chiefly for pleasure. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; patron and appropriator, the Bishop. The great tithes have been commuted for £640, and the vicarial for £300; the vicar's glebe is 31 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the chancel is divided from the nave by a richly-carved screen, and the font is elaborately sculptured. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; and a national school was erected in 1841. About £100, arising from land given to the poor at the inclosure, are annually distributed among them.

princes," and by the Saxons Leadlowe and Ludlowe, which last name, with a slight variation, it still retains, appears to have been distinguished for its importance prior to the Norman Conquest, when Robert de Montgomery, kinsman of the Conqueror, fortified the town with walls, and erected the greater part of its stately castle, which was his baronial residence till his death, in 1094. On the attainder of his son, Robert de Montgomery, the castle came into the possession of Henry I., who made it a royal residence, greatly enlarged and embellished it, and, having strengthened the fortifications, placed in it a powerful garrison, under the command of Gervase Paganell. This leader, in the following reign, having embraced the cause of Matilda, held it for a considerable time against the forces of Stephen, by whom it was besieged in person, assisted by Henry, son of the king of Scotland, who, being drawn up from his horse by an iron hook, was rescued from incarceration by the courage and address of the English monarch.

From its proximity to Wales, Ludlow was always a station of importance, and a strong garrison was constantly kept up in the castle, for the defence of the frontier from the incursions of the Welsh. In the reign of Henry III., an order was issued from the castle for all the lords marchers to repair to this place, attended by their followers, to assist Roger Mortimer, at that time governor, in restraining the hostilities of the Welsh; and, in the 47th of the same reign, Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, who had joined the confederated barons, assisted by Llewelyn, Prince of Wales, attacked the castle with their united forces, and having set fire to it, nearly demolished it. In the reign of Edward II., Roger Mortimer, a descendant of the former governor, having joined the discontented barons, was sent prisoner to the Tower of London, from which he contrived to effect his escape, and, in commemoration of his success, erected, in the outer ward of Ludlow Castle, a chapel, which he dedicated to St. Peter, and endowed for a priest to celebrate mass; but being arraigned for high treason in the reign of Edward III., he was publicly executed at Tyburn. In the reign of Henry VI., Richard, Duke of York, who then had possession of the castle, detained John Sutton, Lord Dudley, Reginald, Abbot of Glastonbury, and others, in confinement here; and issued from this place his declaration of allegiance to the king, which he also repeated some years after, on the defeat of Lord Audley, at Blore Heath; but, on his subsequent insurrection and attainder, the king laid siege to the castle, and having taken it, he stripped it of all its ornaments, and the town was plundered of every thing valuable by his soldiers; the Duchess of York, with her two younger sons, was taken prisoner, and confined for some time in one of the outer towers of the castle. After the death of the Duke of York, at the battle of Wakefield, the castle descended to his son Edward, Earl of March, afterwards Edward IV. The young king, Edward V., and his brother, the Duke of York, lived in the castle, under the superintendence and protection of Earl Rivers, till their removal by order of the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., to the Tower of London, where they were barbarously murdered. Prince Arthur, son of Henry VII., resided here after his nuptials with Catherine of Arragon, in 1501, and kept a splendid court till his decease in the following year. In the reign of Henry VIII., a kind of local government, called the "Council in the Marches of Wales," was established at Ludlow, consisting of a lord president, as many councillors as the prince chose to appoint, a secretary, an attorney, and four justices of the principality, the lord president residing in the castle. During the parliamentary war the castle held out for the king, under the command of the Earl of Bridgewater, but finally surrendered to the parliament; frequent skirmishes took place in the town between the contending forces, in one of which Sir Gilbert Gerrard, brother to the Earl of Macclesfield, was killed.

The remains of the CASTLE still exhibit traces of its original grandeur, and, from their elevated situation in the centre of a country abounding with beautiful and picturesque scenery, form an interesting and venerable ruin; they are on the summit of an eminence of grey-stone rock, overhanging the river Corve. The north front consists of massive square towers connected by a lofty embattled wall. The ancient fosse and part of the rock have been formed into walks, and were planted in 1772, with beech, elm, and lime trees, affording an extensive and delightful promenade. On the west is a precipitous ridge of rock parallel with the castle, and richly crowded with wood, intersected by a chasm, through which the river Teme pursues its course; and on the north and west sides is a deep fosse, cut in the solid rock, over which was a drawbridge, now replaced by one of stone, of two arches, leading to the principal entrance. The interior has a strikingly majestic appearance; on the right hand are the ruins of the extensive barracks which were occupied by the troops of the lords president of the marches; near the gate are the apartments of the warden and other officers, and on the left is the keep, a large square embattled tower of four stages, 110 feet high, with square turrets at the angles; the walls of this tower, which is of Norman architecture, are from nine to twelve feet in thickness. Opposite to the entrance gateway are the hall and state apartments, in the early and decorated English styles, now much dilapidated: in this hall was performed, by the children of the Earl of Bridgewater and others, the celebrated Masque of Comus, composed by Milton, and founded upon an incident which occurred to the family of that nobleman, soon after his appointment to the presidency. To the left are the ruins of the chapel, of which the nave and the beautiful Norman arch leading to the choir are the principal remains. Within the inclosure are several massive towers, among which are Mortimer's Tower, and that in which Butler, after the Restoration, composed several cantos of his Hudibras. Though irregular in their arrangement, and greatly dilapidated, these ruins, from the breadth of their masses, the bold projection of some portions, and the depth of the numerous recesses, possess striking features of solemnity and magnificence; and the luxuriant ivy by which they are partly concealed adds materially to the beauty of the remains, which hold a prominent rank among the interesting monuments of feudal grandeur for which the districts formerly constituting the marches are distinguished.

The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence near the confluence of the rivers Teme and Corve, by which latter it is bounded on the north-west, and across which a handsome stone bridge of three arches was erected by the corporation, in 1738. Over the Teme, which, after being joined by the Corve, describes a semicircle on the west and south sides of the town, is an ancient bridge, the entrance to which is under the arched passage of Broadgate, the only one remaining entire of the old town gates. Of the wall that surrounded Ludlow, begun in the 13th, and completed in the 32nd, of Edward I., part of the foundation only can be traced. From its elevated situation the town has a pleasing and cheerful appearance; the streets are spacious, and the houses in general handsome and well built. It is paved, and lighted with gas; and from the salubrity of the air, and the beauty and interest of the surrounding country, it is regarded as a desirable place of residence by numerous opulent and highly respectable families. A building has been erected for a reading-room and museum; and adjoining it is a large square edifice for public business, lectures, &c.: both are of brick with stone facings, and situated in Mill-street. There are a public subscription library, and two circulating libraries: assemblies are held in a suite of rooms in the market-house; and a small theatre is opened during the races, which take place in July, and are succeeded by a ball and public breakfast, given in the inner court of the castle. The trade is chiefly in malt: there are some corn-mills, a paper-mill, an iron-foundry, and a manufactory for woollen-cloth, flannel, yarn, and blankets, on the banks of the Teme; and the river Corve turns a mill for grinding bark used in a tannery, and gives motion also to some machinery for making cordage and sacking. The principal market-day is Monday, for grain; and there are smaller markets for provisions on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday: the market-cross is a neat modern building. The fairs are on the Monday before Feb. 13th, Tuesday before Easter, May 1st, Wednesday in Whitsun-week, Aug. 21st, Sept. 28th, and Dec. 6th; the first and last are large marts for butter and cheese, and the others are for hops, horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs.

The town appears to have had a CHARTER of incorporation at a very early period, which was confirmed and renewed by Edward IV., from whose reign till that of Charles II. it underwent several modifications; but in the time of William and Mary it was, on the petition of the inhabitants, restored to its original form. The corporation now consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the number of magistrates is seven. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 12th of Edward IV., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the right of election, by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, was extended to the £10 householders of an adjoining district, comprising an area of 1395 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the borough, at which the recorder presides, for the trial of all offenders. A court of record is held every Tuesday, under the charter of Edward IV., for the recovery of debts to any amount; also a court of requests for the recovery of debts under 40s. The corporation, as lords of the manor, hold an annual court leet; and petty-sessions take place weekly. The market-house, or town-hall, is a large plain building of brick; the guildhall, in which the quarter-sessions and other courts for the borough are held, is a neat and commodious edifice of modern erection; and the borough gaol, erected by the corporation, in 1764, in lieu of Goalford tower, an ancient prison and gate of the town, is a convenient building.

The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £160. The church, which was formerly collegiate, is a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, in the early and decorated English styles, with a noble square embattled tower, crowned by pinnacles: the nave is separated from the aisles by a series of six gracefully pointed arches, resting on slender clustered columns; the choir is lighted by five elegant windows on each side, and by a noble east window of large dimensions, on which is painted the legendary history of St. Lawrence; the oak-stalls are still remaining, and the roof of richly carved oak is preserved in the several parts of this sumptuous edifice. In the north transept is St. John's chapel, in which is some ancient stained glass, representing the history of the Apostles, and the legend of the ring presented to Edward the Confessor, as a prognostic of his death, by some pilgrims from Jerusalem. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The free grammar school was founded by Edward VI., who vested in the corporation the estate of the guild or fraternity of Palmers, in Ludlow, on condition that they should support this and other charities connected with that guild: there are two exhibitions, of £30 per annum each, to Balliol College, Oxford, for boys of the school, founded in 1704, by the Rev. Richard Greaves. A national school was established in 1813, with which a Blue-coat school has been incorporated; and from the funds of the latter a house was purchased and fitted up for the instruction of girls. Almshouses, adjoining the churchyard, were founded in 1486, by John Hosyer, who endowed them for thirty-three aged people: the present building was erected by the corporation, in 1758, at an expense of £1211. Four additional houses were founded and endowed by Mr. Charles Foxe. A workhouse and house of correction was endowed in 1674, by Thomas Lane, with land producing nearly £100 per annum; and there are numerous charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. The union of Ludlow comprises thirty-one parishes or places, twenty-three of which are in the county of Salop, and eight in that of Hereford, altogether containing a population of 17,521: the workhouse is a large stone building, at Granite Hill, to the east of the town. Adjoining the castle is Dinham House, a noble mansion of brick, belonging to the family of Clive, in which Lucien Buonaparte, towards the close of the late war with France, resided while in England. Among the religious establishments which flourished here in ancient times, was the college of St. John the Evangelist, founded in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and given, after the Dissolution, by Elizabeth, to the corporation for charitable uses, and the remains of which are divided into separate tenements; also a priory of White friars, founded about the year 1349, by Sir Lawrence de Ludlowe, Knt., and of which some vestiges may be traced in the environs without the Corn-gate. There are several mineral springs in the neighbourhood. Thomas Johnes, Esq., translator of the Histories of Froissart, Monstrelet, and other learned works; R. Payne Knight, Esq., author of an Analytical Enquiry into the Principles of Taste, and other works; T. A. Knight, Esq., author of various works on Horticulture; and Dr. Badham, the translator of Juvenal, were natives of the town.

LUDNEY, a hamlet, in the parish of GRAINTHORPE, union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N. E.) from Louth; containing 70 inhabitants.

LUDNEY, a hamlet, in the parish of KINGSTON, union of CHARD, hundred of TINTINHULL, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 50 inhabitants.

LUDWORTH, a township, in the parish and union of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chapel-en-le-Frith; containing 1476 inhabitants.

LUFFENHAM, NORTH (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Stamford; containing 478 inhabitants. It is pleasantly situated on rising ground, on the banks of the small river Chater, and comprises about 1900 acres, the surface of which is undulated, and the soil somewhat stony, but tolerably productive. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 0. 5.; net income, £624; patrons, Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge. The glebe contains about 50 acres, to which there is a house. The church, which is supposed to have been built in the reign of Edward III., and formerly contained a chantry, was struck by lightning in 1822, and part of the steeple damaged. A national school is supported by funds arising from an estate left by Archdeacon Johnson, formerly rector, and founder of Oakingham and Uppingham grammar schools; a very curious brass monument is erected to his memory in the church.

LUFFENHAM, SOUTH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Uppingham; containing 317 inhabitants. It is on the road from Stamford to Uppingham and Leicester, and comprises 1248a. 22p.; the surface is hilly, and the soil of moderate quality. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 12. 6.; net income, £423; patron and impropriator, Rev. James Bush. The glebe contains 60 acres, to which there is a house.

LUFFIELD-ABBEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of BUCKINGHAM, partly in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, and partly in the hundred of GREENS-NORTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Buckingham; containing 5 inhabitants. A Benedictine priory, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here about 1124, by Robert Bossu, Earl of Leicester. Falling into decay from the inadequacy of its endowment, it was suppressed in 1494, and annexed to the collegiate church at Windsor; but in 1500 was given to the abbot and convent of Westminster by Henry VII., who was then building the chapel still known by his name. In the reign of Edward IV. its possessions were valued at £19. 19. 2. per annum.

LUFFINCOTT (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of HOLSWORTHY, hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, Holsworthy and N. divisions of DEVON, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Holsworthy; containing 93 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £67; patrons, J. Venner and J. Spettigue, Esqrs.

LUFTON (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of YEOVIL, hundred of STONE, W. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (W.) from Yeovil; containing 21 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 7. 8½., and in the gift of Mrs. Farquharson, and the Trustees of the late Dr. Tatam, alternately: the tithes have been commuted for £102, and the glebe comprises about 30 acres, to which there is a house. The church is a plain edifice of very small dimensions.

LUGWARDINE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of RADLOW, union and county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Hereford; containing 690 inhabitants. It is intersected by the river Lug and the road from Hereford to Ledbury, and contains 2036 acres of a highly fertile soil. The living is a vicarage, with those of Little Dewchurch, Hentland, Llangarrin, and St. Weonard's annexed, valued in the king's books at £22. 7. 1.; net income, £929; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Hereford. A school is supported by a small bequest.

LUKE'S, ST., a suburban parish, in the Finsbury division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX; comprising the liberties of the City-road, East Finsbury, West Finsbury, Golden-lane, Old-street, and Whitecross-street; and containing 49,829 inhabitants. The earliest notice of this district occurs in its connexion with the "Eald" or Old-street, by which the Saxons designated the Roman military way from the western extremity of the metropolis, without the great Fen, which is stated to have given name to Fensbury, now Finsbury, and to Moorfields: this road is said to have extended from London Wall to Hoxton, and to have been continued through the churchyard of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and through the parish of Bethnal-green, to the Old Ford near Hackney. The southern part of the Fen was gradually raised by various deposits, and particularly by many hundred cart-loads of bones removed from the charnel-house of St. Paul's, by order of the Duke of Somerset, when Protector; whence it obtained the name of Bonehill (now Bunhill) Fields. A portion of the site was appropriated by the city as a cemetery during the plague in 1665, and is now a burial-ground. Another portion of the same fields was assigned for the practice of archery, by the corporation of the city of London, in 1498; it was subsequently let in trust to Sir Paul Pindar, and appropriated in 1641 as a place of exercise for the city trained bands. It is now inclosed by buildings, and is the property of the Hon. the Artillery Company, who, during the late war, formed a very efficient regiment, equipped at their own expense, and who still continue to muster occasionally, and have an armoury, a mess-room, and other apartments, forming a handsome and substantial building, in front of which is a spacious plot of ground for field exercise, which has obtained the name of the "Artillery Ground." In Golden-lane was the original playhouse of Alleyn, founder of Dulwich College, of which the front, bearing the royal arms, is yet remaining. St. Luke's was anciently part of the parish of Cripplegate, the church of which being found inadequate to the accommodation of the parishioners, an additional one was erected in Old-street by the commissioners for new churches in the reign of Queen Anne, who assigned to it the present district, which, after the completion of the church, was laid out in numerous streets and squares, covered with buildings in every direction, and has become one of the most extensive and populous parishes in the suburbs of the metropolis. Peerless Pool, called by Stow "Perilous" Pool, and in 1743 converted into one of the largest swimming-baths in the kingdom, is still used for bathing. Adjacent to Bunhill-row was the lord mayor's "Dog-house," or kennel for the city hounds; and at Mount Mill, near the upper end of Goswell-street, now levelled and covered with buildings, was one of the bastions erected by the parliamentarians, in 1643, for the greater security of the metropolis.

The parish is well paved, lighted with gas, and supplied with water by the New River Company. The City of London Gas Company have one of their establishments in Brick-lane, in the parish; and there are various cooperages, breweries, an indigo-manufactory, and a rope-walk. Since the formation of the Regent's canal, extensive lime, timber, and coal wharfs have been established. The city basin, communicating with the canal, crosses the City road, and forms a grand dépôt for merchandise forwarded by water to every part of the kingdom; the principal carriers have large wharfs and warehouses on the banks. The living is a rectory not in charge; net income, £578; patrons, Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. The church, built in 1732, is a plain substantial edifice of stone, in the Grecian style, with a lofty steeple in the form of a fluted obelisk; the interior is neatly arranged, and the roof is supported by Ionic pillars separating the nave from the aisles; a new organ, of great power, was opened in March, 1844. In the churchyard are the tombs of several of the Caslons, eminent type-founders in the parish. St. Barnabas' district church, in King's-square, a neat edifice of brick, with a stone portico of the Ionic order, surmounted by a slender spire, was erected in 1823, by grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £12,853, and contains 1608 sittings, of which 917 are free; the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patron, the Rector. St. Paul's district church, in Bunhill-row, a handsome edifice in a simple pointed style, was consecrated July 10th, 1839. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Calvinistic Methodists: of these, the Tabernacle was erected by the Rev. G. Whitefield, founder of the Calvinistic Methodists, and in it he himself for some time preached: that belonging to the Wesleyans was built on the site of the City foundry (which was used for casting cannon so late as 1715), by the Rev. J. Wesley, founder of the sect, who was interred behind it in 1791. In front of the latter is Tindal's, or Bunhill-fields, burial-ground; the dues for interments in which are received by the corporation of London; the number of persons interred annually averages from 1200 to 1500, who are chiefly dissenters. Among the numerous distinguished nonconformist divines buried here, may be enumerated John Bunyan, author of the Pilgrim's Progress, who died in 1618; Dr. Williams, founder of the Dissenters' Library, in Redcross-street, who died in 1716; Dr. Isaac Watts, the poet, logician, and divine, who died in 1748; the Rev. Dr. Neale, author of the History of the Puritans, who died in 1765; Dr. Lardner, author of the Credibility of the Gospel History, who died in 1768; Dr. Gill, who died in 1771; Dr. Richard Price, an eminent mathematician, author of Reversionary Payments, &c., who died in 1791; the Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, who died in 1808; Dr. A. Rees, editor of the Encyclopædia, who died in 1825; the Rev. John Townsend, founder of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, who died in 1826.

The parochial school for boys was established in 1698, and that for girls in 1761; the school-house, in Golden-lane, was built in 1780. These schools were erected, and are supported, by subscription, and by a fund of £6500 three per cent. consols., which has arisen from benefactions and savings. The free school, founded by William Warral in 1689, has an endowment producing about £300 per annum; the Haberdashers' Company have a house and premises in Bunhill-row, in which a considerable number of boys are instructed; and a Lancasterian school for boys was established in North-street, City-road, in 1813, and one for girls in 1820. The Orphan working-school, in the City-road, was instituted in 1760, at Hoxton, by subscription, chiefly among the Protestant dissenters, and removed to this place in 1773, when the trustees erected a commodious building, upon a site of land containing six acres, which they purchased for that purpose; the revenue is £718 per annum, which, with annual subscriptions, is appropriated to the maintenance and education of orphan children. St. Luke's Hospital, for lunatics, was originally built on the north side of Moorfields, as an auxiliary to Bethlehem Hospital, and established on a system free from several of the objections to which that institution was then liable. The present spacious and elegant edifice was erected by subscription, at an expense of £55,000; it is of brick, ornamented with stone, and consists of a centre and two wings, 493 feet in length, of proportionate depth, and three stories high, exclusively of the basement story, and an attic in the centre and at the extremity of each wing. Almshouses for eight aged women were founded in 1650, by Mrs. Susan Amias; the income exceeds £220 per annum. Edward Alleyne, founder of Dulwich College, erected ten houses, in Pesthouse-row, now Bath-street; six were founded in the City-road by the Dyers' Company, in 1776; and six by the Girdlers' Company, which latter were rebuilt in 1741; and there are four houses founded by the Ironmongers' Company, in Mitchel-court, Old-street, which were rebuilt in 1811, pursuant to the will of Thomas Lewer, Esq. The French Hospital, in Bath-street, for the maintenance and support of French Protestants, was incorporated in the reign of George I.; it is a substantial building of brick, occupying three sides of a quadrangular area, the centre of which is laid out in gardens. The City of London Lying-in Hospital, originally instituted in 1771, in Shaftesbury House, Aldersgate-street, and subsequently removed to its present situation, is supported by subscription, and constitutes also a school of midwifery, to which female pupils only are admitted.

LUKE S, ST., a chapelry, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Midhurst.

LULLINGSTANE, formerly a parish, but now united to Lullingstone, in the union of DARTFORD, hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT. The living was a discharged vicarage: the church is demolished.

LULLINGSTONE (St. BOTOLPH), a parish, in the union of DARTFORD, hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 7 miles (S. E. by E.) from Foot's-Cray; containing 59 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Lullingstane united, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 8.; net income, £350; patron, Sir P. H. Dyke, Bart. The church, pleasantly situated in the park of Lullingstone Castle, the seat of Sir P. H. Dyke, is a small but neat edifice, of which the nave and chancel are separated by a richly carved screen supporting a rood-loft, in good preservation; the windows exhibit a series of Scriptural representations in beautiful stained glass, and the building contains several fine monuments. Roman bricks, coins, and military weapons, with part of a tessellated pavement, have been ploughed up.

LULLINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, 7 miles (S.) from Burton; containing 650 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2990*a.* 1*r.* 14*p.*, of which 1176*a.* 1*r.* 34*p.*, are in the township of Coton-in-the-Elms. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 11. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropiators, Rev. Sir W. N. Gresley, Bart., and W. Horton, Esq. The glebe contains nearly 57 acres, valued at £114 per annum, to which there is a house; the tithes of Coton have been commuted for £230. Parochial schools are supported by subscription.

LULLINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, 2½ miles (N. by E.) from Frome; containing 139 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron and impropiator, Richard H. Cox, Esq. The church has some Norman portions, with others of later style. A school is partly supported by subscription.

LULLINGTON, a parish, in the union of EASTBOURNE, hundred of ALCISTON, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 8 miles (S. E. by E.) from Lewes; containing 39 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the Cuckmere river. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 12. 11.; net income, £42; patron, Bishop of Chichester: the impropriation belongs to the Earl and Countess Amherst. The church, which is in the early English style, is the chancel of a former edifice, and only about eight feet square.

LULLWORTH, EAST (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of WINFRITH, Wareham division of DORSET, 6 miles (S. W.) from Wareham; containing 392 inhabitants. This place, at a very early period, was in the possession of the De Lolleworths, and subsequently of the Newburghs, descendants of the earls of Warwick, in the Norman line, who succeeded to the property in the reign of Edward I.; it afterwards came to the Howards, earls of Suffolk, one of whom, in 1588, on the site of an ancient castle, laid the foundation of the present noble castle of Lullworth, which was completed in 1641, by an ancestor of the Weld family. It is said to be from a design by Inigo Jones, and is a massive structure, forming an exact square, the sides of which measure 80 feet, and having at each angle a circular tower 30 feet in diameter; the main entrance is on the east, which is approached by a handsome flight of steps, and decorated with the arms of Weld, several fine statues, and two inscriptions commemorating the visits of George III. and his Royal Consort in 1789. The castle, which is situated on an eminence about a mile from the sea, was long the residence of the late Duke of Gloucester, and subsequently of Charles X., on his expulsion from the throne of France. Dr. Weld, the late proprietor, who was raised to the dignity of cardinal in the Church of Rome, received many exiles of the order of La Trappe at the period of the first French Revolution, and appropriated to them a farm, where they formed a religious fraternity, and remained till they were recalled at the general peace by Louis XVIII. The parish comprises 1939 acres, of which 331 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 14. 7.; patron and impropiator, Joseph Weld, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £100, and the vicarial for £80; the vicarial glebe consists of 65 acres, to which there is a house. The old church, a spacious and beautiful edifice, was taken down, with the exception of the tower, by Mr. Weld, at the commencement of the present century; and the present one, which is a much smaller structure, was erected in its stead. Near the castle is a Roman Catholic chapel, erected several years since, and fitted up with much taste and magnificence. A national school was recently erected, and a school for Roman Catholics is supported by Mr. Weld. The sum of £56 per annum, the bequest of Mrs. Dorothy Pickering, is yearly distributed to twelve poor Protestant widows or maidens. Within the parish are many vestiges of antiquity, especially barrows, in which human and other skeletons, rude urns, trinkets, &c. have been found, supposed to be British from the coarseness of the urns, and the absence of all Roman relics. On a lofty hill called Flower's Barrow, is a triple intrenchment denominated the "British Camp."

LULLWORTH, WEST (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, liberty of BINDON, Wareham division of DORSET, 8 miles (S. W.) from Wareham; containing 407 inhabitants. The village is entirely encircled with hills, with the exception of a narrow gorge, which winds southward to the sea. Lullworth Cove is a great natural curiosity, into which the sea flows, through a wide gap in the cliff, of sufficient depth for vessels of 100 tons' burthen, but the landing is not good, and is often dangerous. The surrounding rocks, rising to an immense height, are singularly undermined and perforated by the constant lashing of the waves, which keep up a continual and terrific roar. The "Arched Rock," about a mile from the Cove, has an opening about 20 feet high, through which the sea presents a peculiarly grand appearance. The living is annexed to the rectory of Winfrith-Newburgh.

LULSLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of SUCKLEY, union of MARTLEY, Upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Worcester; containing 120 inhabitants. It is situated on the right bank of the river Team, which bounds it on the north-east; and consists of 820 acres of productive land. The tithes have been commuted for £161. 16., of which £9. 16. are payable to the governors of Stourbridge grammar school, and the remainder to the rector of the parish, who has also a glebe of $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The chapel is dedicated to St. Giles.

LUMBY, with HUDDLESTON, a township, in the parish of SHERBURN, Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Ferry-Bridge; containing 247 inhabitants, of whom 174 are in the hamlet of Lumby. The township comprises about 1300 acres of land; the York and North-Midland railway passes through it, and a curved branch of a mile and a quarter diverges to the north, and joins the Leeds and Selby railway. The hamlet is situated on the road between Hambleton and Whitchurch, and about two miles south of the village of Sherburn.

LUMLEY, GREAT, a chapelry, in the parish and union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. S. E.) from Chester-le-Street; comprising 1321 acres, and containing 1796 inhabitants, who are principally employed in mines, this being the centre of an immense coal district. The village is seated on the east side of the river Wear, and about a mile to the south of Lumley Castle. The impropriate tithes, including those of Little Lumley, have been commuted for £314. 10. Church service is performed every Sunday in a licensed room; and there are two places of worship for Wesleyans, and a school. An hospital for twelve persons was founded in 1686, by Sir John Duck, Bart., of Durham, who endowed it with property now producing £40 per annum. The place is entitled to rents, under the will of Henry Smith, averaging between £40 and £50, which are annually distributed among the poor.

LUMLEY, LITTLE, a township, in the parish and union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E.) from Chester-le-Street; containing 381 inhabitants. The township comprises 1001 acres, of which two-thirds are arable land favourable to the growth of wheat, barley, and turnips. A coal-mine is in operation. On a fine eminence, sloping to the eastern bank of the river Wear, stands the stately castle of Lumley, erected in the reign of Edward I. by Robert de Lumley, an ancestor of the Earl of Scarborough; it is built of yellow freestone, in a quadrangular form, and has at each corner an octangular machicolated turret; but the eastern part only retains its ancient appearance. At the bottom of one of the avenues leading to the castle is a fine basin of water, a salmon lock, and a ferry over the Wear.

LUND, a chapelry, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Kirkham. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £192; patron, Vicar of Kirkham; appropriators, Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The chapel has been enlarged, and contains 150 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £150 in aid of the expense.

LUND (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BEVERLEY, Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Beverley; containing 419 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Beverley to Malton, and comprises by measurement 2950 acres, of which about 2000 are pasture, and 60 woodland, and the remainder arable; the surface is rather flat and open, and the scenery embraces some agreeable prospects. There are quarries of chalk-stone, which is burnt into lime, and used for building and agricultural purposes. A pleasure-fair is held in the village on the third Thursday in Lent. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., net income, £188; patron, Charles Grimston, Esq.; impropiators, the family of Wood: the tithes were commuted at the inclosure, in 1795, for 146 acres of land to the vicar, and 185 to the impropiator. The church is a neat plain structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a south porch, and was repaired in 1828. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; and in the village is a school-house, built several years ago by the parishioners.

LUND, with CLIFF, a chapelry, in the parish of HEMINGBROUGH, union of SELBY, wapentake of OUSE and DERWENT, E. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Selby; containing 540 inhabitants. The township comprises about 2500 acres of land, of which 400 are open but fertile common; the greater portion of the soil is in the Bishop of Ripon's manor of Malvis. The hamlet is on the north side of the river Ouse, and a short distance to the west of the village of Cliff.

LUNDS, or HELBECCK-LUNDS, a chapelry, in the parish of AYSGARTH, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N.

riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Hawes; containing about 80 inhabitants. This place is about six miles in length, and three in breadth, and includes the hamlets of Birk-Riggs, Cam-houses, and Litherskew; it is chiefly grazing land, and the houses are scattered at considerable distances from each other. The source of the river Ure is here, at the point of division between the counties of York and Westmorland. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, about £75; patron, Vicar of Aysgarth.

LUNDY-ISLAND, in the hundred of BRAUNTON, N. division of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ leagues (N. W. by N.) from Hartland Point, and 4 (N.) from Clovelly. It is situated in the mouth of the British Channel, and is upwards of three miles in length, and one in breadth, containing about 2000 acres, of which not more than 400 are in cultivation; it is so defended by lofty and precipitous rocks, as to be inaccessible, except at a small beach on the eastern side, where is a landing-place, secured by the Isle of Rats. The more elevated ground, rising 800 feet above the level of the sea, commands extensive prospects of the English and Welsh coasts; and at the northern extremity of the island is a high pyramidal rock, called the Constable. Ruins exist of an old chapel, which was dedicated to St. Anne. From the quantities of human bones frequently ploughed up, and some remaining vestiges of ancient cultivation, there are evident proofs of its having been formerly much more populous. It is recorded that one Morisco, having been frustrated in a conspiracy to assassinate Henry III., made this his retreat, became the chief of a band of pirates, and for his crimes was executed here by command of the king; and also that Edward II., at one time during his disturbed reign, proposed retiring hither for safety from his rebellious nobles. Morisco's castle, situated near the south-eastern point, and originally a strong fortification, with outworks, was, in the parliamentary war, held by Lord Saye and Sele for Charles I.; and in the reign of William and Mary, the French seized it by stratagem, and maintained themselves in it a considerable time.

LUNE-DALE, a township, in the parish of ROMALD-KIRK, union of TEESDALE, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 11 miles (N. W. by W.) from Barnard-Castle; containing 339 inhabitants. This is a large township, including the hamlets of Laith Chapel, Grasholme, Thwing-garth, Birtle, Bow-bank, Carbeck, and Wemergill, and comprising by computation 21,680 acres of land. The greater part is a high tract of open moors, called Lune Forest, extending to the borders of Westmorland. The village is situated on the road from Appleby to Lonton, a short distance westward of the river Lune. At Laith is a chapel of ease to the parochial church. The tithes were commuted for land in 1811, under an inclosure act. A school is partly supported by an annuity of £10, paid by the trustees of the late Earl of Strathmore.

LUNT, a township, in the parish of SEFTON, union and hundred of WEST-DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Liverpool; containing 59 inhabitants. It lies to the west of the road between Liverpool and Ormskirk.

LUNTLEY, a township, in the parish of DILWYN, union of WEOLLEY, hundred of STRETFORD, county of HEREFORD; containing 130 inhabitants.

LUPPITT (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HONITON, hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (N.) from Honiton; containing 782 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5356 acres, of which about 2000 are common or waste. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the family of Bernard: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £140, and a modus is received in lieu of the vicarial; the glebe contains about 5 acres, to which there is a house. The church has a stone screen and font in the early English style. There are parochial schools in connexion with the National Society. Here are remains of the ancient residence of the Carews, who added a chapel to the mansion; and on the brow of a hill within the parish is an old fortification, called Dumpton Fort.

LUPTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-LONSDALE, union of KENDAL, LONSDALE ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale; containing, with the hamlet of Crowbrow, 285 inhabitants.

LURGASHALL, a parish, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 15 miles (S. by W.) from Godalming; containing 771 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the county of Surrey, and comprises 4857a. 3r. 31p., of which about 2269 acres are arable, 561 meadow and pasture, and 599 waste. Blackdown, a hill 800 feet above the level of the sea, is in the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of Colonel Wyndham: the tithes have been commuted for £450; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 10 acres. The church, which is in the early style, with later additions, has a tower surmounted by a shingled spire on the south, and contains a very fine font of Sussex marble.

LUSBY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of HORNCASTLE, E. division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Spilsby; containing 148 inhabitants, and comprising about 900 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 14., and in the patronage of Mrs. Brackenbury; net income, £200. The tithes were commuted for land, at the inclosure of the fens; the glebe contains 116 acres, to which there is a house. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LUSHILL, a tything, in the parish of CASTLE-EATON, union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Cricklade and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 43 inhabitants.

LUSTLEIGH (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of TEIGNBRIDGE, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (N. W.) from Bovey-Tracey; containing 311 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 2939 acres, of which 654 are common or waste; the surrounding country is celebrated for its rich and varied scenery, and the parish has a beautifully romantic appearance, the effect of which is greatly increased by the singularly fine and picturesque rocky valley called Lustleigh Cleve. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 7. 6., and in the gift of the Rev. Frederick Ensor: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe contains 36 acres, to which there is a house, lately rebuilt in a costly manner, and in the antique style. The church is one of the most ancient in the county, and has a very curious stone at the entrance, covered with characters which have attracted much attention; the interior contains three stone figures, one of which, in the style of a crusader, is supposed to represent Sir William le Prouz, and the other two, Lord Dynham and his lady. There is an endowed parochial school. In a lane near the church is "Bishop's Stone," a block of granite, five feet high, the remains of an ancient cross.

LUSTON, a township, in the parish of EYE, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Leominster; containing 445 inhabitants. It consists of 1667 acres of a fertile soil, and the road from Ludlow to Leominster passes through the village. The tithes have been commuted for £220, of which £215 are payable to the governors of Lucton free school, and £5 to the vicar of the parish. Here are some hop and fruit plantations.

LUTON (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD; containing, with the hamlets of Hyde, Leegrave, Limbury with Biscott, and Stopsley, 7748 inhabitants, of whom 5827 are in the town, 20 miles (S. by E.) from Bedford, and 31 (N. W. by N.) from London. The name of this place is a corruption either of Lea-Town, derived from the river Lea, which takes its rise in the neighbourhood; or of Low-Town, descriptive of the relative position of the town with the gentle eminences by which it is surrounded. At the Conquest it was held in royal demesne; and in 1216 came into the possession of Baron Fulk de Brent, who built a strong castle here. In the reign of Henry VI., the manor belonged to John, Lord Wenlock, a celebrated partisan in the contest between the houses of York and Lancaster, who erected a handsome sepulchral chapel on the north side of the church, and commenced building a stately mansion, the portico belonging to which is still standing in the park of Luton Hoo. The town is situated between two hills, and on the Lea: from the market-house, which stands in the centre, three streets diverge obliquely: the inhabitants are well supplied with water from the river. The manufacture of straw-plat is carried on to a very great extent, and the town is said to produce a greater proportion of that article than any other in the county: the proprietor of one of the establishments obtained a patent for making Tuscan grass plat, which is here wrought into hats and bonnets. There are two good malting-houses. The market, which is plentifully supplied with corn and with straw-plat, is on Monday; fairs are held on April 18th and Oct. 18th, for cattle, and there is a statute-fair in September. A court leet is held annually, under the lord of the manor, at which a high and two day constables are appointed.

The parish comprises 15,194*a.* 3*r.* 27*p.*, of which about 11,317 acres are arable, 2220 pasture, 831 wood, and 99 waste or common. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £35. 12. 1.; net income £830; patron, Marquess of Bute, to whom, with others, the impropriation belongs. The church exhibits some fine specimens of the decorated and later English styles; it has at the west end a handsome embattled tower of flint and freestone in chequers, with an hexagonal turret at each angle, and a doorway, the mouldings of which are peculiarly beautiful. There are some curious monuments, a monumental chapel, and a baptistry chapel of decorated character, with pointed arches terminating in elegant tabernacle work, and containing a stone font supported on five pillars. A church was erected in 1840 at East Hyde; and there are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyans. Benefactions for instruction, amounting annually to the sum of £36, are applied towards the support of a national school; and a Lancasterian school is maintained by subscription. At the principal entrance to the town are twelve almshouses, erected in 1808, for twenty-four widows. The poor law union of Luton comprises 15 parishes or places, 12 of which are in the county of Bedford, and 3 in that of Herts; with a population of 19,010. In the private chapel at Luton Hoo, the seat of the Marquess of Bute, is some fine carved screen-work, in the later English style, which originally formed the interior decoration of a chapel erected at Tittenhanger, by Sir Thomas Pope, about the middle of the sixteenth century. The Rev. John Pomfret, author of a poem entitled The Choice, and other popular pieces, was born here in 1668.

LUTTERWORTH (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 13 miles (S. by W.) from Leicester, and $89\frac{1}{2}$ (N. W. by N.) from London, on the high road to Lichfield, Chester, and Liverpool; containing 2531 inhabitants. This place was formerly noted for the peculiar vassalage of the tenants of the manor, who were obliged to grind their corn at one particular mill of the lord, and their malt at another, so lately as the year 1758, when they obtained a decision at the Leicester assizes empowering them to grind where they pleased. The town is situated on the small river Swift, which falls into the Avon; and at Gills corner, not far distant, the Midland-Counties' railway is carried through a tunnel 66 yards long, 25 feet wide, and 24 feet high. It is regularly built, and consists principally of one main street, from which some minor ones diverge; and the elevation of its site, and dry gravelly nature of the soil, render it peculiarly healthy. It is lighted by subscription, and paved by means of the proceeds of an ancient benefaction of land, producing about £200 per annum, under the management of two officers, called "Town Masters," who are annually chosen at the manorial court leet. The cotton and tammy manufactures were formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but the latter has been discontinued for many years, and the former declined about 1816; the present staple manufacture is coarse worsted hose, and a few ribbons are also made. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on the Thursday after Feb. 19th, April 2nd, Holy-Thursdays, and Sept. 16th, for horses, cattle, and sheep; the last is also for cheese.

The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £585. The church is a spacious and handsome structure, with a tower surmounted by four lofty pinnacles; it was repaired and beautified about the year 1740, and the whole interior renovated, with the exception of the pulpit, which is a fine specimen of the early English style, and possesses great interest, being that from which the great reformer Wycliffe first openly promulgated his doctrines. He was rector from 1375 to 1384, when he died, and was interred in the church; but, in the year

1428, his bones were disinterred pursuant to a decree passed at the council of Constance, and publicly burnt, and the ashes thrown into the river. His portrait is preserved in the church, as well as the chair in which he died, also the purple velvet communion cloth used by him; and a handsome monument was recently erected to him. The late Dr. Ryder, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, who was rector from 1801 to 1814, appropriated a library for the use of the parishioners, to be deposited in the church, where is a tablet to his memory. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A free school and almshouses were founded and endowed by means of a bequest of £200 from the Rev. Edward Sherrier; a school for girls is endowed with £12 per annum, by the late bishop; another, called "Mr. Pool's," is partly supported by endowment; and there is a national school. Richard Elkington, of Shallowell, by will dated May 29th, 1607, devised the sum of £50, vested some years since in land, which on sale produced £1000, now lent, in sums of £50, to tradesmen. The poor law union of Lutterworth comprises 36 parishes or places, 30 of which are in the county of Leicesters, 5 in that of Warwick, and 1 in that of Northampton; the whole containing a population of 16,039. In the reign of John, an hospital for a master and brethren, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was founded and endowed by Roise de Verdon, and Nicholas, her son: at the Dissolution it was valued at £26. 9. 5. per annum.

LUTTLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of HALES-OWEN, union of STOURBRIDGE, Lower division of the hundred of HALFESHIRE, Stourbridge and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W.) from Hales-Owen; containing 137 inhabitants, and comprising 427a. 1r. 3Sp., of a fertile soil.

LUTTON, or LUDDINGTON-IN-THE-WOLD (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of OUNDL, partly in the hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, and partly in that of WILLYBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Oundle; containing 187 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1479 acres, of which 93 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, with that of Washingley united, valued in the king's books at £21. 11. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Earl Fitzwilliam: the tithes of Lutton have been commuted for £220. 2. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is partly supported by the rector and curate.

LUTTON, EAST AND WEST, a township, in the parish of WEAVERTHORPE, union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N.) from Sledmere; containing 405 inhabitants. These places, called also Luttons Ambo, comprise together about 2130 acres: the villages, which are pleasantly situated, are distant from each other about a mile. At West Lutton is a chapel of ease; also a place of worship for Wesleyans. The tithes were commuted for land in 1801.

LUXBOROUGH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Dunster; containing 485 inhabitants. It comprises 3600 acres, of which 910 are common or waste. There are several quarries, the produce of which is converted into lime for agricultural purposes, and also applied to the repair of the roads. Iron-ore is found at Brendon hill, where mining operations have been recently commenced by Sir Thomas Lethbridge. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Cutcombe: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £141, and the vicarial for £115. A parochial school is supported by Sir Thomas. Within the parish are many tumuli, containing numerous urns, human bones, and ashes.

LUXULYON (ST. SYRICUS AND JULIETA), a parish, in the union of BODMIN, E. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from St. Austell; containing 1512 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 5354 acres, of which 555 are common or waste; the higher grounds command extensive views of the Channel and St. Blasey bay. Granite is extensively quarried, large quantities of which were conveyed from this place for completing the breakwater at Plymouth, and for the construction of Cardiff pier. Fairs are held in June and October. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; patron and impropiator, Sir J. C. Rashleigh, Bart. The great tithes have been commuted for £120, and the vicarial for £230; the glebe contains about 5 acres, to which there is a good house, built by the Rev. R. Gervays Grylls, who, in conjunction with the patron, supports a parochial school. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The stannary records were deposited in the turret of the church tower during the parliamentary war. At Rideaux is a Roman encampment.

LYDBURY, NORTH (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CLUN, hundred of PURSLow, S. division of SALOP, 3 miles (S. E.) from Bishop's-Castle; containing 908 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 9000 acres, and is intersected by the road from Ludlow to Bishop's-Castle; the soil is rich, the scenery picturesque, and the surface undulated. Good stone is quarried for building. The living is a vicarage, with that of Norbury annexed, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £551; patron and incumbent, Rev. J. Bright Bright; impropiator, E. Plowden, Esq.: the glebe contains 45 acres, principally situated at Norbury, and there is a glebe-house. The church is a very ancient structure. A school is conducted on the national system. In Lower Down are the remains of a strong encampment, of which the trenches are still very perfect; and a castle anciently stood here, belonging to the bishops of Hereford, one of whom was presented by a jury, in the reign of Henry III., for suffering the escape of a prisoner thence. Plowden, a distinguished lawyer, and author of the Commentaries, resided at Plowden Hall, in the parish.

LYDD (ALL SAINTS), a decayed market-town, and a parish, in the union of ROMNEY-MARSH, hundred of LONGPORT, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from New Romney; containing 1509 inhabitants. The town is situated at the extremity of the county, near the point of land which forms the bay of Dengeness. The market was on Thursday; a fair for pedlery is held on the last Monday in July. It is a corporation by prescription, being a member of Romney, one of the cinque-ports, and is governed by a bailiff, jurats, and commonalty; the bailiff is coroner, and the jurats are justices of the peace, with exclusive jurisdiction, and hold a general court of session. There is a small common gaol and house of correction. On the point Dengeness, a lighthouse, 110 feet in height, has been built, in lieu of an ancient one, and partly on the model of the Eddystone lighthouse, under the direction of the late Mr. James Wyatt, architect. The parish comprises by admeasurement 6700 acres, of which about 750 are arable, and the rest pasture and sea-beach. Denge Marsh, with Southbrooks, is situated wholly within the parish, and contains nearly 3000 acres, lying to the south of Wal-land Marsh, which comprises about 16,500 acres. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £55. 12. 1.: the great tithes have been commuted for £389. 11., and the vicarial for £1210. 9.; the glebe comprises 28 acres, to which there is a house. The church is a spacious edifice of different dates, but principally in the early English style, with a fine tower in the later style, with crocketed pinnacles; it contains several monuments with brasses. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a national school.

LYDDEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of DOVOR, hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 5 miles (N. W.) from Dovor; containing 248 inhabitants. It is situated on the road between Canterbury and Dovor, and comprises 1396a. 1r. 4p., of which about 582 acres are arable, 308 meadow and pasture, 188 grass, and 273 wood. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 6.; net income, £104; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is principally in the early English style. There are some traces of an ancient monastery in a farm-house called Swenton, in the parish.

LYDE, a township, in the parish of PIPE, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, union and county of HEREFORD, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Hereford.

LYDEARD, BISHOP'S (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, W. division of the hundred of KINSBURY and of the county of SOMERSET, 5 miles (N. W.) from Taunton; containing, with the hamlet of Kenley-Bottom, 1295 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Minehead and Bridgwater road: red hard sandstone is quarried, of which the church and tower were built. A fair is held on the 5th of April. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 10.; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Wells: the great tithes have been commuted for £730, and the vicarial for £200. In the church are memorials to the families of Grobham and Lethbridge, and in the chancel is a monument to Mary, wife of Dr. Palmer, Warden of All Souls' College, and afterwards of Dr. Ralph Bathurst, President of Trinity College, Oxford. In the churchyard is an elegant cross. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a national school is attended by about 100 children. An almshouse, built in 1616, and having about £100 per annum, was left by Richard Grobham, for aged persons.

LYDEARD (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN,

W. division of SOMERSET, 8 miles (N. W.) from Taunton; containing 641 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Taunton to Dunster and Minehead, and comprises 2678a. 3r. 37p.; the surface is hilly, and the soil sand, occasionally mixed with clay. Limestone is quarried for agricultural purposes. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 6. 8., and in the gift of Robert Harvey, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and £42. 14. are paid to certain impropriators; the glebe contains about 70 acres, to which there is a house.

LYDEWAY, a tything, in the parish of URCHFONT, union of DEVIZES, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, DEVIZES and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 45 inhabitants.

LYDFORD (St. Petrock), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Lifton and S. divisions of DEVON, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Tavistock; containing, with Dartmoor Forest, 1213 inhabitants, of whom 933 are in the Forest. This place, anciently of some consequence, in 997 sustained severe injury from the Danes, who, after the destruction of Tavistock abbey, burnt forty of the houses in the town. In the reign of Edward the Confessor it is recorded as a borough, and had eight burgesses within the walls, and forty-one without: at the time of the Conquest, these had increased to 140, and the town was fortified, and considered of such importance as to be taxed on an equality with London. In 1238, the Forest of Dartmoor, and the castle of Lydford, were bestowed by the king upon Richard, Earl of Cornwall, and the manor now belongs to the duchy. Situated in the centre of a mining district, Lydford was the great mart for tin, then the staple commodity of the county; and there are still extant a few pieces of money coined at the mint here, which is said to have existed in the time of Ethelred II. In the reign of Edward I. it twice sent members to parliament; and, in 1267, a weekly market was granted, and an annual fair for three days. The stannary courts were held in the town till the close of the last century, and offenders against the stannary laws were tried and imprisoned in a castle here, the dungeons of which have been considered scarcely less frightful than those of the Spanish inquisition: until the reign of Edward III., a gaol delivery took place only once in ten years. The village now consists merely of a few cottages; the scenery which surrounds it is of the most beautiful description, and about a quarter of a mile southward is a small bridge of one arch, near which is a romantic fall of the river Lyd, the water rushing over the rugged bed of a narrow chasm of the depth of 80 feet. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall: the tithes have been commuted for £144, and there is a glebe-house. The only remains of the castle consist of the shell of the keep, situated on a mound at the eastern end of an area formerly surrounded by a wall and a ditch; the western side overlooks a narrow dell of considerable depth. In the latter part of the seventeenth century, the foundations of the town gates, and vestiges of the trenches, were visible.

Dartmoor Forest, a dreary but interesting waste, is said to comprise no less than 130,000 acres. Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, about the year 1800, built a mansion at Tor Royal, in its very heart, made extensive plantations, and much improved the land in the vicinity; and in 1808, at his instigation, a prison was erected for the reception of the numerous French captives that had previously crowded the prison ships at Plymouth. This immense building comprises, besides an hospital and dwellings for the petty officers, five rectangular edifices, each capable of holding 1600 men. The governor's house adjoins the prison; and at the distance of a quarter of a mile are the barracks for the guards. For the supply of the prison numerous tradesmen established themselves in the vicinity; a small town, called Prince Town, was soon formed, and a chapel built, but at the close of the war the place was almost deserted. The minister of the chapel, however, retains his appointment, and divine service is performed weekly. In 1819, an act was obtained for making a railway from Dartmoor to Plymouth. From the granite works with which it is connected, great quantities of stone are constantly forwarded to that port; and the rail-waggons, on their return, are chiefly loaded with lime, manure, and coal. An inland wharf has been constructed near the end of the railroad. At Two Bridges, to the east of Prince Town, a cattle-fair is held on the first Wednesday after August 16th, and is well attended.

LYDFORD, EAST (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of SOMERTON, E. division of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Castle-Cary; containing 194 inhabitants. The parish, which comprises by admeasurement 707 acres, is situated near the river Brue, and the road from Bath to Exeter skirts the village. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 9. 7., and in the patronage of Mrs. Rhoda Harbin: the tithes have been commuted for £106. 16., and the glebe comprises 31 acres, to which there is a house. The Old Roman Fosse-way skirts the western boundary of the parish.

LYDFORD, WEST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of CATSASH, E. division of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Castle-Cary; containing 368 inhabitants. The parish, which is washed by the river Brue, comprises 1802 acres by admeasurement; the manor and estates, with the exception of a few acres, are the property of E. F. Colston, Esq., in whose family they have been for several generations. Fairs are held in May and August. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 13. 4.; net income, £125; patron, Mr. Colston: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1827. A glebe-house has lately been erected by the Rev. Dr. Colston. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. There is a fine chalybeate spring called Hunt's Well. The Old Roman Fosse-way passes through the parish.

LYDGATE, an ecclesiastical district, in the chapelry of SADDLEWORTH, parish of ROCHDALE, Upper division of the wapentake of AGRIC, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Oldham, and 9 miles (N. E.) from Manchester. It is situated on the Stockton and New-Houses road, and on the line of the Huddersfield and Ashton canal; the surface is very hilly, the soil fertile in the valleys, and the scenery generally bold and romantic. There are numerous quarries of stone. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the spinning of cotton, for which there are several mills in the neighbourhood, and one in the village. The chapel, erected by subscription in 1788, is a plain but substantial building, with a campanile turret: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Rochdale, with a net income of £150. A day school, built in 1763, has a small annual payment on condition of gratuitous instruction being given to four children; and a Sunday school is in union with the National Society.

LYDHAM (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of CLUN, partly in the hundred and county of MONTGOMERY, but chiefly in the hundred of PURSLOW, S. division of SALOP, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Bishop's Castle; containing, in the English portion, 128 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 4000 acres, and the river Camlet rises in it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £463; patron, Rev. W. Oakley: the glebe contains 40 acres.

LYDIARD-TREGOZ.—See LIDDIARD-TREGOOZE.

LYDIATE, a township, in the parish of HALSALL, union of ORMSKIRK, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Ormskirk; containing 848 inhabitants. It is intersected by the Leeds and Liverpool canal. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics. Mr. Gore, in 1669, bequeathed estates now producing £95 per annum, for the poor.

LYDLINCH (St. Thomas), a parish, in the union of STURMINSTER, hundred of SHERBORNE, Sturminster division of DORSET, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Sturminster-Newton; containing 419 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2448a. 1r. 35p., of which 149 are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 5. 10., and in the gift of F. W. Fane, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £440, and those due from the parishes of West Parley and Horton for £60; the glebe contains 63 acres, to which there is a house. The church was thoroughly repaired in 1839, when a handsome carved roof of oak was added at the expense of the rector and the proprietors of land.

LYDNEY, county of GLOUCESTER.—See LIDNEY.

LYE, an ecclesiastical district, in the parish of OLD SWINFORD, union of STOURBRIDGE, Lower division of the hundred of HALFESHIRE, county of WORCESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Stourbridge, on the road to Birmingham; containing 6000 inhabitants. Coal-mines are in operation; nails, chains, anvils, and spades are made, and there are forges for rod-iron, &c. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Thomas Hill, Esq.; the income arises from lands and houses, producing about £150 per annum. The church and parsonage-house were built in 1813, and the living was endowed at the expense of Thomas Hill, Esq., of Dennis House. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Independents, and Unitarians; and a national school.

LYE, NETHER, a township, in the parish of AYMESTRY, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD; 6 miles (E. by N.) from Presteign; containing 149 inhabitants.

LYE, OVER, a township, in the parish of AYMESTRY, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of STRETTFORD, county of HEREFORD; containing 88 inhabitants.

LYFORD, a chapelry, in the parish of WEST HANNEY, union of ABINGDON, hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, 4 miles (N.) from Wantage; containing 147 inhabitants. It comprises 744 acres by admeasurement; the surface is flat, and the soil in some parts clayey, but in general a deep rich black earth. The tithes were commuted for land in 1801. An almshouse for ten aged persons was founded and endowed in 1603, by Oliver Ashcombe, Esq., chief proprietor of Lyford.

LYHAM, a township, in the parish of CHATTON, union of GLENDALE, E. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Wooler. It is situated on the road from Chatton to Holborn, and comprises 1661 acres, of which 492 are common or waste land. The Hetton burn passes on the west of the township.

LYME-HANDLEY, a township, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Macclesfield; containing 268 inhabitants. Lyme Hall, the principal seat of the family of Legh, is a quadrangular building of white grit-stone, of which the more ancient part was erected about the end of the reign of Elizabeth; the south and west fronts are of the Ionic order, from a design by Leoni.

Arms.

774, Cynewulf, King of the West Saxons, granted by charter "the land of one mansion near the west bank of the river Lim, not far from the place where it falls into the sea, to the abbey of Sherborne, that salt should be there boiled to supply the wants of the church." In Domesday book, Lyme is surveyed in three parcels, one belonging to the Bishop of Salisbury, a second to Glastonbury abbey, and the third to William Belet, one of the king's servants. Edward I. gave to it the privileges of a borough and port, and assigned it as part of the dower of his sister, Margaret, Queen of Scotland. It furnished Edward III. with four ships and 62 men for the siege of Calais, but afterwards became so impoverished, that in Camden's time it was little better than a fishing-town. During the civil war in the time of Charles I., Lyme was a station of considerable importance to both parties; it was early fortified by the parliament, and notwithstanding that it sustained a siege by Prince Maurice, always remained in their possession. The first engagement of the English fleet with the Spanish Armada, in 1588, took place off this part of the coast; and in 1672, another, between the English and Dutch fleets, occurred, when the latter, being beaten, retired to the coast of France. The Duke of Monmouth landed at Lyme, in 1685, to commence his rebellion, and slept at the George inn; but he was soon after defeated at Sedgemoor, and twelve of his adherents, who were condemned at Dorchester, by Judge Jeffreys, were executed here.

The town is situated at that extremity of the county which borders on Devonshire, between two rocky hills, and is divided by the river Lim, which rises about two miles northward. One part of it, occupying a steep declivity, has a very striking appearance, the houses rising above each other in succession, and mostly built of blue lias stone; the principal street, called Broadstreet, contains excellent shops, and is a very handsome thoroughfare. It is lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are well supplied with good water from a copious spring about half a mile distant. Recent improvements have made it a fashionable bathing-place; the accommodations for visitors are good, and there are baths, and assembly, billiard, and card rooms, with some libraries. The surrounding scenery is remarkably fine; the walk upon the Cobb is almost unrivalled, and several beautiful villas have recently been erected in the environs. It formerly carried on a considerable trade with France, Spain, and the West Indies, which has declined; and a few vessels were once fitted out for the Newfoundland fishery. The port, which, in a return made to the exchequer in the 31st of Charles II., is represented as a member of Poole, has the privilege of bonding corn, wine, spirituous liquors, hemp, tallow, timber, deals, iron-bars, and other goods; the vessels belonging to it are chiefly employed in the coasting trade, and a packet sails to Guernsey once a fortnight. The harbour, or Cobb, which forms a safe shelter for vessels between it, the Start point, and Portland, is about a quarter of a mile west-south-west from the town, and existed so early as the time of Edward III.; it was originally composed of vast pieces of rock, rudely piled on each other, but is now a work of regular masonry, consisting of two piers, projecting on each side, and inclosing a basin. A breach made in it during the "Great Storm" was repaired by government in 1825, at an expense of £17,337. The dues, which average about £450 per annum, are appropriated to its repair. The manufacture of broad-cloth for great coats, often called "Lyme cloth," is carried on in the vicinity, and the town was formerly noted for the manufacture of lace. The markets are on Tuesday and Friday; and fairs are held on February 13th and October 2nd.

Corporation Seal.

Lyme was originally incorporated by Edward I., and its privileges have been confirmed and augmented by succeeding monarchs, particularly by Henry VIII. A court of pie-poudre was granted to the mayor and burgesses by Mary, and a new charter by Elizabeth, to which various privileges were added by James I., Charles I., and William III. The government is now vested in a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; and the number of magistrates is ten. Petty-sessions are held four times in the year; and there is a court for the recovery of debts, under the direction of the mayor and aldermen. The royalty of the manor is vested in the corporation, and a manorial court takes place once a year. Lyme has returned members to parliament, with only three intermissions, since the 23rd of Edward I.; but by the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, it was enacted that it should thenceforward return only one representative. The borough now comprises the parishes of Lyne and Charmouth, and the franchise is vested in the £10 householders; the number of electors, in the year 1839-40, was 278, and in 1842-3, 265, showing a decrease of 13; the mayor is returning officer. The parish comprises 1200 acres by computation. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 5. 7½., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Lyme-Regis and Halstock in the Cathedral of Salisbury: the tithes have been commuted for £272. 5., of which £218. 10. are payable to the vicar, and £53. 15. to the prebendary. The church, which was rebuilt about the end of the fifteenth century, is an ancient structure, with portions in the decorated and later styles, and consists of a nave, chancel, and two side aisles, both of which are embattled on the outside: one of these aisles was formerly dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and the other to St. Nicholas. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. A national school, and a school on the British and Foreign system, have been erected; and there are two almshouses, founded in 1548, by John Tudbold. A convent of Carmelite friars once existed here; and in the fourteenth century there was likewise an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary and the Holy Ghost. The vicinal way from Hogchester, on the ancient Ikeneld-street, runs through the parish. Some fine specimens of antediluvian remains are found, from which the most eminent geologists, both British and Foreign, have enriched their collections: among these especially are the bones of the Ichthyosauri and the Plesiosauri; and fossil remains of the greatest interest and rarest description are discovered in the blue lias which forms the line of coast, and on which the town itself stands: from this stone is made the celebrated mortar which has the property of setting under water, and is extensively used in London for stucco plaster. Among the natives of the place were, Captain Thomas Coram, who established the "Foundling Hospital," born about 1668; and Sir George Summers, the distinguished admiral, who discovered the Bermuda Islands.

LYMINGE (ST. MARY AND ST. EADBURGH), a parish, in the union of ELHAM, hundred of LONINGBOROUGH, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division of the county of KENT, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Elham; containing 941 inhabitants. It comprises 4588*a. 2r. 4p.*, of which about 1713 acres are arable, 1283 pasture, 1049 woodland, and 275 common or waste. A stream rises here, which flows in a northerly direction, past Elham, and joins the Stour, near Stourmouth. The living comprises a sinecure rectory, with the chapelries of Standford and Paddlesworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £21. 10.; and a vicarage, endowed with the small tithes of Lyminge and the chapelries, and rated at £10. 18. 9.; net income of the two, £625; patron, Rev. Ralph Price. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans. In 1661, Timothy Bedingfield devised lands for education, producing an annual income of £111. 10. A monastery of the order of St. Benedict formerly existed here, but there are no remains. The ancient Stane-street traces the western boundary of the parish.

LYMINGTON, a borough, market-town, parochial chapelry, and liberty, and the head of a union, in the Lymington and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 18 miles (S. W. by S.) from Southampton, and 95 (S. W.) from London; containing 3813 inhabitants. The earliest notice of this place occurs in Domesday book, in which it is called

Corporation Seal.

Lentune, afterwards changed to Limintun, of which its present name is a variation. The town is situated on the western bank of a creek, or river, which falls into the Solent channel; it consists principally of one spacious street, nearly half a mile in length, and is lighted with gas; the houses are modern and neatly built, and the environs abound with picturesque and romantic scenery. Its excellent accommodations for sea-bathing have rendered it a favourite place of resort for invalids during the summer, and substantial and convenient baths were erected by a public company formed in 1833. A neat theatre is occupied every alternate year by a company of performers, from August to October; and there is an assembly-room at the Angel inn. In the reign of Henry I. the town first rose into note, having then been made a port; French wines and foreign commodities were imported, and at that time also it first became celebrated for its salt-works. In the 29th of Edward III. the port contributed 9 ships and 159 men towards the fleet for the protection of the southern coast, which was more, by 4 ships and 63 men, than the quota supplied by Portsmouth. The petty duties were levied by the inhabitants on certain articles of merchandise brought to the port, but the right to such an impost being questioned by the superior port of Southampton, the case was tried in 1329, and decided against the inhabitants of Lymington, who were subsequently often fined for persisting in their claim. At length, in 1730, having again taken these duties, and being sued by the corporation of Southampton, the defendants procured the removal of the cause to the county assize court, in which they obtained a verdict in their favour, and since that time the petty customs have been regularly paid. The commercial advantages of the port were seriously affected in 1731 by the construction of a dam, or causeway, to the north of the town, which has so contracted the channel of the river, and diminished its depth, by excluding a great body of water, that it is now navigable only for vessels of 300 tons' burthen, instead of 500, as formerly. The trade is confined entirely to coasting vessels. The manufacture of salt, which was formerly extensive, has greatly declined, although the superiority of the Lymington salt is generally acknowledged: the works are situated along the sea-shore to the south of the town. On the quay are a commodious public wharf and store-rooms, and near it is a yard for ship-building. The harbour at the entrance of the creek is excellent, and affords a favourite and safe shelter for vessels belonging to the members of the Royal Yacht Squadron. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on May 12th and October 2nd, for cheese, horses, cattle, &c. Lymington, which is a borough by prescription, was incorporated by charter of James I., and was once governed by a mayor, recorder, town-clerk, town-sergeant, and an indefinite number of burgesses; but the controul is now vested in a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76. The mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, the county magistrates having concurrent jurisdiction. The elective franchise was conferred by Elizabeth in the 27th year of her reign: the borough, comprising 134 acres, was extended in 1832, and now contains an area of 4256 acres: the mayor is returning officer. Petty-sessions for the Lymington division are held by the magistrates on alternate Saturdays.

The living is annexed to the vicarage of Boldre. The church, which is a handsome structure, capable of accommodating 2000 persons, and dedicated to Thomas à Becket, was built at different periods, and is irregularly constructed of brick and stone, with a castellated tower and cupola; the interior is neat, and contains several monuments. There are places of worship for Irvingites, Baptists, and Independents; and a Roman Catholic chapel at Pylewell. A small grammar school was founded and endowed in 1668, by George Burford. A bequest of £300 was made in 1777, by Ann Burrard, for education; and a national school, erected at a cost of £1200, is supported partly by endowment. Rear-Admiral Thomas Rogers, who died in 1814, bequeathed £1000, directing the interest to be divided between ten men and women; and there are various charitable institutions for the relief of the sick and indigent. The poor law union comprises 6 parishes, containing a population of 11,489. On a neck of land, or bank, to the south-west of Lymington, is Hurst Castle, a circular tower, strengthened by semicircular bastions, erected by Henry VIII. to defend this part of the channel between the main land and the Isle of Wight. In 1648, Charles I. was confined in it for several days after his removal from Carisbrooke, about one month prior to his decapitation. It is now an important station, occupied by men employed in the preventive service; and two lighthouses and a beacon are placed here for the service of vessels navigating the coast. Buckland Castle, or the Rings, consists of two camps about three furlongs apart, situated about one mile from Lymington. Admiral Lord Hawke resided for several years at Grove House, in the town, where many of his children were born; and Dr. Guidott, who revived the drinking of the Bath waters in 1673, was a native of the place.

LYMM (VIRGIN MARY), a parish, in the union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Warrington; containing 2658 inhabitants. The Duke of Bridgewater's canal passes through the village. The living is a rectory in mediæties, of which that of Lymm with Warburton, valued in the king's books at £11. 0. $7\frac{1}{2}$., is in the patronage of R. E. Warburton, Esq., and the other, valued at £11. 0. 5., in the gift of E. Leigh, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £499. 15., and the glebe comprises $12\frac{1}{2}$ acres, to which there is a house. The church is a very ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A free school was endowed in 1698, by Sir G. Warburton and W. Domville, Esq., the income of which amounts to £105; and a girls' school is supported by subscription.

LYMPNE (ST. STEPHEN), a parish, in the union of ELHAM, partly within the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, but chiefly in the hundred of STREET, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Hythe; containing 606 inhabitants. The parish takes its name from the ancient river Limene, now the Rother, a branch of which passed below it, and formed the Roman haven called Portus Limanus; and the place itself is generally considered to have been the Amin of Ptolemy. The great military road called Stane-street, still visibly straight for some miles, ran hither from the station Durovernum, or Canterbury. At Shepway Cross, about half a mile from the church, the Leminarcha, or Lord Warden of the cinque-ports, was sworn into office. The parish comprises 2420 acres by computation; that part of the land in Romney Marsh is flat, but the rest hilly, and the soil is partly loamy and partly rocky. The Royal Military canal intersects the parish, through which also passes the Shorncliffe and Rye canal. A fair for pedlery and toys is held on July 5th. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 1. 4.; patron, Archdeacon of Canterbury; impropiator, A. Evelyn, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £468, and the vicarial for £239; the vicar's glebe consists of 1 acre, and the impropiator's of about 150 acres, besides which there are portions of land in West Hythe. The church stands on the edge of a rock near the village, and is principally in the Norman style, with a tower rising from the centre. There are considerable benefactions to the poor. Near the church is Stutfall Castle, formerly a stronghold or fort of the Romans; the walls are constructed of brick and flint. About 633, Ethelburga, a daughter of Ethelbert, built a nunnery here in honour of the Virgin Mary, which subsequently became an abbey, and continued till 964; but after the Danish invasion it came into the possession of the archbishops of Canterbury.

LYMPSHAM (ST. CHRISTOPHER), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of BRENT with WRINGTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (W.) from Cross; containing, with the hamlet of Eastertown, 567 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1967 acres, the chief part of which consists of dairy farms, supplying cheese of very fine quality. It lies in a marsh, and the country for many miles round is a continuous flat, much of the ground, however, being of superior quality. The Bristol and Exeter railway passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £38. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Rev. J. A. Stephenson: the tithes have been commuted for £491. 15., and the glebe contains 100 acres, to which there is a house. The church has a very elegant tower, restored by Charles I., in 1633; a stall, richly canopied, on the northern side of the edifice, distinguishes the seat appropriated to the mitred abbots of Glastonbury, to whom the manor formerly belonged. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

LYMPSTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, Woodbury and S. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Exmouth; containing 999 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1120 acres, of which 54 are common or waste; it is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the river Exe, and the adjacent country is agreeably diversified. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the gift of T. Porter, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £263, and the glebe contains 12 acres, to which there is a house. The church contains 100 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £100 in aid of the expense. Here are places of worship for Wesleyans and Unitarians; and a national school is partly supported by several trifling bequests.

LYNCH, a hamlet, in the parish of SELWORTHY, union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 39 inhabitants.

LYNCOMBE, with WIDCOMBE, a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of BATH-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 9920 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1800 acres; it is separated from Bath by the river Avon, and the Kennet and Avon canal passes through it. The surface is diversified with hill and dale, and the soil, though thin on the higher grounds, is rich in the valley adjoining the river. Freestone is extensively quarried in the hills, and large quantities of it have been used for the buildings in Bath, Windsor, London, and other places. Many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of fine woollen-cloth. In this parish, and that of Twiverton, three small cuttings were made, to the extent of 86,770 cubic yards, for the line of the Great Western railway. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the rectory of St. Peter and St. Paul, Bath. A church, in the later English style, with a tower, was erected in 1831, at an expense of £5644, under the act of the 58th of George III. Here is a college, instituted and partly supported by the Roman Catholic bishop of the western district, for the education of Roman Catholic boys in general, and particularly of secular clergymen, for the service of the district. There is an hospital for idiots, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, with a chapel annexed, which latter has been partly rebuilt by subscription.

LYNDBY, county of NOTTINGHAM.—See LINBY.

LYNDHURST (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union, and N. division of the hundred, of NEW FOREST, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 9½ miles (W. by S.) from Southampton; containing 1380 inhabitants. Prior to the time of Charles II., the jurisdiction of the Chief Justice in Eyre for the forest, in the centre of which the parish is situated, was exercised here, where the courts under the authority of the verderers are still held, some on such days as the presiding judges appoint, others on September 14th. Attached to the wardenship is a house, called the King's House, now occupied by a subordinate officer, and where is preserved an ancient stirrup, said to have been used by William Rufus, at the time when he was shot by Sir Walter Tyrrel. The parish comprises 3618 acres, of which 2114 are common or waste; the soil of the cultivated portion exhibits the several varieties of clay, sand, and marl. There are numerous gentlemen's seats. Courts leet and baron for the hundred of Redbridge and manor of Lyndhurst are held. The living is annexed to the rectory of Minstead: the tithes have been commuted for £250. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A school is endowed with £26 per annum, arising from a bequest by William Phillips, Esq.; and a national school is supported by subscription. Sir John Singleton Copley, on being elevated to the office of lord high chancellor, was created Baron Lyndhurst, by patent dated April 27th, 1827.

LYNDON (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, 5 miles (N. E.) from Uppingham; containing 100 inhabitants. This parish, which was formerly part of that of Hambleton, comprises 895a. 2r. 15p., bounded on the south by the small rivulet Chater, and lying in ridges extending from west to east; the soil on the high grounds is good red earth, and on the sides of the ridges whitish clay of inferior quality; the substratum is a hard limestone. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 1., and in the patronage of the Misses Barker: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £24, and the rectorial for £175; the glebe contains 14 acres, to which there is a house.

LYNDON, a quarter, in the parish of CHURCH-BICKENHILL, union of MERIDEN, Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK.

LYNEHAM, a chapelry, in the parish of SHIPTON-UNDER-WHICHWOOD, union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of CHADDLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 6 miles (N. E.) from Burford; containing 248 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1787.

LYNESACK, with SOFTLEY, a township, in the chapelry of HAMSTERLEY, parish of St. ANDREW-AUCKLAND, union of AUCKLAND, N. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Staindrop; containing 910 inhabitants. This extensive township, which is bounded on the south by the river Gaunless or Wanless, and on the north by the Lin-Burn, comprises the hamlets of Houl, Lynesack, Potter-Cross, Softley, and Trough-Lane Head; a small portion of the land is barren waste, and the surface is boldly diversified with hills. Coal is found in great abundance, and several mines are in operation, the produce of which is sent into Yorkshire and the adjacent country. Iron-stone is also found, and in the township are some works for smelting the ore, belonging to the Duke of Cleveland. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; and two schools are supported by subscription.

LYNFORD, a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of GRIMSHOE, W. division of the county of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Brandon; containing 105 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1500 acres, the property of Sir Richard Sutton, Bart., of Lynford Hall, a handsome mansion in an extensive park. The church is in ruins, and the inhabitants therefore attend that of West Toft. Two Roman urns were dug up in 1720, and one in 1735, containing ashes and bones.

LYNG (St. CLEMENT), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from East Dereham; containing, with the hamlet of Easthaugh, 601 inhabitants. This place, in the reign of Edward III., belonged to Sir John de Norwich, who had license from that monarch to convert the manor-house into a castle, of which there are still some of the foundations remaining. The parish comprises 1899a. 2r. 22p., whereof 1459 acres are arable, 419 meadow and pasture, and 20 woodland. The village is situated on the south bank of the river Wensum, on which is an extensive paper-mill. A fair is held on the 20th of November. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11, and in the gift of E. Lambe, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £513. 10., and the glebe comprises 60 acres, with a house; there is also a rent-charge of £11. 10., payable to the rector of Elsing. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the font is of Norman character, and there are some remains of ancient stained glass. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by subscription. At the inclosure of the parish, in 1808, 16 acres of heath were allotted to the poor for fuel. There was once a religious house at Easthaugh, and some portions of the chapel, which was dedicated to St. Edmund, are still remaining.

LYNN, NORTH (St. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of LYNN, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Lynn; containing 38 inhabitants. This place is situated on the western bank of the Ouse, near its mouth, and has suffered considerably from the frequent inundations of that river, one of which swept away the church. The parish comprises 760a. 29p., whereof 426 acres are arable, and 324 meadow and pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 1. 8., and in the gift of Lord W. Bentinck: the tithes have been commuted for £539, and the glebe comprises 26 acres.

Arms.

LYNN-REGIS, a borough, sea-port, and market-town, having exclusive jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 44 miles (W. by N.) from Norwich, and 97 (N. by E.) from London; containing 16,039 inhabitants. This place is by Camden supposed to have been a British town, and to have derived its name from the expanse of water near which it is situated, and of which the British word Llyn was significant; but Spelman is of opinion that the name is of Saxon origin, from the word Lean, implying a tenure in fee, or farm. It was anciently called Len Episcopi, from having been under the jurisdiction, both temporal and spiritual, of the bishops of Norwich, who had a palace where Gaywood Hall now stands; but this authority was, in the reign of Henry VIII., surrendered to that monarch, and from that time the town assumed the name of Lenne Regis, or King's Lynn. In Domesday book it is called Lun and Lenn, and described as the property of Agelmare, Bishop of North Elmham, and Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury. It appears to have been a place of considerable importance, and to have enjoyed valuable privileges, among which were certain customs on the arrival of all merchandise by sea and land, of which the bishops claimed a moiety. Bishop Herbert, who removed the see to Norwich, in 1094, founded a church and priory, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, St. Margaret, and other saints, on the festival of which Henry I. granted liberty to the prior of Norwich to hold a fair; and in the reign of Richard I. it was the residence of numerous Jews, who carried on an extensive trade with most parts of Europe. In 1204, during the contest between John and the barons, Lynn continued faithful to the king, who remained here for some time, and, on the petition of John Grey, Bishop of Norwich, made the town a free borough: he presented to the inhabitants a silver cup and cover, which are still preserved by the corporation, also his own sword to be borne before the mayor on public occasions. John was frequently here during the war, and from this place he departed just before the disaster which befel him in crossing the Wash, and to which is ascribed the illness that caused his death. Edward III. and Henry VI. also visited the town; and Edward IV., in 1470, retreating before the celebrated Earl of Warwick, came hither in company with his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, and embarked for Flanders. In 1498, Henry VII., with his queen and the Prince of Wales, attended by a numerous retinue, spent some time at the Augustine convent in the town. Queen Elizabeth, in her progress through Norfolk, in 1578, visited the place; and his late Majesty, William IV., when Duke of Clarence, in 1807, and the Duke of Sussex, in 1822, were entertained by the corporation, and presented with the freedom of the borough. Her most gracious Majesty, when Princess Victoria, with the Duchess of Kent, likewise visited the town, in 1835, on their route to Holkham. In the civil war of the 17th century, the inhabitants embraced the royal cause, and the town was besieged by the parliamentary forces, under the command of the Earl of Manchester, to whom it surrendered, after a vigorous resistance for three weeks, and was garrisoned with republican troops. Numerous plagues and other diseases have raged here, at different periods, with destructive influence; in 1540, an intermittent fever prevailed to such an extent as to occasion a suspension of the mart for that year, and in 1636 and 1665, the market and fairs were discontinued, owing to the plague. In 1741, the spires of the church of St. Margaret and the chapel of St. Nicholas were blown down, and several other buildings greatly injured, by a violent hurricane and storm.

The town is situated at a distance of ten miles from the North Sea, on the east bank of the Great Ouse, at its confluence with the river Nar, which is here of considerable width; it extends a mile and a quarter in length, and half a mile in breadth, and is intersected by four rivulets, called fleets, over which are numerous bridges, that have lately been widened. Many improvements have been effected under acts of parliament obtained in 1803 and 1806, for paving, cleansing, and lighting the town. It was anciently defended on the east side by a wall with nine bastions, and by a broad and deep fosse, over which were three drawbridges leading to the chief gates; a few fragments of the wall are still remaining, and one of the gates, arched and embattled, at the south entrance; the others have been taken down. On the north side is St. Anne's fort, a platform battery, constructed in 1627, and formerly mounting twelve pieces of heavy ordnance. The town consists of three principal streets, nearly parallel, from which several smaller streets diverge; and is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water. The houses are in general ancient and irregularly built, though interspersed with several respectable mansions; and in the more modern parts are several ranges of handsome dwellings. The environs are flat, and not very attractive in their scenery; but the public promenades are pleasant. A theatre was erected by a proprietary of shareholders in 1814, and is open annually for about six weeks, commencing at the great mart in February. Assemblies are held in a suite of commodious rooms in the town-hall, in which also concerts take place occasionally. A subscription library was established in 1797, and is supported by 200 members; there is likewise a reading and news room in the market-place, and the inhabitants have access to an excellent parochial library in St. Margaret's church.

In the reign of Edward the Confessor, Lynn was a place of considerable TRADE, and it had grown into such commercial importance at the beginning of the thirteenth century, that the revenue paid to the crown was more than two-thirds of that arising from the trade of the port of London. In 1370, the inhabitants furnished nineteen vessels towards a naval armament for the invasion of France; a mint was established here; and there were thirty-one incorporated guilds, or trading companies, some of whom had separate halls. The harbour is deep, and sufficient to accommodate 300 sail; but the entrance is somewhat dangerous, from the frequent shifting of the channel, and the numerous sand banks; and the anchorage is rendered difficult from the nature of the soil, and the rapidity of the tide, which rises to the height of twenty feet. Anciently the course of the Ouse was by Wisbech: its present direction, which, according to Dugdale, may be referred to the reign of Henry III., has been ascribed to the decay of the outfall at Wisbech, and to some great flood which rendered a fresh line necessary. This accession of water into the channel of a small river, which previously flowed past the town, destroyed a considerable part of Old Lynn, and the church at North Lynn is stated to have been completely engulfed. After the sluices at Denver and Salter's Lode had been constructed, for the purpose of draining the fenny tract called Bedford Level, the navigation of the river was much impaired, and the harbour obstructed by the accumulation of silt; to remedy which, the Eau-brink cut was commenced in 1818, and completed in 1820, avoiding a considerable bend in the river. Near the north end of this cut a handsome wooden bridge has been built, over which a new road leads into Marshland; and a bridge over the river Nar, and an embankment at Cross-Keys Wash, affording a direct road from Norfolk and Suffolk, through Lynn, into Lincolnshire, were completed in 1831. The Purfleet and Common Staith quays are the principal places for landing merchandise; and on the former, where all wines are landed, is the custom-house, erected by Sir John Turner, and occupying the site of the hall of the ancient guild of the Holy Trinity. It is a handsome building of freestone, ornamented with two tiers of pilasters, the lower of the Doric, and the upper of the Ionic, order, and surmounted by a small cupola; in a niche in the front is a statue of Charles II.

The port, from its situation so near the North Sea, and enjoying the advantages of inland communication, carries on an extensive foreign and coasting trade. The principal imports are, wine and cork from Spain and Portugal; brandy from France; timber, deals, hemp, and tallow, from the Baltic; corn from the northern parts of Europe; oil-cake from the various parts of the continent, and lately from the Mediterranean; and timber from America. There are seven wood-yards for bonding timber, deals, &c.; a tobacco warehouse, a warehouse for dry goods generally, and several vaults, all appropriated for the reception of articles under bond. The coasting-trade is very considerable, consisting chiefly of imported and agricultural produce, with which it supplies the neighbouring districts; a fine species of white sand, much used in the manufacture of glass, is sent in great quantities to Newcastle and Leith; shrimps, which are found in abundance on the coast, are forwarded to London and other places. The quantity of coal landed at the port in 1841, was 255,763 tons, and the duties paid at the custom-house amounted to £64,359. The number of vessels that entered inwards was, from foreign ports, 301, aggregate tonnage 29,441; and of coasting vessels 2229, of 208,137 tons' aggregate burthen; and the number that cleared outwards was, 1159, of the aggregate burthen of 68,920 tons. The number of ships of above fifty tons' burthen registered at the port is 192, and the aggregate tonnage 17,156. The jurisdiction of the port extends from Burnham-Overy on the east, to the entrance of Wisbech harbour on the west. There are three yards for the building of ships, two of which have patent-slips; also several extensive breweries, and large malting establishments, a manufactory for sail-cloth and sacking, some rope-walks, and manufactories for twine, a manufactory for tobacco, an establishment for cork-cutting, three iron-foundries, several large flour-mills, an oil-mill, and a saw-mill. Its intercourse with the interior of the country is greatly facilitated by the river Ouse and its several branches, with which various canals have communication. The market-days are Tuesday and Saturday; the former, principally for corn, is held in a spacious paved area of about three acres, surrounded by some well-built houses. A handsome but dilapidated market-cross of freestone, erected in 1710, has been taken down, and a new market-house erected, with a range of six Doric columns on the basement story, forming an entrance, above which is a range of six Ionic columns, supporting a triangular pediment; the upper part of the building contains a spacious room for exhibitions or other public purposes, with entrances from staircases on the sides, and the area underneath extends to the quay, where the fish-market is held. The market, on Saturday, formerly held in the High-street, was removed in 1782 to an area near St. Margaret's church, where a good market-house was built in 1802. In 1826, the weekly cattle-market was removed from its inconvenient site in the environs of the town, to a more central situation. The fairs are on February 14th, which is generally continued for a fortnight; and October 17th, which is a great cheese fair.

King's Lynn, a BOROUGH by prescription, received its first charter from King John, in the 6th of his reign, which was confirmed and extended by several subsequent sovereigns. A new charter was bestowed by Henry VIII., in the 16th year of his reign, by which the municipal constitution was fixed, and another in the 29th, establishing local courts; and by charter of the 2nd of James I., the corporation acquired the rights of admiralty. The controul, however, is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, which also divides the borough into three wards, and makes the municipal boundaries co-extensive with the parliamentary. The corporation, until the passing of the same act, which abolished admiralty jurisdictions, presided at an admiralty court of record for determining all pleas arising within the limits of the port. They at present hold a court of quarter-session for the trial of all offences not capital; a court of record once a month for the recovery of debts to any amount, and the determination of civil suits; and a court leet annually. A court of requests takes place monthly for the recovery of debts under 40s.; and petty-sessions are held thrice a week. The number of borough magistrates is eleven. The freedom is inherited by the eldest sons of freemen, on the death of their fathers, or acquired by servitude. The town first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the borough is co-extensive with the parishes of St. Margaret and South Lynn, or All Saints, and comprises 2633 acres: the mayor is returning officer. The guildhall is an ancient structure of stone and flint, in the later English style, containing a spacious hall, courts for the sessions, and a suite of assembly-rooms; and is ornamented with portraits of many public characters, among which are those of King John, Henry VI., Edward IV., Charles I., William and Mary, George III., Admiral Lord Nelson, Sir Robert Walpole, Bart., who represented the borough in seventeen successive parliaments; Sir Thomas White, Sir Benjamin Keene, and Lord George Bentinck. The prison for the borough is both a common gaol and house of correction.

Lynn comprises the parishes of South Lynn, containing 3522, and St. Margaret, containing 12,517 inhabitants. The living of South Lynn is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 6. 8.; net income, £134; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Ely. The church is an ancient cruciform edifice, of which the tower fell down in 1763, and demolished part of the body of the building. The living of St. Margaret's is a perpetual curacy, with that of St. Nicholas annexed; net income, £138; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Norwich. The church is a spacious cruciform structure, combining the early, decorated, and later English styles, with two western towers, and an east front of singularly beautiful design, with two octagonal turrets rising from the flanking buttresses; the chancel is early English, with a circular east window, and contains some finely-sculptured sedilia of stone, with several ancient brasses and monuments, and a brass eagle with expanded wings forming the reading-desk. The chapel of St. Nicholas, built in the latter part of the fourteenth century, is a large structure, combining the decorated with the later English style, and having an embattled tower surmounted by a spire; the original roof of beautifully carved oak is carefully preserved, and the interior contains many parts of great beauty. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics. In the parish of St. Margaret is a cemetery, with a small chapel for the performance of the funeral service; and there is a burial-ground for the Jews. The Free Grammar school was founded in the reign of Henry VII., by Thomas Thoresby, alderman of Lynn, who endowed it with lands producing about £60 per annum; a spacious schoolroom, and a dwelling-house for the master, were erected in 1825, by the corporation. It has two scholarships at Emanuel College, Cambridge, of £5. 10. each per annum, and one scholarship of £2 per annum, both founded by the corporation, and tenable for seven years; also one scholarship of £2, for seven years, founded by the owner of an estate near High-bridge Lynn; one of £3. 8. 6., at Trinity College, Cambridge, for five years; and one of £6, tenable for four years, at St. John's College, Cambridge. Eugene Aram was usher here when he was apprehended, in 1759, on a charge of murder committed fourteen years previously, for which he was executed. National and Lancastrian schools are supported by subscription; and a British and Foreign school was recently erected.

Gaywood hospital, about half a mile from Lynn, occupies the site of the ancient hospital of St. Mary Magdalene, founded in the reign of Stephen, for a master and twelve brethren and sisters; the endowment lapsing to the crown, was granted by James I. to the mayor and aldermen, in trust for the maintenance of a master and eleven aged and infirm persons. The hospital was burnt down by the parliamentary troops in the reign of Charles I., and rebuilt by the corporation in 1649. St. James' hospital was rebuilt in 1822, by Mr. Benjamin Smith, and is endowed for the maintenance of a reader and eleven aged women. The Lynn hospital, a large and handsome edifice of white brick, was erected in 1835, at an expense of £2000. Valenger's hospital, founded in 1605, and rebuilt in 1806, is endowed with £21 per annum, and inhabited by four aged women. Paradise, or Framingham's hospital, begun in 1676, by Mr. John Heathcote, and completed after his decease by Mr. Henry Framingham, is endowed for the support of a reader and eleven aged men. Among the charities is one by Mr. Cook, of London, who bequeathed £5000 three per cents.; the dividends on £2300 to be paid to the inmates of the Bede house, those on £2000 to the tenants of Framingham's hospital, and those on the remaining £700 to the hospitallers of South Lynn. There are various benevolent institutions for the relief of the necessitous; and the charity trustees are in possession of funds for apprenticing children, for loans to young tradesmen, and other purposes. The poor law union of Lynn comprises St. Margaret's, and North, South, and West Lynn parishes, containing a population of 16,554.

The monastic institutions and ancient hospitals consisted of a priory of Benedictine monks, in Priory-lane; a convent of White friars, in South Lynn; one of Grey friars, in St. James'-street; one of Black friars, between Clough-lane and Spinner-lane; one of Augustine friars, in St. Austin's-street; a college, near the town-hall; and St. Mary Magdalene's hospital, the site and endowment of which are appropriated to Gaywood hospital; also a nunnery, a monastery of friars de Penitentiâ Jesu, St. John's hospital, and four lazaret-houses, the sites of which are unknown; besides various chapels, all which were involved in the general dissolution of these establishments. Vestiges of the houses that belonged to the Grey, White, Black, and Augustine friars still exist: the remains of the first, which stand at the entrance into the town from London, consist of the tower and lantern of their conventual church, rising from a pointed arch supported by buttresses, to the height of about ninety feet, and serving as a landmark for ships entering the harbour; a spiral staircase leads to the summit, whence a view is obtained of the town and its environs. An ancient building, in a state of complete repair, in Queen-street, near the town-hall, has been considered that which formerly constituted the college. But the most interesting relic of antiquity is a curious edifice, at the eastern extremity of the town, denominated the Lady's Chapel, or, the chapel on the Red Mount, which has undergone a thorough repair by subscription. It is of singular construction: within an octagonal wall of red brick, strengthened by buttresses, is a handsome cruciform chapel of very small dimensions, with an elegant stone roof. Nicholas of Lynn, a celebrated mathematician, astrologer, and navigator, who became a Grey friar, and died in 1369, was born and buried here; and William Browne, M.D., afterwards Sir William Browne, president of the Royal College of Physicians, and author of several works, chiefly on medical subjects, resided here. At Reffley, about two miles distant, in a sequestered spot, stands an obelisk, from which, by means of an aqueduct, a chalybeate spring issues; near it is an octagonal temple, to which subscribers have access for the benefit of the water. Lynn gives the inferior title of Baron to Marquess Townshend.

LYNN, WEST (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of LYNN, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W.) from Lynn; containing 477 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1619a. 28p., of which about 260 acres are arable, 927 pasture and garden, and about 332 land recovered from the bed of the old river. The village is situated on the west side of the Ouse, opposite Lynn, with which it communicates by a ferry. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9; net income, £338; patron, C. Hare, Esq. The church, erected in place of a former structure, destroyed by an inundation of the river in 1271, is a neat edifice, with a tower, and contains in the chancel a memorial in brass to Sir Adam Outlawe, who died in 1503.

LYONSHALL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of KINGTON, hundred of STRETTFORD, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Kington; containing 912 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Kington to Leominster, and bounded on the north by the river Arrow, and comprises 4658a. 2r. 2p., of which 360 acres are woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture in nearly equal portions; the soil is clayey, and the surface is diversified with a variety of picturesque scenery, in many places finely wooded. Limestone is quarried for building and for the roads; and coal is brought from Brecon, and lime from kilns near Radnor, by a tram-road which runs through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 10. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Hereford. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £430, and the vicarial for £330; the appropriate glebe contains 130 acres, and the vicarial 12, to which there is a house. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, with some details of Norman character. A school is partly supported by subscription. Here are the remains of a moated castle, which, in the early part of the reign of Henry III., belonged to Sir Stephen de Ebroucis, then lord of the manor and castle.

LYPPIATT, LOWER and UPPER, tythings, in the parish and union of STROUD, hundred of BISLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing respectively 1276 and 4061 inhabitants.

LYSS, a parish, in the hundred of ODIHAM, union of PETERSFIELD, Petersfield and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Petersfield; containing 656 inhabitants. The parish includes the tythings of Lyss-Abbass and Lyss-Turney, and comprises 3678 acres, of which 1230 are common or waste land. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £96; patron and impropiator, Long Wellesley, Esq. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter.

LYTCHETT-MATRAVERS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of POOLE, hundred of COGDEAN, Wimborne division of DORSET, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Poole; containing 817 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 3329 acres, whereof 32 are common or waste land: a fine view of the sea is obtained from the village, which is situated on a very high hill. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 3. 4., and in the gift of the Howell family: the tithes have been commuted for £430, and the glebe comprises 121 acres, to which there is a house. The church, which is remarkable for its beautiful tower, is supposed, from an inscription on a brass plate, to have been built before the Conquest; it has a monument to Lord Matravers, from whom the place takes the affix to its name. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school.

LYTCHETT-MINSTER, a chapelry, in the parish of STURMINSTER-MARSHALL, union of POOLE, hundred of COGDEAN, Wimborne division of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Poole; containing 858 inhabitants. This place is bounded on the south-east by an estuary of Poole harbour, and on the south by Rock Lee river, which is crossed by a bridge, and falls into Lytchett bay; it comprises 3191a. 3r. 27p., of which 975 acres are arable, 557 meadow, 172 woodland, and 1428 heath, &c. There are pits for potters' clay, from which a canal runs into the bay leading to Poole harbour. A pleasure-fair is held on Whit-Monday. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Sturminster-Marshall: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £15. 9. 6., and the vicarial for £350. The chapel, with the exception of the tower, was rebuilt by subscription in 1836. There are two places of worship for Independents; and a national school is supported by subscription. On the south side of the village is a very large tumulus called Lytchett beacon, which is seen far off at sea, and serves as a landmark for entering Poole harbour.

LYTHAM (St. CUTHBERT), a parish, in the union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Kirkham; containing 2082 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the western coast, on the northern shore of the estuary of the Ribble, and is much resorted to for sea-bathing; it comprises 5170 acres, of which 1038 are common or waste. Some improvement has taken place within the last few years, by pulling down an extensive range of old buildings, and, after leaving an opening from the Clifton Arms hotel to the beach, erecting several new houses, among which is a billiard-room. Part of the beach has also been levelled, and a public walk formed along it, affording a pleasing view of the scenery on the southern side of the estuary. About a mile eastward is Lytham pool, a large natural basin, where vessels bringing corn, &c., to the port of Preston, discharge their cargoes into smaller craft; at its northern extremity is a graving-dock, for building or repairing vessels. A few of the inhabitants are employed in fishing. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £131; patron and impropiator, T. Clifton, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £568. The first stone of a new church, to replace the former, was laid on the 27th of March, 1834; the structure is a handsome specimen in the later English style. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel. Two schools are supported by various benefactions, yielding £120 per annum; and there is also a national school. Lytham Hall comprises, in its kitchens and out-offices, a portion of the buildings of a Benedictine priory, founded as a cell to the monastery at Durham, by Richard Fitz-Roger, in the latter part of the reign of Richard I., and dissolved by Henry VIII.

LYTHE, county of SUSSEX.—See MILLAND.

LYTHE (St. OSWALD), a parish, in the union of WHITBY, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Barnby, Borrowby, Ellerby, Hutton-Mulgrave, Mickley, Newton-Mulgrave, and Ugthorpe, 2080 inhabitants, of whom 1063 are in the township of Lythe, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Whitby. The parish, which is bounded on the east by the sea, is on the road from Whitby to Guisborough, and comprises 12,070 acres, exclusive of 700 or 800 of uninclosed moor. Upwards of one-third of the land is arable, and the rest meadow, pasture, and wood; the surface is undulated, the soil a good sound clay and loam, and the scenery bold, and in many parts picturesque and beautiful. The township of Lythe contains 3711 acres. At Kettleless and Sandsend, in the parish, are very considerable alum-works, which have been carried on for more than 200 years, and are now the property of the Marquess of Normanby. The lofty cliff at Kettleless, the base of which was excavated with numerous caves and fissures, became dislocated on the night of Dec. 17th, 1829, when the whole hamlet situated on its summit, glided down towards the sea; the inhabitants were secured by retreating to a ship lying off the coast for a cargo of alum. The village of Lythe is large, well built, and pleasantly situated at the distance of half a mile from the sea. Mulgrave Castle, the magnificent seat of the Marquess of Normanby, stands a little south, and commands extensive views of the surrounding country. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 6.; net income, £147; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of York. The church, though of modern appearance, is an ancient structure; a square tower was added in 1770, and the edifice was re-roofed in 1820; it stands conspicuously on an eminence, and forms a landmark for mariners at sea. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and at Ugthorpe is a Roman Catholic chapel. A parochial school is chiefly supported by the Marchioness of Normanby. Peter de Mauley obtained a weekly market to be held here, and a fair on the eve of the festival of St. Oswald, in the reign of Henry III., but both have been long disused.

M

MABE (St. MABE), a parish, in the union of FALMOUTH, E. division of the hundred of KERRIER, W. division of CORNWALL, 4½ miles (W.) from Falmouth; containing 594 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1963a. 7p., of which 770 acres are common, and the remainder arable and pasture; the substratum is principally granite, of very excellent quality, of which considerable quantities are shipped at Penryn, and which was raised for the erection of Waterloo bridge over the Thames. The surface is generally elevated, and the scenery picturesque; and the road from Falmouth to Penryn passes through the parish. The living is a vicarage not in charge, consolidated with that of Mylor, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter: the tithes have been commuted for £139. The church is a very ancient structure, in the early English style, with a lofty tower of granite, embattled, and crowned by pinnacles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. At Hellind is an old cross.

MABLETHORPE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Alford; containing 261 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have obtained its name from the great number of maple-trees with which it formerly abounded, and of which the stumps are still to be seen at low-water mark. The parish is bounded on the east by the German Ocean, and comprises by computation 2700 acres of good land. The air is remarkably salubrious; and from its excellent sands, which extend for miles along the beach, the village is resorted to from the month of June to October by numerous visitors, for whose accommodation a spacious hotel has been opened at a short distance from the shore, containing every arrangement for sea-bathing, and also for warm sea-water baths. The living is a rectory, with that of Stane united, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 2½.; net income, £1000; patron and incumbent, Rev. Lovick Cooper. Here is a national school for boys.

MABLETHORPE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 62 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united in 1745 to that of Theddlethorpe St. Helen, and valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 2.

MABYN, ST., a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of TRIGG, E. division of CORNWALL, 3¼ miles (E. by N.) from Wadebridge; containing 870 inhabitants. The parish is pleasantly situated, and comprehends some richly varied scenery, enlivened with a fine view of the river Camel, with its lofty banks clothed with wood to their summit. A fair is held on Feb. 14th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £36; net income, £712; patron, Earl of Falmouth. The church is a handsome structure, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, and has been repaired and entirely repewed at the expense of the Rev. G. L. Gower. At Trevisquite and Colquite were formerly chapels. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A national school has been established; and there is an almshouse for seven families. The Rev. C. Peters, author of a dissertation on the book of Job, was for some years rector.

Seal and Arms.

MACCLESFIELD, a market-town, parochial chapelry, and newly-enfranchised borough, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the parish of PRESTBURY, and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, and the head of a union, in the N. division of the county of CHESTER, on the road from London to Manchester, 36 miles (E. by N.) from Chester, and 167 (N.

W. by N.) from London; containing 24,137 inhabitants, of whom 11,192 are in the east, and 12,945 in the west, township. Previously to the Norman Conquest, this place constituted a portion of the royal demesne of the earls of Mercia, who held a court here for the ancient hundred of Hamestan; on which account, in the record of Doomsday, it is represented to have been one of the seats of Earl Edwin. At the time that survey was made, it was comprised within the earldom of Chester, of which it continued to form part until the abolition of that jurisdiction, when the hundred, manor, and forest of Macclesfield lapsed to the crown. The forest was anciently protected by the same laws, and entitled to the same rights, as other royal forests, and a few of the executive offices under these laws survive; of which description are, the grand serjeantcy of the hundred, and the mastership of the forest, which have long been hereditary in the family of Davenport; and that of bailiff of the manor and forest, which is vested in the noble family of Cholmondeley. After the territory came to the crown, parcels of the forest were granted away at different times, and the whole is now under cultivation; the last portion of the common and waste land having been inclosed under an act obtained in 1796, when an allotment was assigned to the king, as lord of the manor, which, with the mineral contents of the soil, has since been alienated.

An ecclesiastical council was held at Macclesfield in 1332, and another in 1362, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Whilst the town continued to be the residence of the earls of Chester, it was surrounded by a rampart, or walled fence, which had three principal gates, viz., Back-wall gate, Church gate, and New gate, and part of the wall and doorway of one is still remaining. In 1508, Thomas Savage, a native of the town, who became successively Bishop of London and Archbishop of York, founded a college of secular priests, of which the chapel, previously communicating with the church of St. Michael by a door now blocked up, alone remains, and is the sepulchral chapel of the family. During the great civil war in the 17th century, the town experienced much injury from the parliamentarians, by whom it was besieged and taken, and who retained possession of it, under Sir William Brereton, commander-in-chief of the republican forces of this county, after an obstinate attempt on the part of Sir Thomas Acton to gain it for the king. On a hill to the east are vestiges of an encampment constructed by the parliamentarians, from which, during the siege, the spire of St. Michael's church was battered by the cannon of the assailants. After the decapitation of Charles I., a council was held here, at which it was resolved to raise four regiments, of 700 men each, for the service of Charles II., who was then at the head of an army in Scotland. In 1745, a party of 100 cavalry seized the town for the Pretender, who, on the evening of the same day, arrived with 5000 men and his whole train of artillery; after passing the night here, he held a council of war, and the day following marched towards Derby; but being alarmed at the approach of the forces under the Duke of Cumberland, he fell back upon Macclesfield, to which place he was pursued by the duke, whom the inhabitants received with every demonstration of joy.

The town is pleasantly situated near the southern extremity of the forest; the greater part stands on the declivity of an eminence rising gradually from the western bank of the river Bollin, which flows through the lower part, hence denominated "The Waters;" these parts are connected by two bridges of stone, and one of wood. The rapid increase of population has created a proportionate augmentation of the number of buildings, and an extension of the town in every direction, within a short period. Many improvements have been made, under the provisions of an act obtained in 1814, by the introduction of police regulations, by widening the streets, and removing unsightly objects; the streets are well paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. A public subscription library, established for more than half a century, contains a valuable collection of works, and a commodious house has recently been taken for the accommodation of the subscribers, and fitted up with reading and other rooms. A public newsroom is supported; and there are a neat theatre, and a handsome suite of assembly-rooms. Macclesfield is noted for the manufacture of silk, which is carried on in all its branches to a considerable extent; the first mill here was erected in 1756, since which period the trade has rapidly increased, and at present there are not less than 70 mills for throwing silk, which is here manufactured into handkerchiefs and broad silks, the weaving of which, with the manufacture of twist, sewing-silk, and buttons, is now the principal source of trade. In 1823, there were 3000 looms in the town, which number has now increased to about 10,000. The cotton manufacture was also introduced about the same time, since which period it has progressively increased; and there are likewise several large dye-houses and other establishments connected with these branches of manufacture. In the neighbourhood are extensive mines of coal, and quarries of slate, and of stone of a superior quality for building, of which great quantities are sent to Stockport, Manchester, Staffordshire, and other parts of the country. A canal has been constructed, passing by the east side of the town, and joining the Peak Forest canal at Marple; and a branch of the Birmingham and Manchester railway, diverging from the main line at Cheadle-Bulkeley, terminates here. The market is on Tuesday; a market for vegetables is held on Saturday; and the fairs are on May 6th, June 22nd, July 11th, Oct. 4th, and November 11th, for cattle, woollen-cloth, hardware, and toys.

Macclesfield, which was constituted a BOROUGH by Ranulph, third earl of Chester of that name, was first incorporated by Edward, Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, in the 45th of Henry III., who conveyed additional privileges, but imposed the usual obligation of grinding at the king's mill, and baking at his oven; and various other charters were subsequently granted till that of Charles II., according to which the town was governed until recently. The corporation now consists of a mayor, 12 aldermen, and 36 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; and the borough is divided into six wards, including the adjoining townships of Sutton and Hurdsfield. The freedom is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, and acquired by servitude. The borough sends two representatives to parliament, and comprises 3145 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The mayor and magistrates, of whom the total number is six, hold public meetings three times a week; and the county justices meet as often at the police-office, for offences committed out of the borough. A court of requests for the recovery of debts under £5 takes place monthly before a barrister and commissioners; a court of record for debts to any amount, arising within the hundred, and a similar court called a halmote court for the manor and forest, are held twice a year by the Earl of Derby, as hereditary steward; and courts leet for these several jurisdictions occur within a month of Michaelmas, at which constables are appointed for the different townships. The guildhall, taken down in 1826, and rebuilt in the Grecian style, at the expense of the corporation, is a spacious edifice, containing, in addition to the court-rooms, handsome assembly and concert-rooms.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £214; it was in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation, till they sold the advowson under the Municipal act. The parochial chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, founded by Eleanor, queen of Edward I., about 1278, and made dependent on the mother church at Prestbury: the tower was formerly surmounted by a spire, which was battered down in the parliamentary war; the north side of the edifice was rebuilt in 1740, and the whole has recently undergone a thorough repair and embellishment, and now forms a handsome building. Christchurch, a spacious structure of brick, with a square tower, was erected in 1775, at the expense of Charles Roe, Esq., who endowed it with £100 per annum, and to whose memory is a monument on the south side of the chancel: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £259, exclusively of rents of pews; patron, C. S. Roe, Esq. St. George's church, in the township of Sutton, erected as a dissenting place of worship, has been purchased by a proprietary for the service of the Established Church, and was consecrated on the 8th of June, 1834. A neat church of stone was lately built in the township of Hurdsfield. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Socinians, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school was founded in 1502, by Sir John Percival, lord mayor of London, born near the town, but the endowment lapsing to the crown, the school was refounded by Edward VI., in 1552, and more amply endowed, under the designation of the "Free Grammar School of King Edward VI.:" the income exceeds £1100 per annum. The school enjoys a high reputation, and in the list of masters appear the names of Brownsverd, a celebrated grammarian and Latin poet, and Brancker, a philosopher and mathematician, both of whom lie interred in the chapel of St. Michael. In 1838, an act was passed enabling the governors to establish a commercial school; and a national school is supported by subscription. An almshouse was founded in 1703, by Mrs. Stanley, for three widows; and various bequests have been left for the poor. The union of Macclesfield comprises 41 parishes or places, containing a population of 56,018. Near the road to Congleton is the Castle-field, supposed to have been the site of the palace of the earls of Chester; and there are some slight vestiges of an ancient mansion, said to have been the residence of the celebrated Duke of Buckingham. Macclesfield gives the title of Earl to the family of Parker.

MACCLESFIELD-FOREST, a chapelry, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Macclesfield; containing 256 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60; patron, Earl of Derby. A school is partly supported by subscription.

MACEFEN, a township, in the parish of MALPAS, union of NANTWICH, Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 2 miles (E.) from Malpas; containing 58 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £32. 4.

MACHEN (St. Michael), a parish, in the union and division of NEWPORT, partly in the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, and partly in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Newport; containing in the English part, 1371 inhabitants, of whom 803 are in Lower, and 568 in Upper, Machen. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Ebba, and on the south by the Rhymney, and contains by computation 3156 acres, of which 349 are common or waste; the soil is generally gravel, alternated with clay; the surface is hilly. The substratum abounds with coal, iron-stone, calamine, and tin; there are extensive quarries of limestone, and a small woollen factory affords employment to a part of the population. The Monmouthshire canal, and the Rhymney and Tyrhowey railways, afford facility of conveyance to Newport. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 16. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Sir Charles Morgan, Bart.: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £14, and the rectorial for £469. 3. 9., and there is a glebe-house, with about an acre of garden. The church is an ancient structure, of the early English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national and an infants' school have been built by Sir Charles Morgan. Here are several mineral springs; also the remains of an old building, called "the Castle."

MACKWORTH (All Saints), a parish, in the union of BELPER, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH,

S. division of the county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Derby; containing, with the township of Mark-Eaton, 561 inhabitants. The lands are chiefly in pasture, and considerable quantities of cheese are sent to the various markets. The surface is pleasingly varied, and richly wooded; the principal timber is oak and ash, which thrive well. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Allestree annexed, valued in the king's books at £9. 3.; net income, £161; patron and impropiator, Francis Mundy, Esq. The church is partly in the decorated style. A girls' school is supported by Mrs. Mundy. Here is remaining the gateway of a castle, anciently the seat of the De Mack-worths, and said to have been demolished during the parliamentary war.

MADDINGTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Amesbury; containing 445 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3973 acres, of which 629 are common or waste land. The manor formerly belonged to Sir Stephen Fox, ancestor of the earls of Ilchester and lords Holland, who assigned it, with the rectory or parsonage impropriate, and the tithes arising within the parish, to certain trustees, to pay to the minister of Maddington £40 per annum, £188 to the hospital of Farley, which he founded in 1638, and the remainder to himself and his heirs for ever. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60; patron and impropiator, James Maton, Esq.

MADEHURST (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPSHIRE, hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Arundel; containing 150 inhabitants. It is situated in a rich and fertile district, and comprises 1870a. 3r. 8p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 8. 10.; net income, £68; patron, Bishop of Chichester; impropiator, John Smith, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £81. 4., and the glebe comprises 23 acres. The church is a plain structure.

MADELEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Newcastle; containing, with the township of Onneley, 1492 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the roads from Whitchurch and Nantwich to Newcastle, and comprises by estimation 5734a. 24p., of which 2070 acres are arable, 2850 meadow and pasture, 630 woodland, and the remainder waste. Its surface is hilly, and the prevailing timber, oak and ash; the soil is very various, in some parts loam, clay, and sand, and in others, gravel and peat bog; the substratum abounds with coal, of which several mines are in operation. The Grand Junction railway passes for more than four miles through the parish, and has a second-class station here. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 16.; patron, and impropiator, Hon. C. Offley. The great tithes have been commuted for £333. 8. 5., and the vicarial for £192, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church is an ancient stone structure. Free schools for boys and girls were endowed in 1645, with a rent-charge of £60, by Sir John Offley, who in the same year founded almshouses for ten persons.

MADELEY-MARKET (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, within the liberties of the borough of WENLOCK, S. division of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Shifnal, 15 (S. E.) from Shrewsbury, and 148 (N. W.) from London; containing 7368 inhabitants. The name of this town indicates its situation between two rivers, and its adjunct arose from the grant of a market, in the time of Henry III., to a community of Cluniac monks at Wenlock, to whom Madeley then belonged. After the disastrous battle of Worcester, in 1651, Charles II. obtained a temporary shelter in a house then occupied by Mr. Wolfe, near the church, and which is still remaining. Madeley stands on rising ground, and extends to Colebrookdale, which is environed by lofty hills and hanging woods, and in which are most extensive iron-works. Across the Severn, here, is a cast-iron bridge of one arch, erected in 1779, the span of which is 100 feet 6 inches, and the height from the base line to the centre, 40 feet; the total weight of iron being 378 tons: all the principal parts were erected in three months. Part of the parish derives the name of Iron-Bridge from this stupendous undertaking. About two miles south-eastward from Madeley, at the junction of the Shropshire canal with the Severn, is Coalport, where coal is landed from the mines in the neighbourhood, and conveyed thence to different parts of the counties of Gloucester and Worcester, to the average extent of 50,000 tons annually. Here are likewise a porcelain manufactory, rope-yard, timber-yard, and mill for extracting linseed-oil. A neat iron bridge was constructed across the river at this point, in 1817, instead of a former one of wood; and not far distant a tunnel, about one mile in length, and partially arched with brick, was begun, and intended as a more direct conveyance for coal, but was never completed. The original market having fallen into disuse, it was revived about 1763, when a new market-house was erected, near the foot of the iron bridge in Colebrookdale. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on January 26th, May 29th, and October 12th. The place is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests for the recovery of debts under 40s.

The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 17. 10.; net income, £241; patron, Rev. Sir E. Kynaston, Bart.; impropiator, Sir J. Hawley, Bart. The ancient church, which exhibited several early Norman specimens, was pulled down in 1796, when the present edifice was erected; and an additional church was built in 1834, containing 1060 sittings, 660 of which are free. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics; and a school is partly supported by subscription. The house of industry was completed in 1797, at an expense of £1086, of which £806 were raised by subscription, and £235 by the sale of certain property previously held in trust for the poor. The union of Madeley comprises 12 parishes or places, containing a population of 26,253. In the different strata of coal, iron-ore, and sandstone which abound in the neighbourhood, numerous petrifactions, with impressions of animal and vegetable substances, of various kinds, have been found. The Rev. John William Fletcher, a native of Switzerland, whose Checks to Antinomianism is a standard theological work, and whose character is so deservedly admired, was appointed to the vicarage of Madeley in 1760, which he held during the remainder of his life; and at his death, in 1785, he was interred in the churchyard.

MADINGLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CHESTERTON, hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Cambridge; containing 282 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely, the appropriator, whose tithes have been commuted for £395, and those of the vicar for £74. 1.; the former has 9, and the latter nearly 10, acres of glebe.

MADLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Hereford; containing 932 inhabitants. The road from Hereford to Hay intersects this parish, which contains 5037 acres of a productive soil. The living is a vicarage, with that of Tiberton annexed, valued in the king's books at £16. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford: the tithes of both parishes have been commuted for £1327, of which £750 are payable to the Dean and Chapter, £565 to the Vicar, and £12 to the Prebendary of Cublington; there are 3 acres of glebe. The church is a large and handsome edifice, principally in the decorated style, with an embattled tower at the west end. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

MADRESFIELD, a parish, in the union of UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, Lower division of the hundred of PER-SHORE, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WOR-CESTER, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Worcester; containing 180 inhabitants. This parish, which is partly bounded on the east by the river Severn, comprises by admeasurement 1192 acres, whereof 356 are arable, 688 pasture, 98 woodland, and 9 hop plantations; the surface is varied, and the soil is a rich deep loam, producing abundant crops of wheat and beans, and apples and pears in profusion. Madresfield Court, a fine old mansion, is the seat of Earl Beauchamp. The living is a rectory, with the chapelry of Clevelode annexed, valued in the king's books at £3. 13. 11½., and in the gift of the Earl: the tithes have been commuted for £222, and the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church exhibits some portions of ancient architecture.

MADRON (St. Madern), a parish, in the union of PENZANCE, W. division of the hundred of PENWITH and of the county of CORNWALL; containing, with the market-town of Penzance, which is within its limits, 11,144 inhabitants, of whom 2566 are in Madron. The parish is situated on the coast, and comprises by measurement 6000 acres, whereof 2440 are common or waste; the surface is boldly undulated, and the higher grounds command a delightful view of Mount's bay and the adjacent country. The substratum is rich in mineral produce, but no mines are worked; stone of sufficient quality for the roads is quarried, and granite of a superior kind is found in abundance. Clay, also, of a peculiar sort, is produced, for making bricks for smelting-houses and furnaces, being capable of enduring an intense degree of heat. The living is a vicarage, with that of Morvah annexed, valued in the king's books at £21. 5. 10.; patron, Rev. M. N. Peters; impropiators, Rev. C. V. Le Grice and D. P. Le Grice, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £431. 10. 10., and the vicarial for £660; the vicarial glebe contains $\frac{1}{2}$ an acre. The church is partly in the decorated and later English styles, with a square embattled tower. There is a district church at Penzance; and the Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans have places of worship. A school was founded by Mr. George Daniel, and endowed with lands, now let for about £106 per annum. Here is a stone with an ancient British inscription, stating it to be a sepulchral monument to Rialobran, son of Cun-oval; also the once celebrated well of St. Madern.

MAER (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing, with the hamlet of Maerway-Lane, 559 inhabitants, of whom 287 are in the township, 7 miles (S. W.) from Newcastle. This place derives its name from a natural lake or mere, which occupies about 22 acres, at the foot of the village, and is the source of the Tern. The parish comprises by measurement 2614 acres. On the north side are several rocky hills, rising abruptly to a considerable elevation, and rendered highly picturesque by having their summits covered with plantations. Maer heath, an extensive rugged moor, lying west of the village, was inclosed and divided among the freeholders upwards of twenty years ago; but a large portion of it is still in a state of nature, and much of it is planted with trees. There are two sandstone quarries, which are worked for rough building. The Whitmore station on the Grand Junction railway is within half a mile. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Josiah Wedgwood, Esq., who is also impropiator: the great tithes have been commuted for £45, and the small for £160; the glebe comprises about an acre, with a house. The church, mostly rebuilt in 1610, is a neat structure, in the later English style, with an embattled tower; in the chancel is a handsome monument to Sir John Bowyer, Knt., and his lady. A school on the Lancasterian plan is supported by subscription.

MAERWAY-LANE, a hamlet, in the parish of MAER, union of NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 272 inhabitants.

MAESBURY, a township, in the parish, hundred, and union of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP; containing 484 inhabitants.

MAGDALENE-STOCKLINCH, county of SOMERSET.—See STOCKLINCH, MAGDALENE.

MAGHULL, a chapelry, in the parish of HALSALL, union of ORMSKIRK, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Liverpool; containing 1032 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises 2059a. 6p., of which 1140 acres are arable, and 760 pasture: the Leeds and Liverpool canal passes through it. The chapel has been repaired and enlarged: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £122; patron, Rector of Halsall, whose tithes here have been commuted for £630. A school is endowed with £12 per annum.

MAGOR (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, 8 miles (E. by S.) from Newport; containing, with Redwick, 641 inhabitants, of whom 386 are in the township. The parish is bounded on the south by the Bristol Channel, and consists of about 1300 acres of land, of which the soil is of a sandy and loamy quality, on a basis of limestone. A fair for cattle, &c., is held on the 11th of October. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Redwick annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 1. 0½.; net income, £285; patron and impropiator, Duke of Beaufort. It has been augmented with land, which lets at £54 per annum, purchased with grants from Queen Anne's Bounty. The church, which exhibits combinations of the early, decorated, and later English styles, is a cruciform structure, with side aisles, and a tower rising from the intersection of the transepts. Close to the church wall are the remains of a religious house. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

Corporation Seal.

MAIDENHEAD, a market-town, partly in the parish of BRAY, and partly in that of COOKHAM, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of BRAY and COOKHAM, union of COOKHAM, county of BERKS, 13 miles (N. E. by E.) from Reading, and 26 (W.) from London; containing 3315 inhabitants.

The ancient name of this place was South Aylington, or Elington, to distinguish it from a manor called North Elington, now North Town. The town consists principally of one street, which extends to the bottom of Folly Hill, and separates the two parishes, the north side being in that of Cookham, and the south in that of Bray; it is lighted with gas and paved, and is on the great thoroughfare from the metropolis to Bath, Bristol, and the West of England. Tradition states that at the house formerly known as the Greyhound inn, the unfortunate Charles I. had his last interview with his family. A bridge of timber was erected over the Thames here previously to the year 1297, and a tree was allowed annually out of Windsor Forest for its repair. This bridge was succeeded, in 1772, by the present substantial edifice, consisting of seven semicircular arches of stone, with three smaller arches of brick at each end, built by the corporation from a design of Sir Robert Taylor, at an expense of about £20,000: by an act of parliament the corporation were authorised to transfer the tolls received from vessels passing under the bridge to the traffic on the road over it. The adjacent country is in a high state of cultivation, and is richly adorned with woodland scenery, interspersed with elegant villas; the east bank of the Thames bearing high its hanging slope, enlivened by the crowning heights of Taplow, and the dark belting wood of Clifden, the respective seats of the Earl of Orkney and Sir George Warrender, Bart., and the latter celebrated by Pope. The trade is chiefly in malt, corn, meal, and timber, which are conveyed to London. The Great Western railway has a station at this place, and the line is carried across the Thames by a handsome bridge of 10 brick arches, of which the two principal, each spanning 128 feet, are the widest, in comparison with the smallness of the elevation, of any brick arches ever built; the others, which serve to lighten the abutments, are from 15 to 25 feet span, and the length of the whole is 768 feet. The market, established by Henry VI., is on Wednesday, and the trade in corn is of the best description. There are three fairs, each of which continues for three days, commencing respectively on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week, for horses, horned-cattle, and pigs; September 29th, for horses, cattle, and the hiring of servants; and November 30th, for horses and other cattle.

The principal inhabitants of the town, with a priest from the adjacent priory of Hurley, as warden, were constituted a guild, or fraternity, so early as 1452, by letters-patent of Henry VI., with permission to elect brethren and sisters into it, and to use a common seal; their chief object being to keep the bridge in repair and uphold the chantry, for which purpose a toll was granted at the bridge, on the river, and on all commodities sold in the market. These privileges were suspended at the Reformation; but in 1577, an inspeximus was issued, and it is a curious fact that, in the reign of Elizabeth, new letters-patent were bestowed by that queen upon the fraternity, confirming all former liberties, with its ancient Roman Catholic rights. This revival, however, continued only for four years, when the guild was abolished, and a lay corporation substituted; for, in the 24th of Elizabeth, was conferred the first charter of incorporation, which was renewed by James I., and, with still further powers, by Charles II. A charter, subsequently granted by James II., was the governing one previously to the passing of the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, by which the corporation now consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors; the total number of borough magistrates is seven, and petty-sessions for the division are held here by the county justices, on the second and fourth Monday in every month. The town-hall is a handsome and commodious structure, under which the market is held; and there is a small gaol for the temporary confinement of criminals. The free chapel, dedicated to St. Andrew and St. Mary Magdalene, was rebuilt in 1826, by subscription, aided by a grant of £500 from the Incorporated Society, nearly on the site of the former edifice; it is a neat structure, in a chaste and simple style, from a design of the late Mr. Busby, and contains 400 free sittings. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, about £200; patron, S. F. Maitland, Esq. The chapel first erected was commenced about 1269, by some of the inhabitants, on the boundary line of the two parishes of Cookham and Bray. A commodious parsonage-house has been erected by the corporation. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Wesleyans, and Independents. A national school is supported, partly by £30 per annum from an estate given by Abraham Spoor. A school for girls was established and endowed by Lady Pocock; and every two years a bounty of £100, in sums of £10 each, is given to ten female servants of good character, who have lived in the same family for a period of seven years. An almshouse for eight men and their wives was founded in 1659, by James Smyth, and has an endowment of £48 per annum. Sir Isaac and Lady Pocock bequeathed property for supplying poor persons weekly with bread, and 100 families with bread, meat, and coal, at Christmas; together with £50 in small sums to the aged and infirm, at the commencement of every year.

MAIDEN-NEWTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of DORSET, 8¼ miles (N. W.) from Dorchester; containing 729 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 2853 acres. The manufacture of twine is carried on extensively, giving employment to about 70 persons. A market formerly held under charter of Henry III., has been long discontinued; but a fair for cattle is still held on the 22nd of November. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £30. 5., and in the gift of the Earls of Egremont and Ilchester alternately: the tithes have been commuted for £496, and the glebe comprises 111 acres. The church is an ancient cruciform structure, in the Norman style, with a large embattled tower rising from the intersection. Near it is the rectory-house, a spacious antique building, the windows of which exhibit the arms of Wadham, Wyndham, &c., in stained glass. There are places of worship for Independents, and a national school. At the southern extremity of the parish is a fine specimen of Roman tessellated pavement.

MAIDEN-WELL, a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Louth; containing 59 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Farforth, united in 1753 to the rectory of Ruckland; appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Lincoln.

MAIDFORD (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of TOWCESTER, hundred of GREENS-NORTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Towcester; containing 339 inhabitants, and comprising by estimation 1049a. 1r. 17p. There are extensive quarries of limestone, of excellent quality, which supply the adjoining parishes with lime for manure; also some veins of good freestone. The manufacture of silk stockings is carried on to a moderate extent, and many of the females are employed in making lace. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 9.; net income, £289; patron, W. Grant, Esq. The greater portion of the tithes has been commuted for land, under an act of inclosure; the glebe comprises 171 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure, with a lofty well-built tower, surmounted by a pyramidal roof of tiles. There is a chalybeate spring, formerly in high repute.

MAIDS'-MORETON.—See MORETON, MAIDS'.

Seal and Arms.

MAIDSTONE (ALL SAINTS), a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of MAIDSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, of which it is the county town, 8 miles (S.) from Rochester, and $34\frac{1}{2}$ (S. E. by E.) from London; containing, with the hamlet of Loddington, 18,086 inhabitants, of whom 9206 are in East, and 8880 in West, Maidstone. Some writers have thought this to be the Caer Meguiad, or Megwad, enumerated by Nennius among the principal cities in Britain. Camden considers it to be the Vagniaca mentioned in the second Itinerary of Antoninus; but more modern authors are doubtful as to the accuracy of this opinion, on a supposition that that celebrated antiquary mistook the Watling-street for another Roman road passing by this town to London, from the Portus Lemanis, the landing-place for the Romans after the Portus Rutupensis and Dubris had fallen into disuse. All, however, allow Maidstone to have been occupied by the Romans, and that it was at an early period of considerable note; and several Roman coins and urns have been found in the neighbourhood. The Saxons named it Medwegestun, a town on the Medwege or middle river, now Medway; in Domesday book it is written Meddestane, and in records of the time of Edward I., Maydenestane, from which the transition to its present appellation is easy. Among the historical events that contribute to distinguish the place may be mentioned the celebrated meeting on Penenden heath, about a mile north-eastward from the town, for the purpose of adjusting the differences that had arisen between Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Odo, Earl of Kent, brother of the Conqueror, in consequence of the appropriation by the latter of various lands and privileges previously enjoyed by the primate, and which this assembly decided should be restored. During the reign of Mary, Maidstone was deprived of its charter, in consequence of the firmness the inhabitants evinced in support of the Protestant cause, by opposing the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain; many of them were put to death, and Sir Thomas Wyatt, who had excited them to make a stand in favour of their religious principles, was executed on Hay hill, London, and his estates were confiscated. In 1648 the town was stormed by Fairfax, at the head of 10,000 of the parliamentary forces, and taken after a most obstinate resistance on the part of the royalists.

The town, which is well paved, and lighted with gas, consists chiefly of four large streets, and stands principally on the eastern bank of the river Medway, over which is a bridge of five arches. The inhabitants are plentifully supplied with water, conveyed from a reservoir at Rocky Hill, about half a mile distant, by means of pipes laid across the bed of the Medway. Among the recent improvements is the formation of a new line of road from Trinity Church, past the infirmary, into the Queen Anne road, where are several good houses; also the erection of some handsome houses near the London road, called Rocky-Hill Terrace; and respectable residences on the Bower-road. Pleasantly situated on the bank of the river are the barracks, used as a dépôt for the king's regiments of cavalry serving in the East Indies and at the Cape of Good Hope, and for drilling recruits previous to embarkation. Opposite, on the other side of the road, are the county ball-rooms, built in 1819; and a theatre, a small neat building in the High-street, is opened every third year for a limited number of nights. The Medway being navigable up to the town for large hoys, Maidstone enjoys the advantages of a cheap communication by water with the metropolis; and in 1843 an act was obtained to enable the South-Eastern Railway Company to make a branch railway to the town. Here are mills for the finer sorts of paper; many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of blankets, thread, hop-bagging, ropes, linseed-oil, and oil-cakes; and a considerable trade is carried on in corn, timber, grocery, orchard-fruit, and hops, for the production of which two last the soil in the neighbourhood is particularly favourable. The market for corn and hops is held on Thursday, in a magnificent room recently erected for the purpose; and at the back of these premises, that for provisions takes place on Thursday and Saturday. The market for cattle is on the second Tuesday in each month; and the fairs are on February 13th, May 12th, June 20th, and October 17th, for cattle and pedlery, and the last also for hops.

The town was INCORPORATED in 1549, by Edward VI., but it appears that the charter was not in force in the 2nd year of the reign of Elizabeth, who bestowed a new one, which was confirmed and extended by James I. and George II., the charter of which latter monarch, bearing date 17th of June, 1747, was that whereby the town was governed until the passing of the Municipal act. The government is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors; the borough is divided into four wards, called High-street, King-street, Stone-street, and Westborough; the number of magistrates is eleven. The freedom is obtained by birth and apprenticeship. Maidstone returns two members to parliament; the borough is co-extensive with the parish, comprising an area of 4333 acres, and the mayor is returning officer. The corporation hold quarter-sessions for the trial of persons charged with offences not capital; petty-sessions take place twice a week; and the assizes for the county, and the quarter-sessions for the western division, are held here. The shire-hall, on that part of Penenden Heath which is in the parish of Boxley, is a neat edifice of stone, rebuilt in the year 1830: the heath is the place of election for the western division of the county. The new county gaol, situated at the north end of the town, contains seventeen wards for males; the house of correction for males has twelve wards. The common gaol for females consists of four classes, and the house of correction for females comprises three. New courts, in which the assizes are held, have been built adjoining the gaol; the structure occupies fourteen acres of ground inclosed within walls, and is built of the Kentish ragstone procured on the spot.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the appropriator; net income, £720. The church, situated at the south-western end of the town, is the largest in the county, but when built is not with certainty known. Archbishop Courtenay obtained leave of Richard II. to convert the parochial edifice into a collegiate one, for the warden, chaplain, &c., of a college which he had established here. The church had formerly two chantries, one founded in 1366, by Robert Vintner, of the parish of Boxley, and the other about 1405, by Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury. On the dissolution of the college, the church was again used for its original purpose. The altar-piece, painted by Mr. William Jefferys, a native of the town, justly excites admiration; in the vestry-room is a parochial library, considerably augmented in 1735 by a collection left by Dr. Bray. A district church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and containing 1200 free seats, and 800 others, has been built at an expense of about £13,000: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £335; patron, Rev. James Reeve. Another district church, with a neat parsonage-house, in the hamlet of Tovil, was erected on a site given by the Earl of Romney, and consecrated by the Archbishop, in August, 1839; it is of Kentish ragstone, and was endowed by the Archbishop and John Charlton, Esq., lord of the manor of Pimps-Court. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Unitarians. The Free Grammar school was founded in 1548, by the corporation, who purchased the lands belonging to the fraternity of Corpus Christi for £205, given by the crown, on the dissolution of the college founded by Archbishop Courtenay; it has two scholarships in University College, Oxford, of £15 per annum each, founded agreeably to the will, dated December 15th, 1618, of the Rev. Robert Gunsley. The Blue-coat school was founded in 1711, by the Rev. Dr. Woodward, for girls; Sir Charles Booth's school, endowed by him, in 1795, with the interest of £2000 (now augmented to more than £3000), affords instruction to boys; and a national and a Lancasterian school are supported by subscription. An excellent infirmary and dispensary was built in 1832, and there are several societies for the relief of the indigent. The almshouses are, six founded and endowed by Sir John Banks, Bart., a native of the town, and one of its representatives in several parliaments, who, in 1697, bequeathed the yearly income of £60; six by Edward Hunter, Esq., in 1748; four by John Brenchley, Esq., in 1789; and three by Mrs. Duke, for decayed gentlewomen of the Presbyterian denomination: in 1826 another house was added. The poor law union of Maidstone comprises 15 parishes or places, containing a population of 32,310.

The palace here, which was formerly the residence of the archbishops of Canterbury, was commenced in 1348, by Archbishop Ufford, and finished by Simon Islip; it now forms two dwelling-houses. An hospital for pilgrims, or travellers, was founded in 1244, or, according to some, in 1260, by Boniface of Savoy, Archbishop of Canterbury, and dedicated to St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Thomas the Martyr: the chapel of the house, called St. Peter's, was consecrated in 1839, and is now used for the district of Westborough. It was called the hospital of the New work of Prestes Helle, and a dwelling-house erected on part of the site is still known by the name of Newark. The college founded by Archbishop Courtenay, which possessed various lands, was dissolved about 1546, and is now a farmhouse. The house of the fraternity of Corpus Christi, at present used as the grammar school, was founded by a few of the inhabitants; the religious professed the rules of St. Benedict, and their number was from 120 to 130. A small part of St. Faith's Church, considered by some parochial, though more probably a free chapel, is still remaining; it was, at successive periods, used as a place of worship by the Walloons, who settled in the town in the reign of Elizabeth, and by English Presbyterians. In digging the foundation for a soap-manufactory, near the ground on which the chapel stood, several human skeletons were found. The Rev. William Newton, who published the History and Antiquities of Maidstone; and William Woollet, engraver to the king, to whose memory a monument was erected in Westminster Abbey, were natives of the town; and in the churchyard are deposited the remains of William Shipley, Esq., founder of the Society of Arts. Maidstone gives the inferior title of Viscount to the Earl of Winchilsea.

MAIDWELL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BRIXWORTH, hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 10 miles (N.) from Northampton; containing 258 inhabitants. The parish, comprehending also Maidwell St. Peter's, formerly distinct, is intersected by the road between Northampton and Harborough, and comprises 1765 acres; the surface is agreeably undulated, and the soil in some parts clayey, and in others suited to the growth of good corn. Limestone is quarried for building purposes and for burning into lime. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 8. 1½.; net income, £218; patron, H. H. Hungerford, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1696; the glebe comprises 92 acres. The church is a small handsome edifice, very neatly arranged, and contains some monuments to the Hazlewood family. St. Peter's church, having become dilapidated, was taken down in 1543. A rent-charge of £20 has been appropriated by Lady Trott to the foundation of a scholarship at Clare Hall, Cambridge, for a youth of Maidwell. In a place called the Dales is a petrifying spring, and there is a chalybeate spring near Scotland wood.

MAINSFORTH, a township, in the parish of BISHOP'S-MIDDLEHAM, union of SEDFIELD, N. E. division of STOCKTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 8½ miles (S. S. E.) from Durham; containing 42 inhabitants. The township comprises about 810 acres; it is intersected by the little Skerne, and the ford or main way across a morass formed by the stream gives name to the village. Limestone abounds. Some years since, a pair of moose deer horns was found in a hollow, upon the summit of a conical hill near the place. On an adjoining hill is an old house, named the Swan-house, where certain dues called Swan-oats, were formerly paid to the convent of Durham, and afterwards to the chapter. Mainsforth was the residence of the late Robert Surtees, Esq., the indefatigable antiquary and accomplished scholar, who published several folio volumes of an elaborate history of the county.

MAINSTONE (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of CLUN, partly in the hundred of PURLOW, S. division of SALOP, and partly in the hundred and county of MONTGOMERY (North Wales), 4 miles (W. by S.) from Bishop's-Castle; containing, in the English portion, 276 inhabitants, of whom 91 are in the township. The parish occupies a considerable portion of hilly and undulated ground, and is surrounded by the parishes of Clun, Bishop's-Castle, Lydham, and Church-stoke. A small brook rises in, and flows through, the parish, which is also intersected by Offa's dyke; and the main road from Bishop's-Castle to Montgomery passes at the extremity of the township of Castlewright. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £293. The church is 112 feet long, by 22 wide, and contains 140 sittings, of which 40 are free. A school is partly supported by subscription.

MAINSTONE, a tything, in the parish of ROMSEY-EXTRA, union of ROMSEY, hundred of KING'S-SOMBOURN, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 144 inhabitants.

MAISEMORE (St. Giles), a parish, in the Lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county, of GLOUCESTER, 2½ miles (N. N. W.) from Gloucester; containing 421 inhabitants. At the time of the Conquest, this place formed part of the parish of St. Mary-de-Lode, in Gloucester, but it was separated at a very early period, though the exact time is not known. The name is derived from Maes, a plain, and Mor, water, descriptive of its situation on the banks of the river Severn, which occasionally overflows the adjoining lands. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £89; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol: the tithes were commuted for land in 1793. The church is partly Norman, but principally in the decorated and later English styles. A school is chiefly supported by the incumbent.

MAISEY-HAMPTON.—See HAMPTON, MAISEY.

MAKER (St. Macra), a parish, in the union of ST. GERMANS, partly in the S. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, and partly in the hundred of ROBOROUGH, Roborough and S. divisions of DEVON, 2¼ miles (S. by W.) from Devonport; containing, with the tything of Vaultershome, 2725 inhabitants, of whom 1569 are in Cornwall. This parish comprises by computation 2183 acres, of which 71 are common or waste land; and is bounded on the south-east by Plymouth Sound, for the defence of which a formidable battery has been erected on the heights above the village. Mount-Edgumbe House, the noble seat of the Edgumbe family, and from which its representative derives the title of Earl, was originally built in the reign of Mary, and, with the exception only of Salcombe, was the last garrison that held out for Charles I.; it occupies an elevated site, commanding an extensive prospect, and combining within its domain a variety of picturesque and beautiful scenery. At the populous village of Inceworth, and also at Millbrook (formerly market-towns), fairs for cattle are held, at the former on May 1st, and at the latter on September 29th, when courts leet are held for those places, at which a portreeve, constables, and other officers are appointed. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £23. 11. 0½., and has a net income of £223; the patronage and impropriation belong to the Crown. The church is in Devon; and, occupying a commanding site on a hill between Mount-Edgumbe and Ramhead, its steeple serves as a landmark, and in time of war is made a signal station. It contains some interesting monuments to the Edgumbe family. At Millbrook is an Episcopal chapel. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Baptists; and a national school is supported by subscription.

MALBOROUGH, a parish, in the union of KINGSBRIDGE, hundred of STANBOROUGH, Stanborough and Coleridge, and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Kingsbridge; containing, with the chapelry of Salcombe, 1951 inhabitants. This place is situated at the southern extremity of the county, on the coast of the English Channel, and was formerly defended by Iton Castle, erected in 1336, of which there are some slight remains, and by another called Fort Charles, which, during the civil war in the reign of Charles I., was repaired by that monarch, at an expense of £3000, and was taken by the parliamentary forces in 1645. The parish comprises 4635 acres, of which 1010 are waste, and the remainder arable and pasture; the soil is partly a white loam, partly red marl, and partly sand. The neighbourhood is remarkable for the mild temperature of its climate; and at Woodville, within its limits, lemons, oranges, citrons, and olives flourish in the open air, requiring only temporary protection in very severe weather. The surface is hilly, and the scenery richly diversified. An estuary extends from Bolt-Head, in the parish, to Kingsbridge quay, a distance of six miles. The Earl of Devon holds a court of admiralty here, the jurisdiction of which embraces an extensive line of coast. The living is annexed, with those of South Huish and South Milton, to the vicarage of West Alvington. The church, which has a spire, is situated on a commanding eminence near Bolt-Head on the English Channel. A school is partly supported by the rent of parish lands.

MALDEN (St. John), a parish, in the union, and Second division of the hundred, of KINGSTON, E. division of SURREY, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Ewell; containing 232 inhabitants. At this place was anciently the original establishment of the College of Merton, founded here in 1264, and removed in 1267 to Oxford; the site of the buildings is near the church. The parish comprises 1255a. 1r. 13p., of which 1053 acres are arable, 125 pasture, and 45 wood and common; the surface is varied, and a rapid stream called Hogsmill flows through the lands. Extensive powder-mills have been established. The living is a vicarage, with that of Chessington annexed, valued in the king's books at £8. 5.; net income, £417; patrons and appropriators, Warden and Scholars of Merton College. The great tithes have been commuted for £240, and the vicarial for £75, with a glebe of 15 acres. A school is maintained by the incumbent.

MALDON, a borough, port, and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, 10 miles (E.) from Chelmsford, and 38 (E. N. E.) from London; containing 3967 inhabitants. This place is supposed by Camden and by Horsley to have been the Camalodunum of the Romans, one of the earliest colonies established by that people in Britain, but which other antiquaries have fixed at Colchester. Its name is said to have been derived from an altar dedicated to Mars, under the name of Camulus, by which also that divinity is designated in some coins, still extant, of Cunobeline, King of the Trinobantes, who, prior to the conquest of the Romans, had his royal residence in the town. During its occupation by the Romans, in the reign of Nero, it was destroyed by an insurrection of the Britons, who defeated with great slaughter the ninth Roman Legion, which had been sent to its assistance. From the Roman name Camalodunum, it was called by the Saxons Meal dune, or Male dune, from which its present appellation is evidently derived. During the time of the Saxons, it does not appear to have been distinguished by any events of importance previously to its destruction by the Danes, from which it was restored by Edward the Elder, son of Alfred, who, to guard it against future attacks, fortified it with a castle, of which there are at present no visible remains. The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence, near the confluence of the rivers Blackwater and Chelmer, and consists principally of one spacious street, extending for more than a mile from west to east, and intersected by a smaller street. The houses, which were in general ancient, have been much improved in their appearance, and within the last half century many ranges of handsome modern ones have been erected; the town is lighted with gas, partially paved, and amply supplied with water. A library was founded by Dr. Thomas Plume, who bequeathed all his valuable books and pictures, and £40 per annum as a salary to a librarian in holy orders, who should reside in the town; and there are some book societies. The haven, formed by the bay of the Blackwater river, affords safe anchorage to vessels not drawing more than eight feet of water, and ships of heavier burthen anchor in the offing, and discharge their cargoes by lighters on the quay. The trade is chiefly in coal, of which not less than 90,000 chaldrons are, on the average, imported annually; also in corn, deals, and iron. The number of vessels of above 50 tons registered at the port is 58; and their aggregate burthen 4704 tons. There is an excellent fishery, extending for more than 20 miles along the coast; and oysters of a very superior quality, called the Wall-fleet oysters, are found in abundance. The custom-house is a neat brick building. A canal from Heybridge to Chelmsford passes within a mile of the town. The market, principally for corn, is on Thursday; and fairs take place on May 1st and September 13th and 14th.

Admiralty Seal, now disused.

Maldon claims to be a BOROUGH by prescription. Its burgesses are mentioned in Domesday book, where it is recorded that "in the half hundred of Maldune the king has one honour and pasture for 100 sheep;" also "180 houses which the burgesses hold, and 18 demolished manses, 15 of which (burgesses) hold half a hide and twenty acres, and the other men hold no more than their own houses in the borough." The earliest known charter was granted in 1155, by Henry II., who gave to the burgesses all the possessions which they then held of the crown, and all their liberties, by tenure of free burgage, the service reserved being the supply of one ship for 40 days, when summoned by the king: to which liberties and customs was then added a complete exemption from the county jurisdiction. This charter was afterwards confirmed several times. The borough is now governed by a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, by the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., c. 76, and the number of magistrates is six. The freedom is inherited by birth (not limited within the borough), and obtained by servitude. The town first exercised the elective franchise in the 2nd of Edward III., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the adjoining parish of Heybridge was, in 1832, added to the ancient borough for electoral purposes, comprising together an area of 5274 acres: the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session on the days before those for the county; and the petty-sessions for the hundred of Dengie are held here weekly. The admiralty jurisdiction was totally abolished by the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV. The town-hall is an ancient edifice of brick, built in the reign of Henry VI., and called D'Arcy's tower.

The old borough comprises the parishes of All Saints, containing 864; St. Peter, 1878; and St. Mary, 1225, inhabitants. The united parishes of All Saints and St. Peter comprise by measurement 1430 acres, of which 40 are in the former. The living of All Saints is a vicarage, with that of St. Peter's annexed, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £319; patron, Rev. J. Matthew; impropiators, the Landowners. The great tithes of St. Peter's have been commuted for £6, and the vicarial for £212. The church is a spacious structure, in the early Norman and early English styles, with a triangular tower surmounted by an hexagonal spire; in the south aisle are three chapels, or chantries, founded by Robert D'Arcy, in the reign of Henry VI., and there are various ancient monuments. For its repair, premises, producing £50 per annum, were devised by Mrs. Anastasia Wentworth, in 1630. The church of St. Peter has been demolished, the tower only remaining, adjoining to which is the library erected by Dr. Plume. The living of St. Mary's is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster; net income, £165. The church, a large and very ancient structure, is said to have been founded prior to the Norman Conquest, by Ingelric, a Saxon nobleman; part of it was rebuilt in the reign of Charles I., and a gallery was erected in 1834. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans. Ralph Breder, in 1608, bequeathed £300 for the endowment of a free grammar school, to which several small bequests were subsequently added; a national school is partly supported by £25 per annum from Dr. Plume's charity, and there are some charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. The union of Maldon comprises 32 parishes or places, containing a population of 20,838.

Within less than a mile of the town are the remains of the Abbey of Beleigh, founded in 1180, by Robert Mantell, for Præmonstratensian canons, and dedicated to St. Nicholas, and the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was £196. 6. 5.: the chapel, which is the most perfect portion of the ruins, is a small edifice, chiefly in the early English style, with later insertions; the roof is groined, and supported on slender-shafted columns and gracefully pointed arches. Henry Bouchier, Earl of Essex, and his Countess, were interred in the chapel; and in digging for gravel in the ground adjoining, some leaden coffins and skeletons were discovered. A priory for Carmelite friars was established in 1292, by Richard Gravesend, Bishop of London, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was £26. 0. 8.; but there are no vestiges of it at present, except the garden walls. An hospital for lepers was founded by one of the English monarchs, prior to the 16th of Edward II., and, by Edward IV., was annexed to the abbey of Beleigh; the remains, now converted into a barn, exhibit a mixture of stone and of bricks and tiles, which appear to have been of Roman origin. To the west of the town are the remains of a camp of quadrilateral form, including 22 acres, through which is the road to Chelmsford: on the north is a fine spring, called Cromwell's. Dr. Plume, Archdeacon of Rochester, who founded the Plumean Professorship of Astronomy and Experimental Philosophy at Cambridge, was born at Maldon in 1630. The town gives the inferior title of Viscount to the Earl of Essex.

MALHAM, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-IN-MALHAM-DALE, union of SETTLE, W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Settle; containing 233 inhabitants. This township is situated in the fertile vale to which it gives name, and comprises about 3870 acres, principally the property of Lord Ribblesdale, who is lord of the manor. The lands are chiefly pasture and meadow, and lying on a substratum of limestone; the herbage is of the finest quality. Calamine and lead are found in the neighbourhood, and mines have been wrought by successive adventurers with ruinous effect, and are still in unprofitable operation. The surface is strikingly varied, and the scenery of the boldest and most romantic character, finely contrasting with some parts which are of softer features and more pleasingly picturesque. At the head of the dale is Malham Cove, a gigantic mass of limestone rock nearly 300 feet in height, extending across the valley, and at the foot of which issues a rivulet, that, in times of flood, not finding vent for its accumulating waters, rises to the summit of this stupendous barrier, and precipitates itself with resistless fury into the vale beneath, forming a truly magnificent cataract. Near the village is Jenet's Cave, a dark and gloomy recess, overhung with ivy; and about a mile to the east is Gordale Scar, a huge cluster of limestone rocks, nearly 300 feet in height, apparently torn asunder in some parts as if by some great natural convulsion, and projecting several yards over the line of their base. The village is in the most fertile part of the vale. A fair for lambs is held on the 30th of June, and continued on the 1st of July as a pleasure-fair; and a fair for sheep is held on the 15th of October. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A free school was founded in 1717, by Rowland Brayshaw, Esq., who endowed it with property now producing £74 per annum.

MALHAM-MOOR, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-IN-MALHAM-DALE, union of SETTLE, W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (N. E.) from Settle; containing 102 inhabitants. The township comprises about 8880 acres, the property of Lord Ribblesdale and others; the surface is chiefly high moorland, affording tolerable pasturage for sheep, and the scenery abounds with variety and beauty. Within an area inclosed by precipitous rocks of limestone, is a sheet of water called the Tarn, a lake long celebrated for its trout and perch, weighing from 3 to 10lb.; and which, on one side overflowing its barrier, or forcing its way through some fissures in the rock, forms a picturesque cascade thirty yards in height. On an eminence commanding a fine view of the lake and its surrounding scenery, is Tarn House, the handsome seat of Lord Ribblesdale. The whole of the lands formerly belonged to the abbey of Fountains, and on the Dissolution were granted as part of the demesnes to Sir Richard Gresham.

MALIN'S-LEE, a township, in the parish of DAWLEY MAGNA, union of MADELEY, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 2721 inhabitants.

MALLERSTANG, a chapelry, in the parish of KIRKBY-STEPHEN, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Kirkby-Stephen; containing 223 inhabitants. The township comprises 4944 acres, of which 3006 are common or waste land. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £64; patron, Earl of Thanet. The chapel, having fallen to ruins, was repaired in 1663, by the celebrated Countess of Pembroke, who endowed it with lands now producing £23 per annum, on condition that the curate should teach the children of the dale. At Castlethwaite are the ruins of a square tower that formed part of Pendragon Castle, built by Uter Pendragon, in the time of Vortigern; the walls are twelve feet thick. It was at one period the seat of the lords de Clifford, and was burned by the Scots about the year 1541, but was completely repaired in 1661, by the Countess of Pembroke, who also built the bridge across the Eden, and erected the stone pillar on the hill called Morrill's Seat. The castle was dismantled by the Earl of Thanet, in 1681. Near it is an ancient fortification, surrounded by a moat and vallum. At the southern extremity of the chapelry rises the lofty mountain called Wild Boar Fell.

MALLING, EAST (St. James), a parish, in the union of MALLING, hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Maidstone; containing 1578 inhabitants. The river Medway bounds the parish on the north: the manufacture of paper is carried on to some extent, and a fair for pedlery is held on July 15th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 8. 4.; patron and impropriator, Sir J. Twisden, Bart. The great tithes have been commuted for £210, and the vicarial for £800, and the glebe comprises $19\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is a handsome structure, with a square tower. The Rev. Edward Holme, in 1781, erected and endowed a school, in which children are now educated on the national plan; and in 1829, Mrs. Elizabeth Smith founded and endowed five almshouses for widows.

MALLING, SOUTH (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of LEWES, hundred of RINGMER, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 1 mile (N.) from Lewes; containing 646 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the river Ouse. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £105; patroness, Lady Maclean; impropriators, the principal Landowners. The church, described as collegiate in Domesday book, and said to have been founded by Ceadwalla, King of the West Saxons, who died in 668, is a small neat edifice, rebuilt on the site of the former, and consecrated May 23rd, 1632; it was repaired and repewed by subscription in 1837; the chancel contains an altar-tomb to the memory of Sir William and Lady Kemp. The dean and prebendaries possessed, at the Dissolution, a revenue of £45. 12. 5. The archbishops of Canterbury had formerly a palace here, of which the chapel has been converted into a cottage. In December, 1836, an avalanche of snow, from the hill above the workhouse, fell upon the building, by which eight persons were killed. Richard Russell, M.D., whose treatise on the efficacy of the sea water of Brighton, laid the foundation of the subsequent prosperity of that place, was buried here.

MALLING, WEST, or TOWN (St. Mary), a parish, and the head of a union, and formerly a market-town, in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Maidstone, and 29 (S. E. by E.) from London; containing 1784 inhabitants. In the year 1090, a Benedictine nunnery was founded here by Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester, in honour of the Blessed Virgin. About a century afterwards, the town and the nunnery were nearly destroyed by fire, but soon restored, and the revenue of the latter, at the Dissolution, was estimated at £245. 10. 2½: the front of the abbey, which is of Norman architecture, with later insertions, still remains, forming an interesting ruin. The town is neat and clean, and contains some good houses; the streets are wide, and well paved, and the surrounding walks and scenery are pleasing and picturesque. Petty-sessions for the upper south division of the lathe of Aylesford are held here on the first Monday in every month. The market, granted, with the fairs, to the abbess, in the reign of Henry III., was held on Saturday: fairs take place on August 12th and October 2nd, for pedlery, and November 17th, for cattle. The parish contains 1230 acres, 560 of which are woodland. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; income, £400; patron and impropriator, T. A. Douce, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, with a fine Norman tower at the west end, and contains a splendid monument to Sir Robert Brett: the roof having fallen in 1778, through the decay of the main columns, the whole of the nave was rebuilt; the old spire of the tower has been removed, and an elegant one erected by subscription. Here is a place of worship for Baptists; and a school is supported by subscription. The poor law union of Malling comprises 22 parishes or places, containing a population of 17,933: the workhouse, calculated to receive 360 inmates, is situated on the road to Mereworth.

MALMESBURY, a borough and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of MALMESBURY, Malmesbury and Kingswood, and N. divisions of WILTS, 42 miles (N.) from Salisbury, and 94 (W.) from London; containing, with the chapelries of Corstone and Rodborne, and the tythings of Burton-Hill, Cole with West Park, and Milbourn, 2367 inhabitants. This place is stated by Leland to have been an ancient British town, called Caer Bladon; but its origin may, with more probability, be ascribed to the period of the Saxon heptarchy. A castle, named Ingelburne, existed before the middle of the seventh century; and about 642, Maildolph, an Irish monk, founded a hermitage, and being joined by Aldhelm, nephew of Ina, King of Wessex, they, with the assistance of Lutherius, Bishop of Winchester, erected a monastery, styled, from the name of its founders, Mealdelmesbyrig, which has been gradually altered to the modern appellation of Malmesbury. The monastery, which was one of the most considerable in Wiltshire, belonged to the Benedictines, and was splendidly endowed by several princes and noblemen; its abbot was made a mitred parliamentary baron by Edward III.; its revenue, at the Dissolution, amounted to £803. 17. 7. A part of the nave only of the conventual church remains, which has been long used as the parochial church. Buildings gradually arose round the abbey, and notwithstanding that the town suffered from the incursions of the Danes, who burned it in the reign of Alfred the Great, it became a place of so much importance as to obtain a charter from Edward the Elder, which was confirmed by his son Athelstan, who renewed it, and was a munificent benefactor both to the town and the monastery. He bestowed an extensive tract of land, called the Common of King's Heath, on the men of Malmesbury, who had assisted him in gaining a victory over the Danes. In the reign of Henry I., or Stephen, a strong castle was built here by Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, who was obliged to surrender it to the king; and on the invasion of England by Prince Henry, afterwards Henry II., he laid siege to this fortress, and took it after an obstinate defence. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., Malmesbury was a royal garrison, and that prince lodged in the town one night, in 1643. Shortly after, the place was captured by Sir William Waller; but was retaken by the royalists, who did not, however, long retain possession of it, for the parliament having recovered it, their troops were stationed here till June, 1646.

The TOWN, situated on a pleasant and commanding eminence, is nearly surrounded by two streams, which unite at its southern extremity, and form the Lower Avon. The principal thoroughfare extends southward from the market-place, near which it is crossed by another street, leading to that part of the town called Westport. These streets are paved and lighted, under the authority of an act of parliament obtained in 1798, and the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water from wells. In the centre of the market-place is a fine market-cross, built in the reign of Henry VII., and ornamented with flying buttresses, pinnacles, and an octangular central turret. The manufacture of woollen-cloth was anciently carried on very extensively; and, after it had entirely decayed, it was again introduced, in the latter part of the last century, and now constitutes the chief employment of the lower class. Some trade is carried on in tanning and brewing, and bone-lace is made by the women and children. The market, principally for butchers' meat, is on Saturday; and large cattle-markets are held on the last Tuesday in every month, except March, April, and May. Fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, take place on March 28th, April 28th, and June 5th. The first charter of INCORPORATION was granted by Charles I., but the charter now in force was obtained from William III., in 1696, and under it the corporation consists of an alderman, deputy-alderman, eleven capital burgesses, and 24 assistants, with a high steward, and deputy-steward. Besides these there are 52 landholders, and an indefinite number of commoners, or free burgesses; the alderman and steward, with their deputies, are justices of the peace; and the alderman is coroner and clerk of the market. The borough has sent members to parliament ever since the reign of Edward I.: by the act of the 2nd of William IV. cap. 45, it was determined that it should thenceforward return only one, and the right of election was extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprising 22,606 acres: the alderman is returning officer. The petty-sessions for the hundred of Malmesbury are held here once a month; and a court of requests for the hundred takes place every three weeks, for the recovery of debts under 40s. King's Heath, or Malmesbury Common, which has been inclosed, is subdivided into allotments, averaging about one acre and a half each, assigned to each commoner as tillage, or garden ground. To the east of King's Heath are the "Acres," one acre belonging to each of the assistant burgesses and landholders; and near them are other lands, called "Burgess Parts," varying in extent from six to fifteen acres, and belonging, one each, to the capital burgesses.

The old borough, which contains 130 acres, comprises parts of the parishes of St. Paul, St. Mary Westport, and the Abbey district. The entire parishes collectively include 5056a. 3r. 25p.; the lands are chiefly in meadow and pasture, with a moderate proportion of rich arable land, and 74 acres of common or waste. The living of St. Paul's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 1½, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £265; impropiators, the family of Gaby. The church is dilapidated, but the tower, surmounted by a lofty spire, is still standing, and contains the bells rung on public festivals, &c. The nave of the conventual church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was purchased, at the Dissolution of monasteries, by William Stumpe, a clothier of Malmesbury, and presented to the townspeople for a parochial church. This edifice is chiefly in the Norman style, and has a noble south porch, consisting of receding arches, with sculptured mouldings, and other ornaments; the western porch was of a similar character, but a small portion of it only remains. In the interior, at the west end, is a sepulchral chapel, in which is an ancient tomb with a recumbent crowned statue, ascribed to King Athelstan, who was interred near the high altar of the church. A few years since, the whole fabric was substantially repaired, and the vaulted roof and other parts of the interior restored: over the altar has been placed a painting of the Resurrection of Lazarus, presented by the Earl of Suffolk. There are chapels of ease at Corstone and Rodborne. The living of the parish of Westport is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Brokenborough and Charlton united, valued in the king's books at £16. 17. 8½, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £310; impropiator, Earl of Suffolk. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Moravians, and Wesleyans. A free school, under the patronage of the corporation, is endowed with £20 per annum; and another school was founded and endowed with £30 per annum by Mrs. Elizabeth Hodges, in 1725: both are conducted on the national system. Here is also an almshouse, endowed with £20 a year. The poor law union of Malmesbury comprises 25 parishes or places, 24 of which are in the county of Wilts, and one in that of Gloucester, the whole containing a population of 14,716. There was anciently a convent of the Knights Hospitallers, some small portions of the buildings belonging to which are still standing. Among the distinguished persons connected with the monastery were, St. Aldhelm, the second abbot, who died Bishop of Sherborne in 709; Ælfric, a learned abbot in the tenth century, who was made Bishop of Crediton; and William of Malmesbury, precentor to the monastery, the celebrated English historian in the reign of Stephen. Thomas Hobbes, author of the Leviathan, and other philosophical works, was born here in 1588; and Mrs. Mary Chandler, an ingenious poetess, was also a native. Malmesbury confers the title of Earl and Baron on the family of Harris.

MALPAS (St. OSWALD), a parish, in the union of WREXHAM, chiefly in the Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, but partly in the county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES; comprising the townships of Agden, Bickerton, Bickley, Bradley, Broxton, Bulkeley, Chidlow, Cholmondeley, Chorlton, Cuddington, Duckington, Edge, Egerton, Hampton, Larkton, Macefen, Malpas, Newton, Oldecastle, Overton, Stockton, Tushingham, Wichaugh, and Wigland; and containing, exclusively of the Welsh portion, 5211 inhabitants, of whom 1092 are in the township of Malpas, 15 miles (S. S. E.) from Chester, and 165 (N. W.) from London. The early name of this place was Depenbech, and was of similar import with the present appellation, which signifies a bad pass or road. The barony, prior to the Conquest, formed part of the possessions of Earl Edwin, and was subsequently given by the first Norman Earl of Chester to Robert Fitz-Hugh, one of the eight barons of his parliament; it was soon afterwards divided into two unequal parts, and still continues so. The ancient barons exercised capital jurisdiction within the limits of the barony, and in them was vested (but distinct from their rights as barons of Malpas) the office of serjeant of the peace for the whole palatinate, excepting the hundreds of Macclesfield and Wirral: the punishment for capital offences, designated in some records as "the custom of Cheshire," was decapitation, and it was usual to present the heads of felons at the castle of Chester. The jurisdictions have undergone considerable alteration, and the remaining portion of the old baronial rights has descended with the manor of Malpas. The castle, the head of the barony, was built soon after the Conquest, and stood immediately adjoining the church; the only vestige of it is a circular mound, on which the keep stood. The town is very pleasantly situated on an eminence on the road from Shrewsbury to Chester, and commands an extensive prospect over a great part of North Wales, Staffordshire, and the Vale Royal: it consists of four streets, which diverge at right angles from a common centre, and are well paved; the houses are low and irregularly built; the inhabitants are well supplied with water from a public well. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs are held on April 5th, July 26th, and Dec. 8th, for cattle, linen and woollen goods, toys, and pedlery. There are courts leet and baron annually, at which constables are appointed, and debts under 40s. are recoverable.

The LIVING is a rectory, divided from time immemorial into two portions; the first, valued in the king's books at £48. 8. 6½., has a net income of £1000, and is in the gift of the Marquess of Cholmondeley and T. T. Drake, Esq.; the second, valued at £44. 19. 2., has a net income of £910, and is in the gift of Mr. Drake: an excellent parsonage-house and glebe are attached to each portion. The church is a spacious and venerable edifice, in the later English style; the windows are enriched with elegant tracery, and in the chancel are some ancient oak stalls, niches, and monuments; at the end of the north and south aisles are sepulchral chapels belonging to the families of Cholmondeley and Brereton. There are two chapels in the parish, St. Chad's and Whitewell, the former of which is a perpetual curacy; net income, £144; patron, Rector of Malpas. A domestic chapel, open for the tenants and neighbours, is attached to Cholmondeley Castle, about four miles distant; and in the town and parish are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The grammar school was founded early in the seventeenth century, by subscription, to which Hugh, first earl of Cholmondeley, contributed £200. Richard Alport, in 1719, bequeathed £500 for the support of a school, which is now incorporated with one recently established on the national plan; and Dr. Townson, archdeacon of Richmond, and rector of Malpas, left £500 old South Sea stock, the dividends on which are applied in educating children. An almshouse was built by Sir Randle Brereton, in the time of Henry VIII., and endowed by Sir Thomas Brereton, in the reign of Charles I.; it was rebuilt in 1721, by Hugh, Earl of Cholmondeley, for six widows; and a bequest, by Thomas Poyser, Esq., of the interest of £600, made an addition of £3 per annum to the income of each of the inmates. In 1748, Miss Elizabeth Taylor left £500 for clothing poor men in the townships of Malpas and Edge. The late learned and pious Dr. Heber, Bishop of Calcutta, was a native of the town, where his father was rector of the higher mediety. Philip Henry, the nonconformist, resided at the Broad Oak, in the parish, where his son, Matthew Henry, the celebrated commentator on the Bible, was born. Malpas confers the title of Viscount on the Marquess of Cholmondeley.

MALPAS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CAERLEON, hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Newport; containing 270 inhabitants. It comprises 988a. 3r. 20p., of which 315 acres are arable, 587 meadow and pasture, and 26 woodland. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60; patron and impropiator, Sir C. Morgan, Bart. The church is a handsome structure, in the early English style, with a tower embattled and crowned by pinnacles; it has a lofty ceiling of wood, richly carved, and in the chancel are some ancient oak stalls. There is a national school. A small establishment of Cluniac monks, a cell to the priory of Montacute, in Somersetshire, was founded here about the time of Henry I.

MALSWICK, a tything, in the parish and union of NEWENT, hundred of BOTLOE, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 234 inhabitants.

MALTBY, a chapelry, in the parish of RAITHBY, union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles

(S. W. by S.) from Louth. Here was formerly a preceptory of Knights Templars, to which Ranulph, one of the earls of Chester, was the first benefactor; it afterwards belonged to the Hospitallers.

MALTBY, a township, in the parish of STAINTON, union of STOCKTON, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Yarm; containing 171 inhabitants. This place was formerly the residence of a family of the same name, who continued in possession for several generations; and since the time of their connexion with the spot, land has been held by the families of Morley, Wentworth, Pennyman, and others. The township is in the district called Cleveland, and comprises about 1180 acres of land, partly the property of the Earl of Harewood. The village, which is but indifferently built, is situated on an eminence, and on the road from Stainton to Yarm.

MALTBY (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of ROTHERHAM, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Hooton-Levet, 839 inhabitants, of whom 763 are in the township of Maltby, 6 miles (E.) from Rotherham. This parish is on the road from Sheffield to Gainsborough, and comprises by computation 4473 acres, whereof 81 are common or waste. The celebrated Roche-Abbey quarries, which furnished materials for the groined roof of King's College chapel, Cambridge, are in the parish. The village is pleasantly situated in a fertile and richly-wooded valley, and the surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque. Sandbeck Park, formerly the residence of the lords Castletown, and now the seat of the Earl of Scarborough, who is lord of the manor, is a stately mansion in an ample and tastefully embellished demesne. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Earl, who, with others, is impropiator; net income, £120. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Viscount Castletown, in 1714, gave certain waste land for a school, now producing £20 a year; and there are a national, an infants', and a Sunday school.

MALTBY-LE-MARSH (All Saints), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Alford; containing 229 inhabitants, and comprising 1377a. 1r. 13p. A pleasure-fair is held in June. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 17. 8., and in the gift of the Rev. George Allott: the tithes have been commuted for £294, and the glebe comprises 28 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a handsome tower. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; also a school founded in 1705, by Mrs. Anne Bolle, who endowed it with $65\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land producing £78. 12. per annum. On a bridge over a drain which divides this parish from Mablethorpe, a battle is said to have taken place between the knights of the respective places, in which both parties fell; and in the church is a recumbent effigy of a knight. The bridge is called Earl's Bridge.

MALTON, NEW, an ancient borough and market-town, and the head of a union, in the wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK, 18 miles (N. E. by N.) from York, and 213 (N. by W.) from London; containing, with Old Malton, 5317 inhabitants, of whom 4021 are in New Malton. This place is of very remote antiquity; and the numerous military roads in the vicinity apparently leading to it, the remains of intrenchments yet discernible, and the many Roman coins and other relics which have been found at various times, and are still occasionally discovered, seem to indicate its importance as a Roman station. From an inscription dug up in 1753, near the lodge of the original castle, it would appear that the "Equites Singulares," or body guards of the emperor, were stationed here, and most probably in the time of Severus. During the heptarchy, the town seems to have been a royal vill of the kings of Northumbria, of whom Edwin was saved from assassination at this place by the fidelity of his servant Lilla. A spacious castle of formidable strength was erected here soon after the Conquest, by one of the De Vesci family, to whom the manor belonged, and in 1138 was seized and garrisoned by the Scots, who had made an irruption into this part of the country; the town was burnt by Archbishop Thurstan in his attempt to expel the invaders, but was rebuilt shortly afterwards, and then named New Malton. The castle was finally destroyed by Henry II., during whose reign a priory for Gilbertine canons was founded and endowed about a mile from the town, by Eustace Fitzjohn, which continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £197. In the reign of James I., Ralph, Lord Eure, erected a handsome castellated mansion on the site of the ancient castle; but in consequence of some disagreement between his granddaughters and coheirresses, it was taken down, and the materials were divided between them by the Sheriff of Yorkshire, in 1674; only the lodge and entrance gateways are remaining. Mary, the younger of these coheirresses, who succeeded to the manors of Old and New Malton, conveyed them by marriage to William Palmes, Esq., by whom they were transferred to Sir Thomas Wentworth, whose descendant obtained the title of Lord Malton, and was afterwards created marquess of Rockingham; on the death of the last marquess, in 1782, the title became extinct, and the manor passed to his nephew, the late Earl Fitzwilliam.

The town is pleasantly situated on elevated ground on the north side of the river Derwent, which, flowing through the adjacent valley, forms a boundary between the East and North ridings; it is above half a mile in length, and consists of several streets diverging from a spacious market-place. The houses are generally well-built, and many of them, both in the town and suburbs, are handsome and of modern erection; the streets are lighted with gas from works originally constructed in 1832, by Messrs. John and James Malam, and purchased for £4000, by a proprietary of £10 shareholders, in 1836. A theatre, and a commodious suite of public rooms, were erected in 1814; the theatre has been converted into a mechanics' institution, consisting of 400 members, with a library of 1000 volumes; and the public rooms comprise a subscription library and newsroom, assembly and concert rooms, and accommodations for the shows of the Malton Horticultural Society. The new Talbot hotel is beautifully situated in elevated grounds tastefully laid out, and formed into a fine terrace with hanging gardens, commanding a good view of the course of the Derwent, winding through its fertile and picturesque vale, and affording a delightful and well-frequented promenade.

Over the river is a handsome stone bridge of three arches, connecting the town with the populous suburb of Norton, in the East riding; and the environs abound with a variety of scenery. The Derwent, made navigable from Malton to the river Ouse in the reign of Anne, furnishes a means of communication with Hull, Leeds, Halifax, and other places; and a considerable trade in corn, butter, hams, and provisions, is carried on with those towns, from which groceries, coal, woollen-cloths, and stuffs, and various other articles are received in return. The York and Scarborough Railway Company, also, will have a station at Malton. There are two iron-foundries, some small manufactories for linen, gloves, hats, and pelts, and several flour-mills, breweries, and large malting establishments. The market, which is on Saturday, is amply supplied with corn, cattle, and provisions of every kind. The market-place is spacious and well adapted for business; and on the west side of the town is the cattle-market, occupying an open area of three acres, near which slaughter-houses have been erected by Earl Fitzwilliam. Fairs, chiefly for cattle, are held during the week before Palm-Sunday, on the Saturday before Whit-Sunday, the 15th of July, the 11th and 12th of October, and the Saturday before Martinmas. During the week before Palm-Sunday, great numbers of horses are exhibited here for sale, and races frequently take place.

The inhabitants had anciently a charter of incorporation, and the borough was governed by two bailiffs, till the reign of Charles II., when on a writ of Quo warranto, judgment was given in favour of the crown, and the town has since been under the controul of a bailiff appointed by the lord of the manor. The town first sent representatives to parliament in the reign of Edward I., and at that time the prior of Old Malton, who was one of the members, was arrested on his return from the parliament, for debt, but pleading his exemption while going to, or returning from, his parliamentary duties, he was liberated. The borough still returns two members, but the limits of the borough have been extended, under the Reform act, by the addition of Old Malton and Norton; the bailiff is returning officer. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Saturday, and the general quarter-sessions for the North riding formerly took place here. The town-hall is a neat edifice in the market-place. Malton comprises the parishes of St. Leonard and St. Michael, the former containing 2391, and the latter 1630, inhabitants, and the livings are perpetual curacies united to that of Old Malton. The church of St. Leonard is an ancient structure, in the later English style, with a spire, not carried up to its full height, from an apprehension of danger to the stability of the tower. The church of St. Michael, situated in the market-place, is also ancient, in the Norman style, with a square western tower. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Unitarians, and Wesleyans; and several schools. The poor law union comprises 68 parishes or places, containing a population of 21,949, and a spacious union workhouse has been erected. At the foot of an eminence called the Brows, is a chalybeate spring, with properties similar to the waters of Scarborough; it has an appropriate building over it, and is surrounded by delightful walks.

MALTON, OLD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and parliamentary borough of MALTON, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK, 1 mile (N. E.) from New Malton. The parish is bounded on the south-east by the river Derwent, and the Rye pursues its course on the north: the village is pleasant, and is on the road from New Malton to Pickering. The living is a perpetual curacy, with those of St. Leonard and St. Michael in New Malton; net income, £198; patron, Earl Fitzwilliam; appropriator, Archbishop of York. The church, extensively restored in 1844, is formed of the remains of a priory, founded in 1150, by Eustace Fitz-John, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, for Gilbertine canons, and the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, amounted to £257. 7. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A free grammar school was founded in the 38th of Henry VIII., by the Archbishop of York, for instruction in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, with an endowment now amounting to about £100 per annum.

MALVERN, GREAT (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 8 miles (W.) from Worcester; containing, with the chapelry of Newland, 2911 inhabitants. This place is situated on the eastern declivity of a range of hills separating the counties of Worcester and Hereford, and extending from north to south for nearly nine miles, the greatest elevation being 1440 feet; the heights vary from one to two miles in breadth from east to west, and the most prominent are the Worcestershire and Herefordshire beacons, the summits of which command most extensive and interesting views of the surrounding country. Around the base of the Herefordshire beacon is a double intrenchment, from six to twelve feet deep, and in some places more than 30 feet broad, dug by Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, as a boundary between his portion of Malvern Chase, and that belonging to the Bishop of Hereford; and in other parts of these mountains are similar works. The more ancient portion of the village is irregularly built, and consists of houses scattered on the declivity of the mountain; but since the celebrity of the springs and the purity of the air have made it a place of fashionable resort, handsome ranges of modern houses have been erected; and in detached situations, and at different degrees of elevation, several good villas have been built as private summer residences. There are a chalybeate and a bituminous spring, the water of which is remarkable for its purity, and for its gently aperient and diuretic properties: the former is in the eastern part of the village, near the church; the latter, called Holy well, is situated two miles to the south of it. On the eastern ridge of the hill, and at St. Anne's well on the north side of the Worcestershire beacon, are some respectable hotels; and every accommodation has been provided for drinking the waters, and for hot and cold bathing. The water of the Holy well has been found, on analysis, to contain, in an imperial gallon, 1.6 grains of carbonate of lime, 5.33 carbonate of soda, .9199 carbonate of magnesia, .625 carbonate of iron, 2.896 sulphate of soda, 1.553 muriate of soda, and 1.687 of residuum. The water of St. Anne's well contains, in one gallon, 3.55 carbonate of soda, .352 carbonate of lime, .260 carbonate of magnesia, .328 carbonate of iron, 1.48 sulphate of soda, .955 muriate of soda, and .470 of residuum. The public library is a neat building of the Doric order.

The parish comprises 4297*a.* 1*r.* 11*p.* of land, of which 628 are common or waste. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 4.; net income, £181; patron, E. T. Foley, Esq.; improPRIATORS, the family of Wilson. The church, formerly the church of the Benedictine abbey, was at the Dissolution purchased by the inhabitants, and made parochial; it is a venerable and elegant cruciform structure, partly rebuilt under the direction of Sir Reginald Bray, in the reign of Henry VII., and combining the Norman and the later English styles, with a fine square embattled tower rising from the centre. The exterior is in the later English style; the interior retains much of the original character; the nave is Norman, with low massive piers and circular arches, and the chancel is in the later English style; the east window and that in the north transept are particularly beautiful, and several portions of the ancient stained glass, and of the carved seats, and other evidences of antiquity, remain. In 1826, the building was repaired at the expense of the neighbouring gentry. A church has been built and endowed by the Rev. P. C. Boisseur; and the Dean and Chapter of Westminster have given land and £300 towards the erection of the North Hill district church at this place, towards which also the Dean of St. Asaph has contributed £200. There is a place of worship for Methodists; and a national school and a school of industry are supported by subscription. Here was a hermitage, endowed by Edward the Confessor, which, after the Conquest, was converted into a Benedictine priory: an abbey and conventual buildings, having been erected in 1083, by Aldewine the hermit, and endowed by Gisleber, abbot of Westminster, with ample possessions, it became in consequence subordinate to the abbey of Westminster, and subsisted till the Dissolution, when the revenue was estimated at £375. 0. 6. Of this abbey, the parochial church, already noticed; the ancient gateway, a beautiful specimen of the later English style; and the abbey barn, a building in the decorated style; are the remains.

MALVERN, LITTLE (ST. GILES), a parish, in the union of UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Upton; containing 103 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the roads from Ledbury to Worcester and Upton, in the heart of a district abounding with picturesque and romantic scenery, and comprises about 1300 acres, of which 200 are arable, 350 rich meadow, and 100 woodland. From the Herefordshire beacon, which is partly in the parish, a fine prospect extends over the rich plains of Worcester, Gloucester, and Herefordshire, embracing the distant hills in South Wales. There are some remarkably fine oaks, of which one called St. Benedict's oak, is of most majestic growth. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron, Earl Somers; improPRIATOR, W. Berington, Esq. The church, which has long been in decay, part of it forming a beautiful and interesting ruin, belonged to a Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Worcester, founded in 1171, in a gloomy cavity near an ancient intrenchment round the base of the Herefordshire beacon, by two brothers, Joceline and Edred, who were successively priors. At the Dissolution, the revenue was valued at £102. 10. 9.; and adjoining the church are some remains of the buildings, converted into a dwelling-house called Malvern Court. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

MAMBLE (ST. JOHN), a parish, in the union of CLEOBURY-MORTIMER, Lower division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, Hundred-House and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Bewdley; containing 377 inhabitants. The parish, bounded on the west by a portion of Shropshire, comprises by measurement 2658 acres; the substratum abounds with coal of good quality, of which several mines are in operation, and there are some quarries of inferior stone, used for the roads. A railway has been constructed from the collieries to the Leominster canal, which approaches within half a mile of the parish, and to which it was the purpose of the proprietors to extend it. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Bayton united, valued in the king's books at £9. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown; improPRIATOR, Sir E. Blount, Bart.: the great tithes have been commuted for £235, and the vicarial for £180. The church is a very ancient structure, and contains many old monuments, among which are some to the Blounts, formerly of Sodington Hall, in the parish, and a handsome monument to the late Lieut.-Colonel Greswold, by the officers of the Enniskillen Dragoons, of which he had the command. Parochial schools are supported by subscription. Sodington, the ancient seat of the Blounts, was destroyed by fire, in the great civil war, by some troops of the parliament: what remained of it was taken down in the year 1807, when several curious Roman relics were discovered beneath the foundations.

MAMHEAD, a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of EXMINSTER, Wonford and S. divisions of DEVON, 8 miles (W.) from Exeter; containing 246 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1130 acres, of which 440 are arable, 360 pasture, 250 wood, and 30 common or waste land; the surface is pleasingly varied, and the scenery richly embellished; great quantities of fine flax are produced, and there are some quarries of good building-stone. On Mamhead point is an obelisk of Portland stone, 100 feet high, erected by Thomas Balle, Esq., of Mamhead House. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 17. 6., and in the gift of Sir Robert W. Newman, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £145, and the glebe comprises 24 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the early English style. A national school is supported by subscription, for the instruction of the children of the poor in the principles of the Established Church.

MAMHILAD, a parish, in the union and division of PONT-Y-POOL, hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Usk; containing 303 inhabitants. It comprises 1678 acres, of which 120 are common or waste land. The high road from Abergavenny to Pont-y-Pool, and the Brecon and Monmouthshire canal, intersect the parish from north to south; and the road from Usk to Pont-y-Pool also affords facility of communication. The living is united, with that of Trevethan, to the vicarage of Llanover: the church is an ancient structure.

MAMHOLE, a hamlet, in the parish of BEDWELTY, union of ABERGAVENNY, Lower division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH; containing 6789 inhabitants, who are principally employed at the extensive coal and iron works in the neighbourhood.

Seal and Arms.

MAN, ISLE OF, an island annexed to the British dominions, in the Irish Sea, nearly at an equal distance from the English and Irish coasts, and lying between $54^{\circ} 2'$ and $54^{\circ} 26' 30''$ (N. Lat.), and between $4^{\circ} 14'$ and $4^{\circ} 47'$ (W. Lon.). The distance from Douglas to Liverpool (N. W. buoy) is 60 miles, and to St. Bees' Light 42; from the Point of Ayre to the Mull of Galloway 21, and to the Copeland islands at the entrance of Belfast Lough 38; and from the Calf of Man to Dublin 60, and to Holyhead 45. Within its limits are 7978 inhabited houses, 370 uninhabited, and 56 in the course of erection; and the population amounts to 47,975. This island was called by Ptolemy Monoeda, or Moneitha, the "Further Mona," to distinguish it from the Isle of Anglesey, or Mona; by Pliny it was styled Monabia; and by Bede Menavia Secunda, likewise in contradistinction to Anglesey, which he terms Menavia Prima. And on account of the rocky or stony nature of the soil, it was also called Menang and Mauen, from the latter of which its present name is derived. About the year 440, St. Patrick, having converted the ancient British inhabitants to Christianity, founded here a church and a see, of which he appointed St. Germanus bishop. Many years afterwards, on the irruption of the northern barbarians, the island fell under the dominion of the Scots, and was subsequently annexed to that kingdom by Aidan; but in 610 it was wrested from the Scots by Edwin, King of Northumberland; and from this period, for nearly 300 years, the British historians are silent with respect to any circumstances connected with its history. The Manks' traditions, however, record during this interval a succession of twelve petty kings, called Orries, of whom the first was son of the King of Denmark and Norway, an enterprising prince, who, having subdued the Orcades and the Hebrides, took possession of this island also, where he fixed his residence and enjoyed for many years a reign of uninterrupted tranquillity. Guttred, his son and successor, built the castle of Rushen, in repairing which, in 1815, a beam was discovered by the workmen inscribed with the date 947. In this castle Guttred was interred, and was succeeded by his son Reginald, on whose assassination his younger brother Olave assumed the government; but not having obtained a ratification of his title from the King of Norway, to whom the island was tributary, he was invited to that kingdom, and on his arrival was arraigned and put to death. Olain, his brother, next took possession of this and some other islands, and after a reign of twenty-three years died in Ireland, and was succeeded by Allen, who, being poisoned by his governor, made room for Macon; the latter refusing to do homage for his crown to Edgar, King of England, was dethroned, but was soon afterwards restored, and made admiral of the great fleet raised by that monarch to protect the English coasts from the repeated assaults of the northern pirates: Macon was one of the eight tributary kings whom Edgar, in token of their vassalage, compelled to row his barge on the river Dee.

Godred Crovan, son of Harold Harfager, King of Norway, who accompanied his father in his invasion of England on the death of Edward the Confessor, took refuge here on the defeat of his countrymen, and was hospitably entertained. Returning the following year with a numerous army, after being twice repulsed by the inhabitants, he at length took possession of the island, after a sanguinary contest, and established himself in the southern part, granting the remainder to the islanders, on the absolute condition of their holding it under him as lord of the whole. From this time the island became vested in the kings, or lords, of the isles, and was held of them till the commencement of the last century. Godred, who also held the sovereignty of the Hebrides, or Western Islands, maintained a naval force sufficient for the security of his conquests, and turned his arms against Ireland, at that time divided into petty principalities, reducing Dublin and a considerable part of the province of Leinster. He left three sons, Lagman, Harold, and Olave, of whom the first succeeded to the government, and being jealous of his brother Harold, whom he suspected of exciting insubordination among his soldiers, caused him to be put to death; but repenting, he resigned the crown to his youngest brother Olave, and died on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Olave being then a minor, and residing in the court of Henry I., where he received his education, the island, from its unsettled state, was exposed to the attacks of the neighbouring powers, and ultimately fell an easy prey to Magnus, King of Norway, who, having conquered the Orkneys and the Hebrides, possessed himself, almost without resistance, of the Isle of Man, over which he reigned more than six years; but having proceeded with a small naval force to reconnoitre the Irish coast, in 1102, and incautiously landing with a party of his followers, he was taken by surprise, and slain. Olave, who had been in exile for sixteen years, was now invited to the government, of which he held undisturbed possession for many years; but having gone over to Norway, to get his title acknowledged, on his return he found his dominions distracted by the rival pretensions of the three sons of his deceased brother Harold, who, having been educated in Ireland, raised considerable forces in that country, and landing in the Isle of Man, demanded one moiety of the isles; and a meeting having been convened at Ramsey, for taking their demand into consideration, Reginald, one of the brothers, feigning to address the king, suddenly struck off his head with his battle-axe: this preconcerted signal for a general attack led to a sanguinary conflict, in which many were slain on both sides. But such insidious treachery did not long remain unavenged: on the return of Prince Godred from Norway, where his father Olave had left him to be educated, the whole island submitted to his authority, and the three sons of Harold were delivered up for punishment. In 1158, Summerled, Thane of Argyle, and brother-in-law to Godred, attempted to usurp the government; but their fleets meeting, an obstinate and sanguinary conflict ensued, without victory inclining to either side, when a truce was agreed on, and afterwards a treaty, by which the kingdom of the Isles was divided between them. Godred died in 1187, leaving three sons, Reginald, Olave, and Ivar, of whom he appointed Olave, his only legitimate son, his successor; who being then a minor, the people made Reginald king, but afterwards, on his attaining maturer age, raised Olave to the throne. To recover his lost dignity, Reginald did homage to John, King of England, for his crown, and made submission to the pope; and having obtained assistance from Allen, Lord of Galloway, and Thomas, Earl of Athol, landed on the island (while Olave, with his chief officers and soldiers, was in the Western Isles), massacred the unprotected inhabitants, plundered their houses, burnt the churches, and laid waste the southern part of the island; and, even after the return of Olave, succeeded in setting fire to the shipping, then at anchor under Peel Castle. An intestine warfare raged for some time with great fury, and Reginald was ultimately killed in a battle fought at Tynwald Mount. Olave died in 1237, and was succeeded by his son Harold, who, having gone over to Norway, was, with his wife, drowned on his return; and his brother Reginald, who assumed the government in 1249, was slain, with all his party, in an insurrection headed by a knight named Ivar. On the death of Reginald, who left only an infant daughter, his brother Magnus was chosen king, and, according to the usual custom, went over to Norway, where, after two years' attendance, he was declared King of the Isles, and received a confirmation of his title to him and his successors. Notwithstanding this, Mary, the daughter of Reginald, set up a claim for the kingdom, and did homage for it to Edward I., which circumstance was, 400 years afterwards, adduced as a plea on which judgment was obtained in favour of the heirs general of Ferdinand, Earl of Derby, against their uncle, Earl William.

From this time the power of the Norwegian kings began to decline, and that of the Scottish kings, from whom the isles had been wrested, recovered strength. Deprived of that support which the inhabitants had hitherto received from Norway, and threatened by the Scots, who were preparing to regain the islands by force, Magnus, in 1256, visited England, to secure the protection and assistance of Henry III. Aquinus, King of Norway, in 1265, made an unsuccessful attempt to avenge the insult offered to his authority, by a descent upon Scotland, where he met with such powerful resistance, that he was forced to take shelter in the Orkades, and died at Kirkwall. Magnus died without issue, in 1265; and Alexander, King of Scotland, having subdued the Orkneys and the Hebrides, attacked the Isle of Man, now unprotected, and, after many battles fought with varied success, at length achieved the conquest of it with a powerful army, in 1270, when, after a decisive battle at Ronaldsway, in which 900 of the Manks, with their leader, were slain, the kingdom was entirely subjugated, and annexed to the dominions of Alexander, who, in token of his conquest, substituted for the ancient armorial ensign of the isle, which was a ship in full sail, the device of the three legs, which it still retains. The tyrannical oppression of the lieutenants (by whom it was governed) under the Scottish kings inspired the inhabitants with the resolution of throwing off the Scottish yoke; but the bishop, informed of their determination, interfered to prevent the effusion of blood, and obtained their mutual consent to decide the contest by thirty champions selected from each party: in this contest the Manks' champions were all killed, and twenty-five of the Scottish warriors shared the same fate. This victory confirmed the conquest of the Scots, and the Manks, finding no resource, submitted to their fate: the ancient regal government was abolished, and a military despotism established in its place. In 1289, the island was surrendered by the Scottish commissioners to Edward I., who restored it the following year to John Balliol; and, on the death of Edward, in 1307, his successor, Edward II., seized it, and, in the course of one year, bestowed it successively upon his favourites, Piers de Gavestone, Gilbert de M. Gascall, and Henricus de Bello Monte. In the reign of Edward III., a female descendant of Mary, daughter of Reginald, revived the claim of her family to the sovereignty of the island, and solicited the protection of that monarch, who, having ascertained the validity of her title, gave her in marriage to Sir William de Montacute, and granted them such succours in ships and men, that Sir William expelled the Scots, and, to the great joy of the natives, restored the ancient government in the right line. But in the prosecution of his lady's claim, Sir William had contracted so large a debt, that he was compelled to mortgage the island for seven years to Anthony Bec, Bishop of Durham, who, in 1377, obtained from Richard II. a grant of it for life: at his decease, however, it reverted to the natural heir, William de Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, who sold it, in 1395, to Sir William Scroop, afterwards Earl of Wiltshire, who was beheaded at the commencement of the war between the houses of York and Lancaster. In the reign of Henry IV. it was in the possession of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, upon whose rebellion against that monarch it was seized for the king's use by Sir William and Sir John Stanley, the latter of whom, in 1407, received a grant of the island, castle, peel, and lordship of Man, and the isles appertaining thereto, with all the royalties, regalities, and franchises, and the patronage of the see, to him and his heirs, in as full and ample a manner as had been granted to any former lord, or king, to be held of the British crown, by liege homage, paying to the king a cast of falcons at his coronation. In this family its royalties and revenues descended regularly to William Stanley, sixth Earl of Derby, who obtained from James I. a new grant of the isle, which was confirmed by act of parliament. The title of "King of Man" was first exchanged for that of "Lord of Man" by Thomas, second Earl of Derby.

During the parliamentary war, the island remained steadily attached to the interests of the king, and was among the last places that surrendered to the parliament. General Ireton, on the part of the parliament, offered to James, Earl of Derby, the repossession of all his estates in England, upon condition of his surrendering the Isle of Man; but the earl, in a most spirited and memorable reply, rejected the offer with stern indignation. On the execution of the earl at Bolton-le-Moors, in 1651, its defence was undertaken by his lady; but Receiver-General William Christian, who had the command of the garrison of Castle Rushen, into which she had retired, deeming her cause hopeless, surrendered to the parliament, and the island was subsequently granted to Lord Fairfax. Charles II. restored the island to the son of Earl James, and Christian, being tried by the Manks' authorities, and found guilty of treason, was shot, in January, 1662, and his estates confiscated; but the attainder was afterwards reversed, and the family restored to their estates, by an order from the king.

One of the most important occurrences in the civil history of the island was the grant, in 1704, by James, the tenth Earl of Derby, and Lord of Man, of the Act of Settlement, by which the lessees of estates were finally established in possession of them, and their descent assigned in perpetuity, on the payment of certain fines, rents and duties to the lord. This nobleman dying without issue, in 1735, the lordship of Man descended to James Murray, second Duke of Athol, as heir general of his great-grandfather, James, Earl of Derby, who was beheaded at Bolton; and, in order to put an end to the contraband trade of the island, which, in the beginning of the last century, had attained such an extent as materially to effect the revenue of the country, an act was passed, in 1726, authorising the earl to sell the royalty and revenue of the island; but, though many overtures were made by the government, no purchase was concluded till after the death of the duke, whose only daughter, Charlotte, Baroness Strange, being married to her cousin James, heir to the dukedom of Athol, conveyed to him the lordship of Man. Proposals for the purchase were renewed to this nobleman, in 1765, and measures having been at the same time introduced into parliament for more effectually preventing the illicit trade of the island, the duke and duchess agreed to alienate the sovereignty for £70,000, reserving only the manorial rights, the patronage of the see, and some few emoluments and perquisites. A misunderstanding, however, arising, in consequence of the British government claiming more than the duke and duchess intended by the treaty to relinquish, a further sum of £2000 per annum was granted to them, upon their lives, and the sovereignty of the island was then transferred to the crown. Soon after this, an act of parliament was passed, which effectually checked the contraband trade. On the ground of inadequate compensation, their son John petitioned parliament, but unsuccessfully, until the year 1805, when an act was passed, assigning to him and his heirs one-fourth of the gross revenue of the island; but, under another act passed in 1825, the lords of the treasury purchased the whole of the remaining interest of the Athol family, at a valuation amounting to £416,000; and the Isle of Man, with all its privileges and immunities, was thus entirely ceded to the British crown.

The ISLAND is about thirty miles in length, and from eight to ten miles in average breadth. It is divided into two unequal parts by a mountainous ridge reaching from North Barrule, at the northern extremity, to Brada Head, at the southern; and comprehending in the chain Sneafel, Mount Greeba, Ben-e-phot, and several others, of which the loftiest is Sneafel, 580 yards above the level of the sea. The sides, as is the case in most of the other mountains, are covered with turbary, or turf, to a short distance from the base, and with various kinds of moss, heath, and rushes, to the summit. North Barrule is a rock of clay slate, which is also the prevailing formation in South Barrule, the latter differing chiefly by being varied, on the north side, with large masses of granite, containing silvery mica, red and white feldspar, and grey quartz. Greeba is of very rugged and precipitous ascent, especially in that part near the road leading from Douglas to Peel:

the stratum near the surface is a glossy clay, intersected by many large veins of quartz, alternating in some parts with layers of mica slate. Ben-e-phot, consisting chiefly of clay slate from the base to the summit, is extremely marshy. From Ramsey to Derby haven, and round the south and west shores of the island, the land terminates in cliffs, consisting of clay slate, and varying in elevation from 100 to more than 250 feet; at the southern extremity is the promontory of Spanish Head, consisting of bold precipices, rising perpendicularly from the level of the beach to the height of more than 300 feet, and divided by extensive chasms into pyramidal and conical masses, which overhang the shore. Detached from this extremity of the island, by a rocky channel, several hundred yards in breadth (in the middle of which is an island, called Kitterland, whereon sheep are fed in the summer), is the Calf of Man, the largest of the rocky islets which surround the coast: it is nearly five miles in circumference, and comprises an area of more than 600 acres; on the western side the cliffs rise in perpendicular masses, to the height of 400 feet; and its summit, which commands an extensive view of the Welsh, Scotch, and Irish mountains, is 500 feet above the level of the sea. On the south side of the Calf of Man is a very large mass of rock, called the Burrow, or Barrow, in form resembling a lofty tower, and separated from the other masses by an opening of romantic appearance: near it is another, called the Eye, perforated by a natural arch, resembling the eye of a needle.

THE HARBOURS are, Douglas, Ramsey, Peel, Port-le-Mary, and Castletown; and the natural havens are Derby haven, Laxey, and Port-Erin. Douglas harbour, which is dry at low water, and is considered the best dry harbour in the Irish Sea, admits vessels of considerable burthen to approach the quay at high water, the depth being then from fifteen to twenty feet. The pier, constructed by government, at an expense of £22,000, is 520 feet in length, and 40 feet broad to an extent of 450 feet from its commencement, when it expands to a breadth of 90 feet, terminating in a circular area of greater elevation than the narrower part, and having in the centre a lighthouse. All vessels having goods or merchandise for bonding are, by act of parliament, compelled to deliver their cargoes exclusively at this port. The bay is two miles across, and has good anchorage, except on the north side, being sheltered from all winds except the east and south-east: both its points are rocky, precipitous, and dangerous, and in the centre is a large bed of rocks, called St. Mary's Rock, or the Connister, which are just covered at high water. Ramsey harbour, accessible to vessels of 100 tons' burthen, was much improved, in 1830, by the construction of an additional pier, which increased the depth of water more than three feet: there is a lighthouse on the quay. This is the principal port from which wheat is exported. The bay is spacious, and the anchorage good; and several herring boats are laid up here during the winter. Peel harbour, affording shelter to vessels of small burthen, is formed by a pier 400 yards long, and varying from seven to ten yards in breadth, at the extremity of which is a harbour-light. A jetty, 40 yards in length, was erected in 1830, at an expense of £550: the depth of water at ordinary spring tides is about 15 feet, and at neap tides 11 feet. There are 70 herring boats, of from 16 to 30 tons' burthen each, belonging to the harbour. Derby haven is the principal resort of the herring boats during the latter part of the fishing season. At its southern extremity, and connected with the mainland by a stone wall, about 100 yards in length and 12 feet thick, is the small island of St. Michael, on which a strong circular fort was erected by Charlotte, Countess of Derby, during the protectorate; the walls of this fort, on which is placed a harbour-light, are still entire, and inclose an area 18 yards in diameter, in which are the ruins of two houses, and near them the remains of a church, now used as a place of interment for Roman Catholics, and for persons shipwrecked on that part of the coast. The haven, which is a mile and a half from the direct course, is, from the greater security which it affords, usually selected as a place of landing by passengers to Castletown from Ireland. Port-le-Mary has a good harbour, protected by a pier of considerable extent, erected a few years since, at the extremity of which is a harbour-light; and Port-Erin has an excellent bay, affording protection from all winds except the west, and much frequented by the fishing fleet at the commencement of the season.

In the high lands between North Barrule and Mount Greeba rise several streams, which run into the sea at Douglas, Ramsey, Peel, Laxey, and Castletown, and bear the same names as those places. Besides these, which are shallow and inconsiderable, there are numerous others in various parts of the island, but few of them are of sufficient force to turn a mill. The island, like those of the Hebrides, is destitute of natural woods, but, in various parts, plantations and shrubberies have been brought into a luxuriant state. The climate is rather milder in winter than that of the neighbouring coasts, but gales of wind and rain are frequent, and of long duration in the spring, rendering the seed-time unfavourable: the heat in summer is also more moderate, and the harvests are consequently later. The soil of the northern portion of the island is a light sand, resting on a bed of common clay, and in some places of clay marl; but the greatest part consists of a soil resting on greywacke and on clay slate, in general thin, and unproductive without good management. Wheat, barley, and oats are raised in abundance; and great quantities of wheat and barley are exported, and, together with herrings, constitute the chief export trade of the island. Turnips, for which the climate and the soil appear to be extremely propitious, are largely produced; flax is grown in most parts of the island, but not sufficient for the supply of the manufacturers; and artificial grasses thrive well. The commons, or uncultivated lands, are estimated at 31,000 acres. The principal MINERALS are lead and copper ores, of which veins are found in several of the mountains; the chief mines are at Laxey, Foxdale, and Brada Head, near Port Erin. Those at Laxey are worked in two levels driven from the steep banks of the river, in the higher of which, opened towards the close of the last century, and extending to the depth of 100 yards, lead and copper ores are found, together with much blende, some zinc, and a kind of mineral earth, called black jack, of which a great quantity is sent to Bristol, where, after being ground and prepared, it is converted into black paint; the lead-ore contains silver in some instances in the proportion of 200 ounces, and generally in that of from 60 to 80 ounces per ton. The Foxdale mines, between Castletown and St. John's, of which the chief produce is lead, with a small portion of copper, after having been for some time relinquished, were re-opened; and, in 1830, a new vein of lead-ore was discovered within a few feet from the surface, affording an abundant supply with comparatively little labour and expense. Limestone is found in various parts; and below high-water mark, at Spanish Head, is a quarry of very tough clay slate, which is raised in large blocks, occasionally substituted for timber. The public roads, which were formerly exceedingly bad and dangerous, have been much improved since 1776, when an act of Tynwald was passed for improving the high ways and bridges, which has been amended by various subsequent acts; they are now little inferior to those of England, and are kept in repair by a fund arising from a tax upon retailers of ale and spirituous liquors, on lands, houses, and dogs, licenses for killing game, and by some fines.

The herring-fishery, for which the season commences about July and continues till the end of October, employs from 200 to 300 boats, of from fifteen to thirty tons' burthen, and mostly without decks: the number of herrings generally cured, though subject to great fluctuation, may be averaged at from eight to ten millions. The COMMERCE of the island, previously to the act of revestment in 1765, and the subsequent regulations, consisted principally in importing and exporting foreign goods, the average returns of which exceeded £350,000, and by some are stated to have amounted to half a million sterling per annum; but, on the passing of that act, the customs of the port became vested in the British crown. By an act passed in the 6th of George IV., a new code of revenue laws was framed, of which the principal feature is the system of licensing the importation of certain goods charged with high duties; thus confining it to an extent proportionate to the consumption of the inhabitants, and preventing the island from becoming a dépôt for smugglers. With some trifling exceptions, the exportation is confined to goods that are the produce or manufacture of the island, on which no export duty is paid. Among the imports are corn, meal, flax, seeds, linen-yarn, wood-ashes, and flesh of all kinds, which may be imported from any place free of duty; agricultural implements, black cattle, horses, sheep, boards, brick, cordage, and twine for nets, pack-thread, hemp, tackle for the fisheries, hoops, linen, utensils for cloth manufacturers, salt, soap-lees, leather, tiles, trees, and timber, which may be imported duty free from all parts of the United Kingdom; balks, barrels, staves and headings for pipes, ebony, hoops, rod and bar iron, oak-planks, oars, spars, pipe-clay, and naval stores, from the British colonies. The manufacture of sheeting, linen, towelling, sail-cloth, and sack-cloth, was introduced about the beginning of the present century, when flax-mills were erected; and about the same period the woollen manufacture was established. There are also extensive breweries, paper-mills, tanneries (chiefly for the Manks' hides and skins), candle and soap manufactories, and various others, which the freedom from the excise duties tends greatly to encourage: the quantity of leather being insufficient for the supply of the inhabitants, much is imported from England, which is of a very superior quality. Distilleries of all kinds are prohibited by the British government, under a penalty of £200, with forfeiture of all implements employed in the process. Brandy, rum, geneva, wine, tea, coffee, and tobacco, are among the articles imported by license, but the exportation of them is prohibited.

The GOVERNMENT was originally vested in a council of elders, called from a Celtic term of that import, Iaxiari, or, according to another opinion, derived from Iaxi, a corruption of Iaisgi, a guardian, and Acci, hereditary property. The institution of the assembly is attributed to the Danish prince Orry, who, having added the Hebrides and Orcades to his conquest of this island, directed the inhabitants to choose sixteen representatives, and those of the out-isles eight, to assist him in the government. This assembly consisted of the principal land-owners, but for what time the institution continued, and what powers were exercised, cannot now be distinctly ascertained. Since the act of revestment, the functions of the several officers of administration have been more explicitly defined; but the internal policy, laws, and ancient usages of the island remain unchanged; and it is still free from the imposition of taxes, with the exception of those for the making and repairing of highways and bridges, previously noticed. The civil government is vested in the sovereign, and a council consisting of a governor, lieutenant-governor, and ten other principal officers, and the House of Keys, consisting of twenty-four constitutional representatives of the people; the two latter estates together constituting a court of Tynwald, by which all public laws are enacted and promulgated. The Governor, who, with all the civil and military officers, is appointed by the crown, is chancellor ex officio; and his consent is necessary to the enactment of a law. The Lieutenant-Governor performs all the functions of the governor in his absence. The Council consists of the governor, or lieutenant-governor, the lord bishop of the diocese, the attorney-general, the clerk of the rolls, the two deemsters, the receiver-general, the water-bailiff, or admiralty judge, the arch-deacon, and the two vicars-general, who are ex officio members of that body: the duty of the council is to advise the governor, and to assist him in the administration of justice in his several courts. The House of Keys, consisting of twenty-four of the principal proprietors of land, is the ancient assembly called Iaxiari: it is supposed to have obtained the name Keys from interpreting, in all cases, the common law; and to it lies an appeal from the inferior law courts, and in all cases of disputed titles to landed property, and then only to the Queen in council. The members fill up vacancies in their body by a majority of votes, nominating two persons, of whom the governor elects one, who thus becomes a member for life; the House may be assembled at the pleasure of the governor. The two Deemsters are officers of very extensive jurisdiction and of high authority, being chief justices of the island; one, presiding over the northern part, keeps his court at Ramsey; and the other over the southern division at Douglas. They have cognizance of all causes exceeding the sum of 40s. not being actions in which damages are to be assessed, or such as properly belong to the court of chancery. A High Bailiff is appointed for each of the four towns, by commission from the governor, and is conservator of the peace, and superintendent of police, having jurisdiction in all matters of debt under the amount of 40s. A Coroner, who also has powers analogous in many respects to those of English sheriffs, is appointed by the governor to each of the six sheadings or great divisions of the island. In each parish there is an ancient officer, called a Moar, whose duty it is to collect the rents, escheats, waifs, and estrays due to the lord, and to execute the orders of the court baron.

The LAWS of the island still retain much of their ancient peculiarity of character, though modified by occasional acts of Tynwald, and in some respects rendered more in unison with those of England. The common law was formerly administered by the deemsters and keys, who, under the lord proprietor, governed the island by a jus non scriptum, committed to their loyalty and fidelity, as a sacred trust, and by them orally communicated to posterity. Hence the Manks, from the remotest period of antiquity, designated their common law by the name of "Breast Laws," from their being deposited in the breasts of the deemsters and keys, and only on important occasions divulged to the people. The island has always been governed by its own laws: its most ancient records are the laws and ordinances enacted by the court of Tynwald, in 1417. The statute book commences in 1422, and contains a collection of statutes, ordinances and customs, "presented, reputed, and used for the laws of the island." The laws enacted in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries have but little weight as precedents; but a more regular system of legislation subsisted about the year 1764, since which very few alterations have been made. By an act of Tynwald, in 1777, and subsequently, in the 57th of George III., the code now in general use was revised, the institution of the grand jury differing from that of England only in the additional benefit of receiving evidence on the part of the accused, which enables them with more certainty to decide upon the finding of a bill. The principal COURTS are those of Chancery, Exchequer, Common Law, General Gaol Delivery, Admiralty, the Deemsters, the High Bailiffs, and the Ecclesiastical courts. The Court of Chancery, in matters of civil property, has the most extensive jurisdiction of all the courts in the island, and is both a court of law and equity: the governor, or, in his absence, the lieutenant-governor, who is the representative of the sovereign, presides, assisted by the deemsters, the clerk of the rolls, and the water-bailiff or admiralty judge. The Court of Exchequer, which is generally held immediately after the court of chancery, under the governor, or lieutenant-governor, takes cognizance of all matters connected with the revenue. The Courts of Common Law are held at Castle Rushen, and Ramsey, four times in the year; the governor is president, but his duties are performed by one of the deemsters, agreeably to a statute law to that effect. The court takes cognizance of all actions, real, personal, and mixed, and of all suits at common law that require to be determined by a jury. The Court of General Gaol Delivery is held in Castle Rushen twice in the year, under the governor, or lieutenant-governor, assisted by the judicial members of the council, and other officers, for determining upon all offences which by the laws of the island are deemed capital. The Court of Admiralty, in which the water-bailiff presides as sole judge, is held every Saturday, and takes cognizance of all pleas respecting maritime affairs, and of all offences committed on the seas, within the distance of three leagues from the shores of the island. The Deemsters' Courts, which are of great antiquity, are held weekly in the north and south districts into which the island is divided, the former at Ramsey, Kirk-Michael, or Peel, and the latter at Douglas and Castletown; they take cognizance of slanders, assaults, debts, contracts, and all causes not involving the inheritance of land. The High Bailiff's courts are held at Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and Ramsey, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The Court for Insolvent Debtors is held half-yearly at Castletown. The Ecclesiastical courts are, the Consistorial Court, in which the bishop, or his vicars-general, and registrar preside, for all matters relating to the probate of wills, granting letters of administration, alimony, church assessments, the guardianship of property belonging to minors, and on all matters pro salute animæ; the Court of the Vicars-General, which takes cognizance generally of all offences against religion and the interests of the church; and the Chapter, or Circuit Court, for matters connected with the see, and the general affairs of the diocese. The military establishment of the island consists generally of one or two companies of regular troops detached from regiments in England, stationed at Castletown, for manning the garrisons, and for the defence of the coast, under the command of the governor. Each of the parishes furnishes four men on horseback, armed, under a captain appointed by the governor; and in each is also an officer, appointed by the governor, called the captain of the parish, who on emergency calls out the militia under his command, and who is also by virtue of his office conservator of the peace.

The four towns are Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and Ramsey. CASTLETOWN, in the parish of Kirk-Malew, anciently called Rushen, contains 2283 inhabitants, and, being the seat of government, is considered the capital: it is situated at the southern extremity of the island, and on the western shore of Castletown bay, opposite the promontory of Langness Point, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Douglas, the principal port. The town, which is the most ancient in the island, is supposed to be coeval with the erection of the castle of Rushen, from which it derived its name, and which was founded by Guttred, the second Danish sovereign in succession from Orry. It is intersected by a small river, over which are, a drawbridge, opposite to the castle, for foot passengers, and higher up a bridge of stone for carriages. Near the castle wall is a spacious area, forming the market-place; and a convenient market-house, with an assembly-room over it, was built in 1830. In the town and its vicinity are breweries, corn-mills, and tanneries. The Castle, which was originally the principal fortress in the island, is situated on the west side of the river, and is considered to bear a striking resemblance to the castle of Elsinore, in Denmark; it is surrounded by a lofty embattled wall and fosse, and defended by a glacis of stone, said to have been added by Cardinal Wolsey, when guardian to Edward, Earl of Derby. The building is quadrangular, with square towers on the sides, the largest more than 80 feet high: within the area are some commodious and recently modernised apartments, until of late, the residence of the lieutenant-governor, and rooms in which the courts are held; and on the walls are three buildings of small dimensions, where the records are kept, and the business of the Rolls' office is transacted. The keep, which is built of hard limestone resembling that found in the neighbourhood, is still entire, and forms the only prison in the island. The old chapel, erected in 1698 by Bishop Wilson, was taken down in 1826; and the present edifice, handsomely built of limestone cemented, with an octagonal tower, was erected at an expense of £1600. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. King William's College was founded in 1830, by the trustees of property, now producing £500 per annum, assigned by Bishop Barrow, in 1668, for the promotion of sound learning, and for the education and support of two young men to supply the Manks' churches, and other charitable uses. The course of studies embraces religious instruction, the classics, mathematics, oriental literature, the modern languages, navigation, and other sciences, forming a complete and general system of education; the pupils pay a small sum per quarter, and a small admission fee towards the establishment of a library. The buildings, which were consumed by fire in Jan. 1844, were partly in the early English and partly in the Elizabethan style, and formed a spacious cruciform structure, 210 feet in length from east to west, and 135 from north to south: from the intersection rose an embattled tower, 115 feet high, strengthened with buttresses, and crowned by a parapet. They included a handsome church, in the early English style, the erection of which was defrayed from funds collected in England by Bishop Ward, for providing additional churches in the island; and the collegiate buildings, which cost £6000, defrayed partly with money saved out of the academic fund, and partly by the liberal subscriptions of the inhabitants, comprised a public lecture-room, a large hall for a library, four large class-rooms, and houses for the masters, containing numerous apartments for the accommodation of pupils as boarders. Mr. and Mrs. Taubman, in 1799, bequeathed £25 per annum for the support of a school for boys: a national school is maintained by subscription, and a small parochial school by the impropriate funds of the island. At Derby haven is a small village, chiefly consisting of cottages and some large herring warehouses; and in the neighbourhood of the town are several lime-kilns.

DOUGLAS, the largest, most populous, and greatest commercial town in the island, is situated partly in the parish of Kirk-Braddan, but chiefly in that of Onchan, near the centre of the eastern coast, and on the south of the large semicircular bay of the same name. The town, which contains 8647 inhabitants, derives its name from the rivers Dhoo and Glass uniting their streams a little above it and falling into the harbour; it is of a triangular form, the longest side extending from the bridge at the upper end of the harbour, in a north-easterly direction, towards the coast, and the shortest from the same point in a direction towards the pier. The streets are in many parts inconvenient and narrow, and the houses without order or uniformity of appearance; but, from the relative importance of its commerce, and the advantages of its port, it has undergone considerable improvement, and in the suburbs are several new streets regularly formed, and houses of handsome appearance. The town is partially paved, and lighted with gas by a company chartered by act of Tynwald, and the inhabitants are supplied with water: the pier forms an agreeable promenade. To the south is a range of hills, called the How of Douglas; and on the north-east are seen the cliff of Clay Head, and the mountains of Sneafel and Ben-e-phot, with the spacious intervening bay, to the right of which is a long extent of the Cumberland coast, crowned with distant mountains; and from the summit of Douglas Head, still more to the right, the high lands of Wales are plainly discernible. The bay, with the town and country above it, rising from its shores in the form of an amphitheatre, forms a beautiful object, as approached from the sea; and to the north of the town are extensive and firm sands. About half a mile beyond the town is Mona Castle, a magnificent mansion, erected at an expense of £40,000, by the late Duke of Athol, of a fine white sandstone, brought from the Isle of Arran. Near it is the elegant marine villa, the late residence of Col. Stewart, pleasantly situated; and adjoining the lodge is the Marine Terrace, a handsome range of houses of modern erection. At the entrance of the bay, on the south shore, is a battery of two guns; and on the banks of the river, to the west of the town, are several handsome seats, among which is the Nunnery, a building in the early English style, so called from the contiguous ruins of an ancient religious establishment founded, according to Manks' tradition, in the sixth century, by St. Bridget, and of which the prioress was anciently a baroness of the island. The salubrity of the air, and the fineness of the beach, have rendered Douglas a place of general resort for sea-bathing, and suitable residences and lodging-houses have been erected at the northern extremity of the bay, and in the town, for the accommodation of the numerous visitors who frequent it during the summer months. A neat theatre is opened during the season, and assemblies are held in an elegant suite of rooms at the British hotel; there are several libraries and newsrooms in various parts of the town, and a United Service Club was established in 1829.

Considerable trade is carried on at Douglas with the neighbouring coasts; and ship-building, both for home and for foreign use, consisting chiefly of small vessels and fishing-boats, is greatly encouraged, the shipwrights being much esteemed for their skill in the construction of those vessels. There are also several soap-manufactories, tan-yards, breweries, and corn-mills, in the town and neighbourhood. The custom-house, a commodious building, situated on the quay, was formerly the residence of the Duke of Athol. There are two steam-packets to Liverpool direct, every other day; and during the summer the voyage, which is 72 miles long, is performed in eight hours. Scottish steam-vessels running between Liverpool and Glasgow call daily, and one from Whitehaven to Dublin every Saturday, on her way thither, and every Monday on her return, during the summer: there are also several traders from the port to Liverpool, Whitehaven, and to the Scottish and Irish ports. The market, on Saturday, is well furnished with provisions of all kinds; and there is an ample supply of fresh fish throughout the year, with a little salmon during the summer months. A fair for cattle is held on Nov. 12th. The deemster for the southern division of the island holds his court here as occasion requires, and the high bailiff every Saturday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The vicars-general hold an ecclesiastical court every alternate Friday, and a chapter or circuit court in spring and autumn. The court-house, situated near the pier, is a plain building, with a small lock-up house for the confinement of offenders previously to their being sent to Castletown for trial. On one side of the market-place is a small chapel, dedicated to St. Matthew, to which is attached a library, established by Bishop Wilson, and augmented by Bishop Hyldesley, with a bequest of 200 volumes; on an eminence to the west of the town is a neat chapel, dedicated to St. George; and another, dedicated to St. Barnabas, was lately erected in Fore-street, in the early English style, with turrets crowned with pinnacles at the angles of the nave, and at the west end a handsome tower surmounted by a spire, 140 feet high. A condemned sloop of war, on the application of Bishop Ward, was presented by Earl de Grey, when first lord of the admiralty, and is moored in the harbour as a mariners' chapel. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. A national school, established in 1810, and for which commodious schoolrooms have been erected, at an expense of £1120, is supported by subscription; a house of industry has been established within the last few years, and there are various benefit and friendly societies.

PEEL, anciently called Holme Town, in the parish of Kirk-German, containing 2133 inhabitants, is situated on the western coast, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Douglas, and 12 from Castletown. It is chiefly remarkable for the remains of its ancient castle and cathedral, to which it was indebted for its early importance. Prior to the sale of the island in 1765, it was a place of considerable commerce, and the grand resort of smugglers; but since that period the inhabitants have been principally employed in agriculture and the fishery, herrings on this part of the coast being taken in abundance, and not less than seventy boats belonging to the harbour. The remains of the Castle are situated on a small rocky island, about 100 yards west of the town, and separated from it by Peel river, but joined to the mainland by a stone wall shelving towards the summit, built many years since to defend the harbour. The walls are flanked with towers, and inclose a polygonal area of about five acres, almost filled with the ruins of walls, buildings, and dwelling-houses; and in the centre is a pyramidal mound of earth, surrounded by a ditch, supposed to have been either a tumulus raised over the ashes of some illustrious chief, or from the summit of which harangues were made to the populace. Within the area are the ruins of the ancient church of St. German, erected about the year 1245, as the Cathedral, which has not been used, except as a burial-place, for many years: beneath the eastern part of it is a vault, eighteen feet deep, of which the groined roof is supported on low dwarf pillars, and which was anciently used as the ecclesiastical prison. Bishop Hyldesley was the last prelate enthroned in the church. The ruins of St. Patrick's, the first Christian church erected in the island, are a little to the westward of it, and exhibit some characteristics of the Norman style. In the rocks along the neighbouring coast are many curious caverns; and agates and cornelians are found on the sands. The market is on Friday, chiefly for provisions; and there are fairs on March 28th and July 24th, for horses and cattle. The deemsters hold their courts here occasionally; the high bailiff a court every Saturday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; and the vicars-general a chapter or circuit court, in spring and autumn. A new court-house has recently been erected. The free grammar school was founded in 1746, by Philip Moore, Esq., who endowed it with £500; a mathematical school was founded in 1763, by the Rev. James Moore, of Dublin, who bequeathed the ground-rent of three houses in that city; there is also a national school, and several small bequests have been left for instruction. About three miles from the town is the Tynwald Mount, where all new laws, according to ancient usage, must be promulgated to the people. When the legislative assembly is collected, a chair under a canopy is placed on the summit for the governor, or lieutenant-governor, below whom, on terraces, the deemsters, the council, and the keys, take their places, according to their respective orders, the surrounding area being occupied by the people. The Tynwald court is held on July 5th, when officers are chosen for the year. The legislative assembly meet at St. John's chapel, from which, after divine service has been performed, they move in procession to the mount.

RAMSEY, containing 2104 inhabitants, is situated on the north-eastern coast, in the parish of Kirk-Maughold, $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Douglas, and 25 (N. E.) from Castletown, near the mouth of the river Sulby, the largest in the island, over which is a stone bridge of three arches. The neighbourhood, which is exceedingly picturesque, and adorned with several handsome seats and pleasing villas, is remarkable as the scene of numerous battles fought between the Danes and the Scots, when the latter had possession of the island. The town is irregularly built; but the streets are wide, clean, and well paved. The trade consists principally in the exportation of Manks' produce, especially wheat, amounting in value to about £40,000 per annum; and several steam-packets between Liverpool and Glasgow call at the port twice in the week. The market, on Saturday, is abundantly supplied with provisions, which are lower in price than at any other town in the island. Common-law courts are held here quarterly, at which a deemster presides; the deemster for the northern division of the island holds his court occasionally, and the high bailiff every Saturday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. An ecclesiastical court, in which either the bishop or his vicar-general presides, takes place every alternate week; and a chapter or circuit court, in spring and autumn. The court-house, which is the largest in the island, is a neat building, ornamented over the entrance with the arms of England and those of the island sculptured in stone. A chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, and situated in the market-place, was erected in 1819, by subscription; and the old chapel, just without the town, is now used only as a burial-place for strangers. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans; also two national schools; and some small sums have been left for instruction, and for the poor.

The SEE, according to Camden, was originally established in the ninth century, by Pope Gregory IV., in the small village of Sodor, in Iona, or St. Columb's isle, corruptly called Icolmkill, a small island of the Hebrides. In 1098, Magnus, King of Norway, having by conquest obtained possession of those islands and the Isle of Man, united them under one bishop, in whose jurisdiction they continued till 1333, when the English took the island; since which period, though the bishop has maintained no claim to the see of Sodor, he has retained the ancient title of Sodor and Man. He enjoys all the dignities and spiritual rights of other bishops, with the exception of having a vote in the house of peers, in which, by courtesy only, he has a seat. The see was annexed to the province of York in the 33rd of Henry VIII. The ecclesiastical government is vested in a bishop, archdeacon, two vicars-general, an episcopal registrar, an official, and an archdeacon's registrar; the bishop has jurisdiction over 17 benefices, including 28 churches, and has an endowment of £2000 per annum, the appointment of the vicars-general, and the patronage of 4 livings.

The Island is divided into the north and south portions, each of which contains three sheadings. In the north division are, Ayre sheading, comprising the parishes of Kirk-Andreas, Kirk-Bride, and Kirk-Christ-Lezayre; Garff sheading, those of Kirk-Lonan and Kirk-Maughold; and Michael sheading, those of Kirk-Ballaugh, Jurby, and Kirk-Michael. In the southern division are, Glanfaba sheading, comprising the parishes of Kirk-German, Kirk-Marown, and Kirk-Patrick; Middle sheading, those of Kirk-St. Anne, Kirk-Braddan, and Kirk-Onchan; and Rushen sheading, those of Kirk-Arbory, Kirk-Christ-Rushen, and Kirk-Malew. The parish of KIRK-ANDREAS is situated in the northern part of the island, and contains 2332 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £800. The church, which was rebuilt in 1802, contains a handsome marble font, which formerly belonged to Philip I. of France, but, being confiscated at the time of the Revolution, was presented to the parish by Mr. Corlett: near the entrance gate is an ancient cross with Runic inscriptions. There is a parochial school, and at Kerro-Garroo is a school for girls; also a national school. A fair is held in the village on the 11th of December, for cattle. Near a seat called Ballacurry, is a quadrangular encampment, supposed to have been constructed by the parliamentary troops in the civil war of the 17th century. Some barrows have been opened in the parish, and found to contain urns and other relics of antiquity.

KIRK-ST. ANNE parish, 4 miles (N. E.) from Castletown, on the road to Douglas, contains 769 inhabitants, and comprises by measurement 4000 acres, chiefly in pasture: stone of good quality is quarried for building and also used for repairing the roads. The village is neatly built, and the surrounding scenery pleasingly diversified. A fair for cattle is held on Whit-Monday. The living is a vicarage in the patronage and impropriation of the Crown: the vicarial tithes, by a recent act of the Manks' legislature, have been commuted for a rent-charge of £175. 3. 10½., and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a small neat edifice, built in 1720. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. A national school was endowed with £100, by Mr. William Leece, of Liverpool, in 1805; and in the village is a small school of industry for girls. About a mile to the east of the church, is an irregular circle of stones probably Druidical remains; and on the coast to the left hand of Greenock Creek is an oblong tumulus called Cronk na Myrrhow, or the Hill of the Dead.

KIRK-ARBORY parish is situated in the southern part of the island, and, including the village of Colby, contains 1615 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £97; impropriator, G. Quirk, Esq. There is a parochial school. Fairs are held on June 22nd, October 28th, and December 6th. Near Balladoole is a brackish spring, probably issuing from a salt rock. Behind Colby House is Kiel-Pharrick, or Kirk-Patrick, a good specimen of the ancient kiels, or kirks, so common in the island: these kiels consist of a small inclosed area occupied with graves, in the centre of which are the ruins of the ancient church, generally of a quadrangular form, and of diminutive proportions. In the vicinity are five lofty stones of uncommon dimensions, and some other Druidical remains; and there are barrows in various parts of the parish.

BALLAUGH parish lies in the north-western portion of the island, and contains 1516 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Crown, with a net income of £300; one-third of the rectorial tithes belongs to the bishop. The old church, dedicated to St. Mary, is about a mile from the village, near which a new building has recently been erected, in the early English style, with a lofty embattled tower of three stages, strengthened with buttresses and crowned by pinnacles. There is a parochial school. A public brewery has been established; and fairs take place on May 20th and August 26th. In this and the adjoining parishes are several rabbit-warrens; and near the village are pits of shell marl, in which heads, horns, and skeletons of gigantic antediluvian elks have been found, of which a complete skeleton, of the largest dimensions, is deposited in the museum of the University of Edinburgh.

KIRK-BRADDAN parish includes part of the town of Douglas, and contains 2379 inhabitants. There are paper and corn mills, and a linen manufactory, employing about 400 persons, to which are attached a flax-mill and spacious bleaching-grounds. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the tithes of four quarter lands, and with the living of St. George annexed; net income of Braddan, £95; and of St. George, £245; patron, and appropriator of the remainder of the tithes, the Bishop. The church is pleasantly situated in a picturesque spot, about two miles from Douglas, on the road to Peel: in the churchyard are a Runic pillar, with an inscription, and several ancient crosses. There are two other churches, the livings of which are perpetual curacies; net income of St. Barnabas', £200; patrons, Trustees: net income of St. Matthew's, £57; patron, the Bishop. Here is a parochial school. Near the bleaching-green, on that branch of the Douglas river called the Glass, is a fortified hill named Castle Ward; and in the vicinity are various ruins of kiels, or kirks, which are preserved with scrupulous veneration.

KIRK-BRIDE is the most northerly parish in the island, and contains 1153 inhabitants. A fair for cattle is held on February 12th. In the parish is the Point of Ayre, forming the northern extremity; the land is very low, and the shoals that extend to a considerable distance from the shore have occasioned many shipwrecks. A few years since, a lighthouse was erected near the Point, to the height of 106 feet above the level of the sea. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Crown; one-third of the rectorial tithes belongs to the bishop. The church is dedicated to St. Bridget. A school is supported by subscription. There are several tumuli in the parish.

KIRK-CHRIST-LEZAYRE parish, situated near the town of Ramsey, contains 2322 inhabitants; it is very extensive, and abounds with picturesque views and much beautiful scenery. Turf and bog timber are found in considerable quantities within its limits. Fairs for cattle are held at the village of Sulby, in the parish, on the 4th of June and 24th of July. The living is a vicarage, with a net income of £97; the patronage, and two-thirds of the rectorial tithes, belong to the Crown, and the remaining third to the Bishop. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. A chapel of ease was erected at Sulby in 1839; it is a handsome cruciform structure in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire, and contains under the same roof schoolrooms for boys and girls, which, being thrown open by sliding panels, form on Sundays a part of the space allotted to the congregation. In addition to the parochial school are, the Sulby school, endowed with £11 per annum; and the Mountain school, founded in 1764.

KIRK-CHRIST-RUSHEN parish, 4 miles (W.) from Castletown, contains 3079 inhabitants, and comprises several thousand acres, of which 5428 are titheable; it includes Spanish Head, the Calf of Man, and the villages of Port St. Mary and Port Erin. The Calf of Man contains only a small portion of arable land, the remainder consisting entirely of sheep-walks, wearing a dreary aspect, unenlivened, with the exception of the garden of the farmer, by either shrub or tree. This small isle is the resort of sea-fowl and aquatic birds of every kind, and abounds with rabbits, of which not less than 2000 are annually killed. In the other parts of the parish some lead-mines were formerly wrought, but have been for a long time discontinued; there are good quarries of limestone, and also of freestone for building. The villages of Port St. Mary and Port Erin are pleasantly situated and neatly built, and the surrounding scenery abounds with romantic features. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £140, and the glebe contains one acre, with a house, recently built. The church is a plain neat edifice, erected in 1757. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; and a parochial, a national, and a girls' school, are supported. Between Port St. Mary and Port Erin are two huge masses of unhewn slate called the "Giants' quoining stones;" and within a mile of them is Fairy Hill, a barrow situated in a low morass, from which two defiles lead to Port Erin bay and the creek of Fleswick.

KIRK-GERMAN parish, including the town of Peel, contains 4029 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage; net income, £90; patron and appropriator, the Bishop. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a parochial school; and at St. John's is a chapel, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Crown. Fairs are held at St. John's on March 17th, May 1st and 18th, July 5th, and November 1st; and a fair takes place at Peel on the 28th of March. There are several ancient kiels in the parish.

KIRK-JURBY parish occupies the north-western part of the island, and contains 1063 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage; net income, £90; patron and appropriator, the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Patrick, stands about half a mile to the north-east of Point Jurby, on an elevated site, from which the high lands of England, Scotland, and Ireland, may be plainly discerned. In the churchyard is a barrow, and in the parish are various others, besides several watch and ward hills. There is a parochial school. A statute-fair is held on April 5th, for hiring female servants. Turf and bog timber are found in the parish, in great abundance.

KIRK-LONAN parish, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Douglas, contains 2220 inhabitants, and comprises 755 acres, of which about 600 are sheep pasture, a few acres woodland, and the remainder inferior arable; the substratum is chiefly freestone of good quality for building, which is extensively quarried, and there are some mines of lead and copper ore. The village of Laxey is finely situated on the sea-shore, near the influx of a stream, on the banks of which are a flax-mill and a paper-mill, in the latter of which a considerable quantity of paper is manufactured for home consumption and exportation. Fairs are held on the 10th of May and the 5th of August, for horses and cattle. The living is a vicarage, endowed with one-third of the tithes of the parish; the net income is £140, and the patronage and impropriation belong to the Crown; the glebe comprises 13 acres. The church, dedicated to St. Lomanus, was rebuilt by subscription, in 1833, and is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a tower, surmounted by a spire. Here are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; also a parochial, and a national school. About two miles on the road to Douglas are parts of a Druidical tomb called the Cloven-stones, from two stones loftier than the others, and by tradition said to have been erected over the remains of a Welsh prince who, having landed at Laxey, for the invasion of the island, was killed by the natives, and interred on the spot. There are also numerous cairns and barrows.

KIRK-MALEW parish, including Castletown, the capital of the island and the seat of government, and the villages of Ballasalla and Derby haven, contains 5368 inhabitants; it is situated at the south-western extremity of the island, and comprises by computation 12,000 acres, of which 9000 are arable, and the greater portion of the remainder meadow and pasture. The surface is boldly varied, rising in some parts into hills of mountainous elevation, and the lower grounds are watered by a river which flows into Castletown bay; the scenery is richly diversified and beautifully picturesque. There are mines producing lead and copper, and also some quarries of excellent building-stone; on the northern declivity of South Barrule mountain are extensive slate-quarries, and within the parish are the Foxdale lead-mines. On the banks of the river are flax and corn mills, and there are likewise some public breweries. A considerable trade is carried on in lime, not only for the supply of the island, but also for exportation to England, Scotland, and Ireland; the whole is raised from the quarries and lime-works belonging to Thomas Moore and Thomas Jefferson, Esqrs. The village of Ballasalla, which is the largest and most populous in the island, is beautifully situated, comprehending some fine views, in which the venerable ruins of Rushen Abbey, on the opposite bank of the river, form an interesting feature. Fairs are held at St. Mark's on the 5th of January and the 12th of May, and at Ballasalla on the 12th of August and 29th of September, for cattle. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Crown: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £140, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The church, erected in 1688, is a neat structure, and contains numerous handsome monuments. The chapel of ease, dedicated to St. Mark, was erected in 1772, chiefly under the auspices of Bishop Hyldesley, who endowed it with a glebe of 60 acres; it was repaired in 1830, at the expense of the bishop of the diocese. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. The free grammar school at Castletown was founded in 1666, by Bishop Barrow, who endowed it with £60 per annum, arising from the impropriate fund, as a salary to the master. The parochial school at Ballasalla is endowed with £8 per annum for the master; a national school at Castletown is maintained by subscription; and there are schools at Ballasalla and Grenaby supported by small quarterly payments. Near Ballasalla are the remains of the monastery of St. Mary of Rushen, founded in 1098, and endowed with one-third of the tithes of the island; and in several parts of the coast are vestiges of ancient fortifications, among which is a circular encampment, surrounded with a moat, and defended by a parapet.

KIRK-MAROWN parish, situated on the road between the towns of Douglas and Peel, contains 1317 inhabitants, and comprises by computation 10,000 acres, of which about one-half are arable, and the other pasture and mountain, with a moderate proportion of woodland. The surface is mountainous, and the scenery much diversified, being in some parts embellished with plantations of firs, chiefly larch, and with timber, principally ash, elm, and sycamore; the soil in the valleys is a rich loam, and on the hills a lighter kind of loam intermixed with gravel. The substratum is mostly primitive rock, and abounds with mineral produce of various kinds, but chiefly lead. A fair for horses and cows is held on the 2nd of February. The living is a vicarage; net income, £70, with 13 acres of glebe; patron, the Crown. The church was erected in 1754, by subscription, aided by the Athol family, and is a neat structure, in the early English style, containing 300 sittings. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a parochial school, and an infants' school, are supported, partly by an endowment from the Improprate Fund and from Lady Elizabeth Hastings' charity. The old church of the barony forms an interesting ruin. On the northern acclivity of Mount Murray are the most perfect remains of a Druidical temple to be found in the island; it consists of stones of moderate size, placed erect, and at regular distances, inclosing a circular area 14 yards in diameter, and to the east of the inclosure are two semicircular mounds of stone and earth, with an interval of five yards between them, circumscribing the eastern part of the circle; the spot is bleak and sterile, but the name Glen Darrah, signifying in the Manks language the vale of the oaks, would imply that it was formerly planted.

KIRK-MAUGHOLD parish, which includes the town of Ramsey, and the villages of Maughold and Port Vullin, contains 3689 inhabitants; it is situated on the north-eastern coast, extending to the bold promontory of Maughold Head, which terminates in a lofty and precipitous cliff, forming the eastern extremity of the island. The surface is boldly varied, and the scenery richly diversified, and in many parts embellished with wood; the higher grounds command extensive sea-views, embracing in the distance the mountains of Scotland and of Cumberland. On one of the acclivities is a fine spring called St. Maughold's Well, formerly of great celebrity, and still resorted to for its medicinal properties; and at Ballaglass is a natural cascade of great beauty, surrounded by well-wooded scenery. The soil is for the greater part a gravel, but produces excellent barley; the substratum abounds in mineral produce, and there are mines of iron in operation, of which the ore is exported to England and Scotland, and also some extensive quarries of good building-stone. Fairs are held in March and November, chiefly for cattle. The living is a vicarage, with a net income of £105; the glebe comprises 70 acres; the patronage and impropriation belong to the Crown. The church is an ancient structure, in the later English style, situated in an area of three acres in extent, and was formerly a sanctuary for criminals; a portion of the churchyard was appropriated to the use of the Society of Friends. There are two places of worship for Wesleyans; and a parochial school is endowed with £15 per annum. Opposite to the church gate is a cross, and near it a column consisting of a circular shaft about five feet high, supporting a cubic block of stone, with figures sculptured on the sides; they are both supposed to be of Danish origin. About half way between the village and Ramsey, also, is a stone cross of great antiquity.

KIRK-ST. MICHAEL parish, situated on the road to Ramsey from Peel, contains 1376 inhabitants, and comprises by computation 9000 acres, of which 5000 are arable, 2000 pasture, and about 2000 mountain and common land. It is intersected from north-east to south-west by the mountains Slieudhoo, Slieu-ne-Graughane, and Sartyl, from which the lands slope towards the sea-shore, terminating in precipitous heights, varying from 20 to 100 feet above the level of the sea. The scenery is in many parts beautifully romantic; the heights are indented with several deep glens, watered by small streams descending from the hills and flowing into the sea, making in their progress some picturesque waterfalls; of these glens the principal are Glen Trunk, Glen Val Eirab, Glen Wyllan, and Glen Balla Gawn. Stone of excellent quality is abundant. This place forms the principal residence of the bishop of the island; and within a mile to the west of the village is Bishops' Court, the Episcopal Palace, an ancient structure, of which mention occurs in the thirteenth century. The building was originally a massive tower, surrounded by a moat, including a spacious area, but has been improved at various times by successive prelates; Bishop Murray erected an elegant chapel, and added several apartments to the palace, and also embellished the demesne, which comprises from 500 to 600 acres. Near the village, a neat court-house has been built within the last few years, in which the consistory court is held on the last Thursday in every month, except in September and December, in which the bishop presides, either in person or by his vicars-general and registrar, and in which also the vicars-general hold their chapter or circuit courts in spring and autumn. The village, which is situated near the sea-shore, is neatly built; there are three mills for grain, and one for flax, with a carding-mill and a dye-house. Fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep are held on the 10th of October. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £94, with a glebe of 25 acres. The church, rebuilt in 1835, at a cost of £1300, is in the Norman style, and contains 800 sittings; it has been recently coated with Roman cement, at an expense of £200. In the churchyard are the tombs of the venerable Bishop Wilson, who died in the 93rd year of his age, and the 58th of his prelacy, and of his successor, Bishop Hyldesley: Dr. John Phillipps, Dr. George Mason, and Dr. C. Crigan, also bishops of the see, were likewise interred here. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. A parochial and a national school, in one building, erected in 1841, are partly supported by a small endowment from the Improprate fund and Lady Elizabeth Hastings' charity. Opposite to the churchyard gate is a lofty square Runic pillar of slate stone, curiously sculptured from the base to the summit, with devices singularly involved, and bearing an inscription to the honour of Thurulf, a Norwegian chief. There are several barrows in the neighbourhood. The late Col. Mark Wilks, author of Historical Sketches of the South of India, was a native of the parish, of which his father was incumbent.

KIRK-ONCHAN parish includes the chief part of the town of Douglas, and contains 10,980 inhabitants; it is situated on the road to Ramsey, and comprises 4782a. 3r. 16p. The living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £140, and the glebe, in two detached portions, comprises 23 acres, with a house, built in 1839. The church, dedicated to St. Paul, and erected in 1833, is a handsome structure, in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire. There are places of worship for Wesleyans; and a parochial school is partly supported by an endowment from the Improprate fund and Lady Elizabeth Hastings' charity.

KIRK-PATRICK parish, containing 2768 inhabitants, is situated about a mile and a half from the town of Peel, and was formerly a part of the parish of Kirk-German, from which it was separated in 1714. It is bounded by the small river Neb, which, except in times of flood, is merely a trout stream flowing through Peel into the sea. The surface is mountainous, with comparatively little wood, though recently some plantations have been commenced, which, when sufficiently extended, will greatly enrich the scenery; the lands are chiefly arable, and the produce excellent wheat, of which considerable quantities are sent to Liverpool. To the south of the church is the romantic Glen Moij, celebrated for its beautiful waterfall, and near it is a vein of lead-ore; there are also several quarries of blue slate, little inferior to that of Wales. The manufacture of woollen-cloth and blankets is carried on occasionally for the use of the country people, on a very limited scale. The living is a vicarage; net value, £122, with a detached glebe of 40 acres; patron, the Bishop. The church was erected on the separation of the parish, chiefly through the exertions of Bishop Wilson, who contributed £50 towards its endowment; it is a plain structure. The old church, now in ruins, is within the walls of Peel Castle. A church was erected at Dalby, in 1838, by Bishop Ward, and is a handsome edifice, in the later English style, dedicated to St. James. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; also a parochial school, with an endowment of £12 per annum. Near Dalby is a spot said to have been anciently the cemetery of the Manks monarchs; it is situated under a lofty cairn, and is accessible at high water by boats. Ballamoore was formerly the seat of Sir George Moore, the only native of Man that ever attained the honour of knighthood.

The service in the several churches is performed alternately in the Manks' and English languages. The entire number of dissenters' places of worship exceeds forty. By letters-patent, dated 1675, Charles II. granted an annuity of £100, payable from the exchequer, out of the excise duties, towards the maintenance of poor clergymen of the isle, out of which £3 per annum were to be paid to the schools of Castletown, Douglas, Ramsey, Kirk-Andreas, Ballaugh, and Kirk-Bride. The impropriate tithes of several parishes were also purchased from Charles, Earl of Derby, by Bishop Barrow and Archdeacon Fletcher, for the sum of £1000, as appears by indenture, dated November 1st, 1666, for the purpose of augmenting the stipends of the poorer livings, and for the erection of a free school, and the support of a master, in each parish in the island. On the death of James, Earl of Derby, in 1735, James, Duke of Athol, as heir-general of the Derby family, took possession of the tithes, for the recovery of which, or for indemnity for the loss, Bishop Wilson and Archdeacon Kippax, in 1742, filed a bill in chancery. The earl agreed to pay the annual sum of £219. 7. 10½.; but this payment having been discontinued in 1809, a bill of revivor was filed by Bishop Crigan and Archdeacon Mylrea, who eventually obtained the payment into the Bank of England of £16,000, in discharge of the obligation. The produce of this sum, £600 per annum, is appropriated to the augmentation of all church livings under £90 per annum, which are raised to that sum; to the payment of £60 per annum to the master of the grammar school at Castletown, and £5. 10. per annum to each of the masters of the parochial schools. James, Duke of Ormond, in 1676, charged certain estates in Ireland with the payment of £60 per annum, for the establishment of a lectureship in philosophy, history, and logic; but after the duke's death the payment was discontinued, and Bishop Wilson obtained, in commutation, the sum of £600, the produce of which is appropriated to that purpose. Lady Elizabeth Hastings, in 1739, bequeathed £40 per annum, arising from lands and tenements in the West riding of Yorkshire, to be distributed among certain parishes, for instruction. Mrs. Halsalls, in 1758, bequeathed property in the isle, now producing £111 per annum, to erect a house for the master of the grammar school at Castletown, and to build and endow a free school there for girls; the residue to be annually applied to the support of the widows, and apprenticing the orphan children of clergymen. For this last purpose the income, augmented by subsequent benefactions, is about £110 per annum. Bishop Hyllesley left £600 to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, to supply the islanders with religious books.

MANACCAN, or MONATHON (St. MENAACUS AND St. DUNSTAN), a parish, in the union of HELSTON, W. division of the hundred of KERRIER and of the county of CORNWALL, 7 miles (S. W. by S.) from Falmouth; containing 569 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in a pleasant vale of the same name, is bounded on the east by the river Hel, and includes the small port of Helford. The parish comprises by measurement 1718 acres: there are slate-quarries at Treath, and stone of good quality for building is obtained. In a stream that flows through the vale into the estuary adjoining the parish, a mineral was discovered a few years since, which was called Manaccanite, and subsequently Titanium; it is one of the varieties of Titaniferous iron. The river, which at Helford is nearly a mile in breadth, is navigable for three miles beyond that port for vessels bringing timber from Norway; and the port affords safe anchorage for vessels of from 200 to 300 tons' burthen, if detained by contrary winds from reaching Falmouth. Fairs are held on the 11th of March and 15th of October, or on the Tuesdays nearest to those days. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £4. 16. 0½.; patron, Bishop of Exeter; impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, G. W. F. B. Gregor, Esq. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £240, and the vicarial for £180, and the glebe comprises 34 acres. The church, an ancient structure, in the early English style, received, in 1824, an addition of 100 free sittings: a large fig-tree growing out of the south wall, and about sixty years old, is in a flourishing state. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans, and a national school. At Tregonwell are vestiges of an old chapel, and Roman coins have been frequently found there; and at Resmorden is a double intrenchment, running parallel with the road from Helston to St. Keverne. The Rev. R. Polwhele, historian of the counties of Cornwall and Devon, was vicar from 1794 to 1821.

MANATON (St. WINIFRED), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of TEIGNBRIDGE, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (S.) from Moreton; containing 429 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4200 acres, of which 2469 are common or waste land: tin is procured in abundance, and at Challacombe are mines in operation; granite also is found, and from the quarries, which are not now worked, were supplied great quantities used in the erection of Waterloo bridge, London. The river Bovey flows through a rocky subterranean channel, about a furlong in length, and forms a picturesque cascade; and on Hayne Down is a pillar of granite. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 12. 8½.; net income, £209; patron and incumbent, Rev. W. Carwithen, D.D.: the glebe comprises 36 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. A school is partly supported by subscription. At Grimspound, in the parish, is an inclosure of loose stones, containing about three acres, within which are several minor inclosures. The Rev. J. B. S. Carwithen, Bampton lecturer at Oxford in 1809, and author of the History of the Church of England, was born here in April, 1781.

MANBY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Louth; containing 211 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation about 1500 acres, of which the surface is rather level, and the soil strong. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 10. 2.; net income, £482; patron, Rev. John Waite: the tithes were commuted for 346 acres of land and a money payment in 1815. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MANBY, a hamlet, in the parish of BROUGHTON, union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, E. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Glandford-Brigg. Manby Hall is a neat mansion, situated in pleasant and well-laid-out grounds.

MANCETTER (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of ATHERSTONE, Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK; containing, with the town of Atherstone, and the hamlets of Hartshill and Oldbury, 5182 inhabitants, of whom 332 are in the township of Mancetter. The parish consists of 1493 acres: the river Anker and the Coventry canal run through it, and the roads from Atherstone to Hinckley and Nuneaton branch off at this place. Here are very extensive stone-quarries, and several productive mines of manganese, of superior quality. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 4.; net income, £229; patron and incumbent, Rev. Benjamin Richings; impropiator, J. M. B. Pigott, Esq., M.D. The church occupies an eminence supposed to have been the site of a camp, being deeply intrenched; it is a spacious and ancient structure of very picturesque appearance, and has an eastern window of stained glass. There is a chapel of ease at Atherstone. Near the church was the Roman station styled by Antoninus Manduessedum, of an oblong form, with large ramparts inclosing an area of about seven acres, intersected by the Roman Watling-street; the north-western side, named Castle banks, is in Warwickshire, and the south-eastern, called Oldfield banks, in Leicestershire. Oval flint axes, or celts, Roman bricks, coins of gold, silver, and brass, with various other relics of antiquity, have been found. In the village of Mancetter is an hospital, endowed with a bequest of £2000 from James Gramer, in 1724, for eight poor men. During the persecutions in the reign of Mary, Robert Glover and Mary Lewes, of this place, suffered martyrdom; the former was burnt at Coventry, and the latter at Lichfield. Tablets to their memory are erected in the church.

Seal and Arms.

MANCHESTER (Blessed Virgin, or St. Mary), a borough and parish, in the hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 353,390 inhabitants, of whom, including Salford (which is the head of a union), 217,056 are in the town, 36 miles (E. by N.) from Liverpool (but only 31 by the railway), 54 (S. E. by S.) from Lancaster, and 186 (N. W. by N.) from London. The origin of this town, which is remarkable for the extent of its trade and the importance of its manufactures, may be traced to a period of remote antiquity. In the time of the Druids it was distinguished as one of the chief stations of their priests, and celebrated for the privilege of sanctuary attached to its altar, which in the British language was styled Meyne, signifying a stone. Prior to the Christian era it was one of the principal seats of the Brigantes, who had a castle, or stronghold, called Mancenion, or the place of tents, near the confluence of the rivers Medlock and Irwell, the site of which, still designated the "Castle Field," was by the ROMANS, on their conquest of this part of the island under Agricola, about the year 79, selected as the station of the Cohors Prima Frisiorum, and with reference to its original British name, called by them Mancunium; hence its Saxon name Manceastre, from which its modern appellation is obviously derived. This station was for nearly four centuries occupied by the Romans, and amply provided with every thing requisite for the accommodation and subsistence of the garrison established in it, having also a water-mill on the Medlock, at some distance below the town, the site of which still retains the name of Knott Mill. The station included a quadrangular area 500 feet in length and 400 in width, the interior not exactly level, but rising from the centre towards the sides, on which a rampart of earth sloping inwards was raised from the ground surrounding the inclosure, which is consequently lower than the site of the castrum. On the summit of this rampart a wall was originally built, which extended round the inclosure, on one side of which was the castle or fort; but very little of the foundation of the wall is at present discernible, the few remaining portions being under ground, and the greater part of the site covered with modern buildings. From this station, as from a common centre, Roman roads branched off to Cambodunum, Eboracum, Condate, Rigodunum, Veratinum, and Rerigonium. In the vicinity of the aboriginal settlement, which has obtained the name of Aldport, Roman urns and other vessels, stones inscribed to centurions of the cohort, votive altars, coins, fibulæ, and lachrymatories, have been found at various times; and without the vallum, foundations of Roman buildings, and other vestiges of antiquity, have been frequently discovered.

After the departure of the Romans, the fort of Mancunium was taken from the Britons, about the year 488, by a party of the Saxons, who had forcibly established themselves in this part of the kingdom: they placed a garrison in it, which, however, surrendered to the British, who retained possession whilst Arthur Pendragon was prosecuting his victories over that people. In 620, it was captured by Edwin, King of Northumbria, who annexed it to his dominions; and soon afterwards a colony of Angles settled here. In 627, the inhabitants were converted to Christianity by the preaching of Paulinus, a missionary employed by Gregory I., and a Christian church was built, and dedicated to St. Michael. Manchester having been taken by the Danes, was, about 920, wrested from their possession by Edward the Elder, who repaired and fortified the castle, and rebuilt the town, which had been almost destroyed in the assaults of the invaders, placing in it a strong garrison of his own soldiers, on account of its being a frontier town between the kingdoms of Mercia and Northumbria. It was raised to the distinction of a burgh, with extensive privileges, and for some time continued highly prosperous; but being exposed to repeated attacks, and having suffered so much injury in the wars between the Northumbrians and the Danes, notwithstanding its enlargement by Edward, it appears, at the time of the Conquest, to have been in every respect inferior to Salford, a Saxon settlement on the opposite bank of the Irwell, which, being a royal demesne, had risen into importance, and imparted its name to the hundred. In the Norman survey we find that Manchester contained two churches, but it is not otherwise mentioned as a place of any note. Soon after the Conquest, it came into the possession of Albert de Gresley, whose descendant, Robert, the fourth lord of Manchester, obtained for it, in the reign of Henry III., the grant of a fair on the eve and festival of St. Matthew. In the reign of Edward I., the barons, in order to raise a great number of men to serve in the army destined for the invasion of Scotland, conferred several privileges on their vassals; and Thomas de Gresley, sixth baron of Manchester, upon that occasion, granted to the inhabitants those rights and immunities which have been emphatically called the Magna Charta of Manchester. This charter, which was granted on the 14th of May, in the year 1301, among other privileges, confers the right of choosing a borough reeve; of disposing of their lands of inheritance according to pleasure, reserving only to the heir, in such cases, the prior right of purchase; the power of arresting for debt within the borough the persons of knights, priests, or clerks, and various other privileges. The baron of Manchester was thrice summoned to parliament by writ in the reign of this monarch, by whom he was made Knight of the Bath, and was one of the barons who, in the reign of Edward II., conspired against Piers Gavestone. About seventy years before this, Salford was made a free borough, by charter from Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester.

In 1352, the manufacture of "Manchester cottons," a kind of woollen-cloth made from the fleece in an unprepared state, was introduced, and obtained a high degree of celebrity; and in the course of this reign numerous Flemish artisans, who had been invited into England by Edward III., settled in the town, where, finding every requisite advantage, they brought the woollen manufacture to a considerable degree of perfection, and laid the foundation of its staple trade, which, though interrupted by the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, and subsequently, in the reign of Edward VI., by a dreadful malady called the sweating sickness, had, in the reign of Elizabeth, become of such importance, that one of the queen's aulnagers (officers appointed to examine, and affix the seal to, manufactured cloth) was stationed here in 1565. During the progress of the Reformation, an ecclesiastical commission for the diocese of Chester was established at Manchester, and numbers of popish recusants, from various parts of Lancashire, were imprisoned in the New Fleet, which appears to have been erected about that time, and probably for that purpose. The commissioners were, Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon; Edwin Sandys, Archbishop of York; the Earl of Derby; and Dr. Chadderton, Bishop of Chester, who then resided in the episcopal palace at Manchester, but, in consequence of frequent disputes between his servants and the inhabitants, removed to Chester. The commissioners, though principally engaged in promoting the reformed religion, and in the detection and punishment of popish recusants, published, during their sittings at Manchester, a declaration against pipers and minstrels attending bear and bull baitings, and against the "superstitious ringing of bells, wakes, festivals, and other amusements;" to counteract the influence of which prohibition, James I. published his celebrated Book of Sports. Upon the threatened invasion by Philip of Spain, Manchester supplied 144 men armed with bills and pikes, 38 archers, and 38 arquebusiers, to assist in repelling the "Invincible Armada."

During the Parliamentary war Manchester was the scene of much obstinate contention. The commissioners of array visited it, to demand ammunition for the use of the king; but the town having been previously secured for the parliament, by Ralph Asheton, one of the representatives of the county, the inhabitants refused to surrender; and Lord Strange, with a considerable force, attempting to enter it, they took up arms, and, being joined by numbers from the adjacent country, a skirmish took place, in which several men on both sides were killed. This event, which was regarded by the house of commons as the commencement of the war, was, by the Speaker, announced as "terrible news from the north." The inhabitants, apprehending a more serious attack, fortified the town; and the king, having set up his standard at Nottingham, sent Lord Strange with 4000 infantry, seven pieces of cannon, and some cavalry, to reduce it. After an obstinate conflict for several days, during which it was defended by Captain Bradshaw, aided by Lieutenant-Colonel Rosworm, an able German engineer, Lord Strange, being summoned, on the death of the Earl of Derby, to join the king, whose head-quarters were then at Shrewsbury, withdrew his forces, and raised the siege. To guard against future assaults, the fortifications, which had been hastily thrown up, were completed and enlarged; and, in 1643, Sir Thomas Fairfax entered the town, which now became the head-quarters of the parliamentary army stationed in Lancashire. It was again summoned by the Earl of Newcastle, at the head of 10,000 or 12,000 men, but, being unsuccessful, the earl took the route to Hull, in pursuit of Fairfax. During the protectorate of Cromwell, Manchester, in obedience to the Protector's writ to the high sheriff of Lancaster, made two successive returns of a member to serve in parliament, in common with other towns, which did not subsequently exercise the elective franchise. In 1652 the walls were thrown down, the fortifications demolished, and the gates carried away and sold; a measure that appears to have originated in its growing commercial importance, and its increase in wealth and population. The restoration of Charles II. was celebrated in the town with the most splendid pomp and ceremony; the utmost festivity and rejoicings took place, and the public conduits were made to flow with wine in copious streams. In 1715, a tumultuous assembly, headed by one Syddall, a barber, demolished the Independent chapel, in Acres Fields, at that time the only dissenting place of worship in the town, and proceeded to commit other depredation; but the insurrection was quelled, and Syddall, with several of his accomplices, was committed to Lancaster gaol. On his liberation, he joined the rebels in Preston, and being again taken prisoner, he was sent to this town and executed.

In 1745, Prince Charles Edward, who the year before had visited Manchester, where he was hospitably entertained for several weeks at Ancoat's Hall, the mansion of Sir Edward Moseley, Bart., entered the county of Lancaster, at the head of an army of 6000 men, and advanced to this town, with a view to recruit his forces, and to raise supplies of men, arms, and money. On November 28th, the young Pretender took up his quarters in the house of Mr. Dickenson, in Market-street, from that circumstance called the palace, and issued a proclamation, requiring all persons who had any duties to pay, or any of the public money in their hands, to pay the same to his secretary at the palace. The sum of £3000 was levied in money; from 200 to 300 men raised for the service; and many horses were put under requisition for mounting the cavalry and drawing the baggage. On December 1st, the rebel army quitted Manchester, marching southward to Derby, which they reached on the 4th; but, to avoid the danger of being inclosed by the armies of Marshal Wade and the Duke of Cumberland, retreated northward to Manchester, where they arrived on the 8th, and, continuing their retreat to the north, reached Carlisle on the 10th. In 1759, an act of parliament was passed for discharging the inhabitants from their obligation to grind corn and other grain at the school mill on the river Irk, a custom which had prevailed from a remote period, and had frequently excited a strong spirit of popular discontent. By this act the inhabitants were released from every obligation, except that of grinding malt, which is still retained; and though the sum paid to the feoffees of the mill is very moderate, yet the compulsory clause of grinding malt has induced almost all the public brewers to establish themselves in townships which, though adjoining to, and within the immediate vicinity of, the town, are not subject to that obligation. Christian, King of Denmark, on his tour through England, in 1768, took up his abode in the town, and lodged, with his suite, at the Bull inn. In 1773, the Russian princess, Czartoriski, arrived here from Birmingham, to inspect the aqueducts and excavations at Worsley, and during her stay visited the principal factories. In 1805, the Archdukes John and Lewis of Austria, accompanied by a retinue of scientific men, spent some time here; and in 1817, the Grand Duke Nicholas, now Emperor of Russia, honoured the town with a visit.

The town is situated on the banks of the river Irwell, which here receives the tributary streams of the Irk and the Medlock, and on the north-west bank of which is the borough of Salford, connected, by means of five bridges, with Manchester, of which it forms an integral part. Of these bridges, the most ancient, which had existed from time immemorial, was rebuilt in the reign of Edward III.; the Strangeways iron bridge was erected in 1817; and a sixth bridge, in connexion with the Manchester and Liverpool railway, has been built across the same river. Over the Medlock are nine bridges, in various parts of the town, of which that leading from Oxford-street crosses the stream in an oblique direction. There are also seven bridges over the Irk, of which six are very low, and subject to be flooded at high water; the seventh is a lofty structure of three arches, and a great ornament, connecting a new line of road from the extremity of Miller-street, with what was anciently Strangeways Park, and forming an entrance into the town, which avoids the steep ascent of the Red Bank, and the dangerous turn in the old road from Scotland-bridge. Exclusively of these, there are several smaller bridges over the Shooter's brook, and not less than thirty across the numerous branches of the canals which intersect the town. The streets are well paved, and lighted with gas, and were formerly under the direction of 240 commissioners, appointed by an act passed in the 9th of George IV., for cleansing, paving, lighting, watching, and regulating the town; but in 1843 an act was obtained, transferring the powers and property vested in these commissioners to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses. The inhabitants are supplied with water by the Manchester and Salford Company, established by an act of parliament, in 1809; the water is conveyed by pipes from reservoirs at Beswick and Gorton, of which the latter covers more than fifty acres of ground, excavated in 1825. Salford was formerly included in the same jurisdiction as Manchester, with respect to its police; but by an act procured in the 9th of George IV., they were separated, and Salford is now governed by a distinct code of regulations, under an act of the 11th of George IV., and in the same session the local act for Manchester was amended. The Environs, in some parts, particularly in Broughton, abound with scenery pleasingly diversified; and in the neighbourhood are many handsome ranges of building, and numerous elegant villas. Among these are, Ardwick Green, in the centre of which is a fine sheet of water, surrounded with respectable residences; and Salford-crescent, occupying an elevated site, and commanding a beautiful view of the windings of the Irwell, with the fertile valleys on the opposite bank, and sheltered by rising hills. Close to the Irwell are several successive tiers of houses, which rise from the margin of the river; and on the Irk is Gibraltar, an irregular cluster of rural and picturesque cottages. The older part of the town contains several ancient houses (which, however, are fast disappearing), interspersed with modern dwellings; and the streets in this quarter, with the exception of such as have been improved under various acts of parliament, are inconveniently narrow. The more modern parts contain many spacious streets, in which are respectable houses; but the general plan, notwithstanding, seems to have been more adapted to the accommodation of its extended trade than to the display of elegance and symmetry in its general appearance. Cotton-mills, factories, and warehouses of immense extent, have been erected in those portions of the town previously occupied by the most pleasant dwelling-houses, and every other part of it is crowded with numerous cottages of families employed in the different works.

The Literary and Philosophical Society was founded in 1781; gold and silver medals are awarded for the best dissertations on particular subjects, and the society has published seven volumes of Transactions, in the English, French, and German languages, which are much circulated on the continent. The Philological Society was instituted in 1803. The Agricultural Society, consisting of members residing within thirty miles, was established in 1767, and is one of the earliest institutions of that kind in England. The New Circulating Library, in St. Anne's-street, containing 4000 volumes, was founded in 1792. A part of Cheetham's Hospital is appropriated as a library, to which, under certain regulations, the public enjoy free admission: Mr. Cheetham bequeathed £1000, to be vested in land, which fund, by the management of trustees, has considerably accumulated, and the library now contains more than 16,000 volumes, some valuable manuscripts, a collection of prints, and several natural and artificial curiosities. The Portico, an elegant edifice of Runcorn stone, of the Ionic order, erected by subscription in 1806, at an expense of £7000, contains a library, committee, news, and reading rooms, and other offices. A library established in Spear-street, in 1802, is now held in Fountain-street, and contains a good collection of theological and other works. The Law Library was instituted by the members of that profession, in 1820. The Society for Promoting the Study of Natural History was projected in 1821, and rapidly attained its present state of maturity and importance: the buildings comprise a museum, lately erected in Peter-street, consisting of a large brick edifice with a handsome stone portico, containing an extensive and valuable collection; and attached to the museum are, a library of works on natural history, a council-room, a curatory, and apartments for the librarian and keeper. The Royal Institution, embracing a variety of objects connected with the pursuits of literature and science, and the cultivation of the fine arts, originated with a few public-spirited individuals in 1823, and was soon honoured with public, and finally with royal, patronage. The building, which was erected from a design by Mr. Barry, of London, and is of a durable and richly-coloured stone, from the vicinity of Colne, forms a splendid addition to the architectural ornaments of the town, and is in the Grecian style. The principal elevation, towards Mosley-street, has a noble portico of six lofty columns of the Ionic order, supporting a rich entablature and pediment in the centre, on each side of which are columns and pilasters connecting it with the wings; and the whole cost of the pile was estimated at about £50,000. The Athenæum, an institution for the benefit of young men in the middle rank of life, is a very handsome building of stone, erected close to the Royal Institution, from a design by Barry; it comprises a theatre for lectures, reading-room, &c., with a library of 4000 volumes.

The Floral and Horticultural Society was instituted in 1823, and the Botanical and Horticultural Institution in 1828. The garden for the latter, about two miles from the Exchange, on the new Stretford road, comprising about sixteen acres of ground, contains a great variety of green-house, herbaceous, Alpine, American, rock, and medicinal plants; the entrance is a fine structure, in the Grecian style and Ionic order, and cost about £2000. The Mechanics' Institute was established in 1824, and a building was erected in 1827, at an expense of £7000. The Statistical Society of Manchester held its first meeting on the 2nd of September, 1833, and is the first institution of the kind established in England. The Theatre Royal was erected in 1806, at an expense of £15,000. The Amphitheatre, or, as it is now called, the Queen's theatre, was built in 1753, for a principal theatre, but being found too small, was rebuilt by act of parliament in 1775, and having been burnt down in 1789, was again rebuilt and opened in 1790. The gentlemen's private Subscription Concerts were established in 1777, when a room, adapted to the accommodation of 800 auditors, was built in Fountain-street, which being afterwards found too small, a new concert room was erected in 1829, for the reception of 1200 subscribers, in Lower Mosley-street, at an expense of £7000; the entrance is through a handsome lofty portico of six columns of the Corinthian order, supporting a rich entablature and pediment. The gentlemen's Glee Club was founded in 1830, and is well known both for the talent of its members, and its prize glee compositions. The Choral Society, established in 1833, consists of about 200 members, and holds its meetings in a large room in the Royal Institution. The Geological Society was instituted in 1838, and now consists of upwards of 220 members. The Assembly-rooms, in Mosley-street, were erected in 1792, and form a capacious suite of rooms, superbly decorated. The first of a series of triennial Musical festivals was attempted here, with complete success, in 1828; oratorios were performed in the collegiate church, and miscellaneous concerts and dress balls were given in the theatre and assembly-rooms; the performances combined the first-rate musical talents in the country, and after paying all expenses, a surplus of more than £5000 was distributed among the different charitable institutions. The Races, which were established in 1730, commence on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week, and continue to the end of the week; the course is on Kersal moor, and is about a mile in circuit; a grand stand and numerous booths have been erected on various parts of it, for the accommodation of the spectators. Heaton Park races are the more fashionable, and are held in the park of the Earl of Wilton, a few miles from Manchester; the riders are always noblemen and gentlemen. A Riding School and Gymnasium have been established, for which a building was erected in 1829, near the concert-rooms, at the lower end of Mosley-street. The Barracks for cavalry, in the township of Hulme, are a uniform and handsome range, affording accommodation for a squadron of horse; and those for infantry, situated in the Regent's road, Salford, are very extensive, and form a compact range, calculated for the reception of 1000 men.

The improvement in the various branches of the TRADE AND MANUFACTURES of Manchester has been uniformly progressive, and justly entitles it to be considered one of the most extensive and prosperous towns in the kingdom. Its staple trade is the cotton manufacture, which, in all its different ramifications, is carried on to an extent almost incredible. The town had obtained considerable eminence for its manufacture of woollen goods, called "Manchester cottons," introduced, as before mentioned, by the Flemings, in the reign of Edward III.; and in that of Charles I. the linen and cotton trade had made some progress. In the Treasure of Traffic, published by Lewis Roberts, in 1641, Manchester is said to have purchased linen-yarn from Ireland, and cotton-wool from London, the goods woven from which were sent to those places for sale. About the year 1740, the manufacturers residing here employed agents in various parts of the country to procure a supply of raw cotton, which was manufactured, by the spindle and the distaff, in the cottages of the workmen, chiefly into fustians, thicksets, dimities, and jeans, to which were added cotton thicksets, goods figured in the loom, and subsequently cotton velvets, velveteens, and strong fancy cords. About the year 1760, these goods, which had till then been made only for home consumption, found a market on the continents of Europe and America; and as the quantity of weft produced in the whole of Lancashire, by about 50,000 spindles worked by hand, was insufficient to keep the weavers in Manchester constantly employed, and consequently to afford a supply adequate to the increasing demand, recourse was had to the aid of machinery, and Mr. John Kay invented the instrument called the pucking peg, by the assistance of which the weaver was not only enabled to produce twice the quantity of work, but also to weave cloths of any width. The facility thus given to the weaving department caused a corresponding increase in the demand for yarn, and Mr. Thomas Highs, in conjunction with Mr. Kay, invented the spinning jenny, the powers of which were greatly augmented by the improvements of Mr. Hargreaves, whose success, exciting the apprehensions of the hand-workmen, led to the destruction of his machinery, and his retreat to Nottingham, where he died in indigence. Mr. Highs continued to make the spinning-jennies for sale, and also invented the water-frame, or throstle, for spinning twist by means of rollers; and these machines were subsequently improved under Sir Richard Arkwright, whose exclusive patent right was annulled by a decision of the court of king's bench, in 1785, when the privilege of using such machinery was thrown open to the public. The late Sir Robert Peel, Bart., assisted by Mr. Hargreaves, first brought the cylindrical carding-engines into use, and effected many improvements in the application of machinery to the cotton manufacture, by the adoption of which, aided by the powers of the steam-engine, the quantity of goods of all descriptions made in the town has been prodigiously increased.

Every process of that manufacture is carried on to a very considerable extent, but the branch of it for which Manchester is most distinguished is the spinning, in which department alone there are in the town and vicinity upwards of one hundred factories. The power-loom is a recent invention, originating with the Rev. Mr. Cartwright, of Holland House, in the county of Kent, who, after repeated attempts, ultimately succeeded in establishing a factory upon that principle at Doncaster, and was indemnified by parliament for the losses he had sustained in the course of his experiments. Mr. Grimshaw, of Manchester, adopting Mr. Cartwright's plan, established a factory in which were 500 power-loom, but the building having been destroyed by fire, the design was for a time abandoned. The difficulties which had impeded the general adoption of this invention were finally removed by the aid of Mr. Johnson's machine for dressing the warps, and, in 1806, the use of the power-loom was again introduced, with complete success. The factories, in several of which the whole process of the manufacture, from the introduction of the raw material to its completion, is carried on, are immense ranges of building, from six to eight stories in height; some employing from 1800 to 2000 persons each, and the whole furnishing occupation to upwards of 30,000 persons. The making of muslin was first attempted about the year 1780, at which time the machine called the mule was introduced into the spinning factories, and to such a degree of perfection has this branch of manufacture been brought, that the muslins of Manchester are little inferior to those of India. The silk manufacture has, within the last few years, been revived, under very favourable circumstances, and is rapidly improving; the number of mills already established is considerable, and the silks manufactured are as remarkable for the beauty of their texture as those of Spitalfields, or of France. The principal articles at present made are, velvets, fustians, jeans, ticking, checks, gingham, nankeens, diaper, quilting, calico, muslins, muslinets, cambric handkerchiefs, small wares, silks, and, in fact, every variety of cotton and silk goods. There are also extensive bleaching-grounds, and works for printing and dyeing, and for every other department of the manufactures; and, in addition to what may be considered the staple manufactures of the town, are numerous others dependent on them, such as that of machinery of all kinds, for which there are large forges, foundries, &c. Here are likewise several laboratories for the making of oil of vitriol, and other chymical productions used in the different processes of the trade, for bleaching, dyeing, &c. In the vicinity are mills for the manufacture of paper of all descriptions, from the coarsest kind, for packages, to the finest kinds of writing and printing paper; all of which have been brought to a high degree of perfection, and are manufactured on a very large scale. There are extensive manufactories for hats, which have flourished for many years; and various other branches of manufacture, which have all improved with the increasing trade of the town, afford employment to a great portion of the inhabitants. Engraving, as connected with the printing of calico, muslin, and cotton goods, is extensively carried on; and there are saw-mills on a very extended scale. For the purchase of the diversified productions of the town, of which large quantities are exported, foreign merchants have either agents or one of their partners resident here, to conduct their commercial transactions, and to purchase, not only Manchester goods, but also the produce of all the adjoining manufacturing districts, which are accumulated here as in a central dépôt. A Chamber of Commerce was established in 1820, by which the trading interests of its members, and those of Manchester generally, have been greatly promoted.

The Exchange and Commercial Buildings were erected from a design by Mr. Harrison, in 1806, at an expense of £20,000, advanced on shares of £50 each, by 400 proprietary members, who subsequently added £30 each for the purchase of the site. It is a spacious, handsome, and well-arranged edifice of Runcorn stone, in the Grecian style, and the north front, which faces the market-house, is semicircular, and ornamented with lofty fluted columns of the Doric order. The newsroom, which occupies the basement story of this part of the building, is elegantly provided with every accommodation, and is lighted by a semicircular dome and handsome windows of plate glass: at the distance of fifteen feet from the walls is a circular range of pillars of the Ionic order, supporting the ceiling; and over the central fire-place is a full-length portrait of Thomas Stanley, Esq., for many years member for the county, finely painted by the late Sir Thomas Lawrence. There are 2000 subscribers belonging to the establishment. Above the newsroom, and resting on the pillars that support the ceiling, is a circular range of building, two stories high, of which the lower contains the Exchange library, belonging to a proprietary of 400 members, and comprising more than 15,000 volumes. A handsome geometrical staircase leads from the hall to the upper part of the buildings, in which is an elegant dining-room, with a rich mantelpiece of Abyssinian marble at each end, and an orchestra on the north side; the room was opened in celebration of the anniversary of the birthday of George III., in 1809. There are also several ante-rooms, and a variety of offices, connected with the general purposes of the institution.

The vast trade and commercial importance of the town have been in a great degree promoted by its proximity to the port of Liverpool, whence its manufactures are exported to every quarter of the globe, and with which it has a facility of WATER COMMUNICATION by means of the Mersey and Irwell navigation, constructed in 1720, under an act of parliament amended in 1794, when the proprietors were incorporated; and by the celebrated Bridgewater canal, both of which communicate with the river Mersey, at Runcorn. The Manchester, Bolton, and Bury canal, constructed by act of parliament in 1791, crossing the Irwell at Clifton, and again at Little Lever, passes for 15 miles through a district abounding with coal and mineral produce, and unites with the Leeds and Liverpool canal near Blackburn, by a branch formed in 1793. The Ashton-under-Line canal, constructed in 1792, is carried, by a lofty archway, in an oblique direction over Store-street; and by another aqueduct, of equal strength and beauty of design, it crosses the river Medlock, branching off to Stockport, and at Fairfield, by another branch, communicates with Oldham. The Rochdale canal, constructed in 1794, forms a communication from the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Manchester to the Calder navigation at Sowerby-bridge, beyond which is a cut from Salter-Hebble to Halifax. In 1836 an act was passed for making a canal to connect the Rochdale canal and the river Irwell. By means of the Grand Trunk canal, a line of communication has been established with London, Bristol, and other principal towns. A joint-stock company, for the conveyance of goods by water, called the New Quay Company, was originally established in 1822, with a capital of £30,000, and has a considerable number of vessels plying between Manchester and Liverpool.

The facilities afforded by lines of RAILWAYS are also of great importance, and tend highly to augment the trade of the town, and to increase the celerity with which business is transacted. In 1826, an act was obtained for the construction of a railway between Manchester and Liverpool, adapted to the use of carriages drawn by locomotive engines impelled by steam, for the conveyance of merchandise and passengers. This stupendous undertaking was completed in 1830, and the expenses of constructing the railway and the different works since erected, have been estimated at upwards of £1,370,000, subscribed in shares of £100 each by a company of proprietors. The principal station is in Water-street, and the grand dépôt, which is nearly contiguous, is on the Liverpool road; the whole corresponding in appearance to the importance of the undertaking. The line of road is carried, by a series of 22 arches, commencing at the company's warehouses, in the Liverpool road, across the roofs of the houses in Water-street, and over the river Irwell by a handsome stone bridge of two arches, each 65 feet in span, and 30 feet high from the surface of the water to the central summit. An act was passed in 1836, for making a railway from Manchester to Leeds, for which purpose a company were empowered to raise a capital of £2,599,000; the line, 50 miles in length, extends to Normanton, in Yorkshire, where it joins the North-Midland railway; the total expenditure up to July 1840, when the line was opened to the public, was £2,113,980. The principal station and dépôt, between Lee and St. George's street, are elevated on a viaduct approached from the booking-office below, by a flight of steps, and contain waiting-rooms for passengers, carriage-sheds, a polygonal engine-house, workshops; and all other requisites. The Manchester and Bolton railway was constructed by a company empowered to raise a capital of £454,000, and a loan of £196,000. The line originally projected was to be laid down in the bed of the Bolton and Bury canal, which was purchased by the company for £100,000; but this line was abandoned. The present one commences at the principal station at Salford, a handsome building in New Bailey-street, containing the requisite offices, and is thence conveyed by a viaduct of several arches, and passes under the Oldfield road at a distance of 320 yards from the line of the Liverpool railway, after which it proceeds in a direction nearly parallel with the canal, to Bolton, a distance of 10 miles; it was opened in May, 1838. The Manchester and Birmingham railway, constructed to join the Grand Junction and the Chester and Crewe railways, at Crewe, was undertaken by a company empowered to raise a capital of £2,100,000, and a loan of £700,000; the line, which is 30 miles in length, commences at the principal station in Store-street, a building comprising all the necessary arrangements. A highly important undertaking was completed in the spring of 1844, namely, the junction of the Leeds railway with the Liverpool line, at Hunt's Bank, Manchester, thus connecting the eastern and western seas, by means of continuous railway communication between Hull and Liverpool; the work has been carried out with the utmost skill, and in an exceedingly short space of time.

The Market-days are Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, of which the first is principally for the sale of merchandise, brought in great quantities in carts and waggons from the different factories. The markets are plentifully supplied with corn and provisions of all kinds. The corn market is held in a building in Hanging-ditch, which was opened as a corn-exchange in 1820; the hay market is in Bridgewater-street, and the cattle market in the new Smithfield, at Shude-hill. The markets for butchers' meat are held in Brown-street, Bridge-street, and the London-road, at the back of which is the leather hall, and in other parts of the town. The fish market is in a suitable building erected on the site of what was formerly called the Old Shambles, at the expense of Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart., near Smithy Door, in 1828; the meal, flour, and cheese market is in a building on Shude-hill; the fruit, or apple, market is held in Fennel-street, and the upper end of Long Millgate; the vegetable market is held in St. Mary's gate, and in the upper end of Smithy Door, the middle and lower end of which is the market, for butter, poultry, and eggs. Salford, which had been previously supplied from Manchester, has also a separate market for which accommodation has been provided under the town-hall, of which the first stone was laid by Lord Bexley, in 1825. The principal Fairs are on Easter Monday and Tuesday for toys; and October 1st and 2nd, for horses, cattle, and pigs. At Salford, a fair, commencing on Whit-Monday, is much frequented by the Yorkshire clothiers, blanket-manufacturers, button-makers, and japanners. The Cloth-hall, which is a spacious and convenient building, is occupied by numerous tenants during this fair, which lasts for 21 days; and there is another fair, beginning on November 17th, and continuing for the same space of time; the first day of each is for the sale of cattle.

By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, Manchester was constituted a parliamentary borough, with power to return two representatives: the borough comprises 6006 acres; the number of voters is 10,423, and the mayor is returning officer. Under the same act also, Salford was invested with the franchise, with the privilege of returning one member: the limits of the borough comprise 5083 acres, and the number of electors is 2354. Manchester received a charter of incorporation on the 23rd of October, 1838, and is divided into 15 wards, which include the townships of Manchester, Chorlton-upon-Medlock, Hulme, Ardwick, Berwick, and Cheetham. The municipal body consists of a mayor, 16 aldermen, and 48 councillors; the number of magistrates is 34. Her Majesty granted a separate court of quarter-sessions for the borough, and appointed a recorder; and a barrister, with a salary of £1000 per annum, sits daily as a magistrate. There is a large and effective police force under the controul of a chief commissioner; and a borough-reeve and two principal constables are chosen from among the most respectable of the inhabitants, by a jury impanelled by the stewards of the manor, at the latter of the courts leet, which are held after Easter and Michaelmas. A court of requests for the parish is held under an act passed in the 48th of George III., every alternate Wednesday, for the recovery of debts under £5. The lord of the manor holds a court baron every third Wednesday; a court for the hundred of Salford occurs every third Thursday, for debts under 40s.; and the sheriff's county court takes place here monthly, by adjournment from Preston, for the trial of pleas, and the recovery of debts not exceeding £10, in actions in which the parties reside in the hundred of Salford. The quarter-sessions are held at Salford by adjournment, at which the business for the whole of that hundred is transacted, under the superintendence of a chairman, who has a salary of £800 per annum. The Town-hall is a noble and elegant edifice, erected under the superintendence and from a design of Mr. Francis Goodwin, in the Grecian style, at an expense of £40,000, after the model of the Temple of Erectheus, at Athens, with a beautiful tower and dome in the centre, resembling the tower of Andronicus, called the "Temple of the Winds." The principal entrance to the market-place is from the centre of the town-hall, through a Doric colonnade; there are separate markets for meat, vegetables, fish, and poultry, chiefly covered over, and well ventilated: this building was erected under the superintendence of Messrs. Lane and Goodwin, at an expense of £10,000. The Chorlton-Row town-hall dispensary, and constable's dwelling-house, erected under the superintendence of Mr. Richard Lane, at an expense of £4500, are connected in one building, the front of which is handsome and imposing; one of the wings is appropriated as a residence for the constable, and the other as a dispensary, which was established and is supported by subscription. The New Bailey, or house of correction for the hundred of Salford, adjoining which is the governor's residence, was erected in 1790, upon the radiating principle, and comprises 24 wards, the same number of day-rooms and airing-yards, and 150 workshops.

The parish comprises the chapelries of Ardwick, Blackley, Cheetham, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Denton, Didsbury, Gorton, Newton, and Stretford; and the townships of Beswick, Bradford, Broughton, Burnage, Chorlton-on-Medlock, Crumpsall, Droylsden, Failsworth, Harpurhey, Heaton-Norris, Haughton, Hulme, Levenshulme, Manchester, Moss-Side, Moston, Openshaw, Reddish, Rushulme, Salford, and Withington. Under the ECCLESIASTICAL arrangements provided by the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 77, Manchester is to be one of the two new sees erected in the province of York; the diocese will consist of the whole county of Lancaster, except the deanery of Furness and Cartmel, and the collegiate church will become the cathedral. The old collegiate church, which, till after the Reformation, afforded accommodation for all the inhabitants of Manchester and Salford, was founded, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, by Thomas, Lord de la Warre, in the 9th of Henry V., who endowed it for a warden and eight fellows; the establishment, the revenue of which was £226. 12. 5., was dissolved in the reign of Edward VI., and re-established in that of Elizabeth under the designation of the Warden and Fellows of Christ's College. The dilapidation of the church, and the misappropriation of the collegiate funds, under the wardenship of Richard Murray, induced the inhabitants to petition the throne for a revival of the former charter, in 1635, and Charles I. conferred upon them a new charter of foundation, with rules for the government of the college, drawn up by Archbishop Laud. Under this grant, the management was vested in a warden, appointed by the Crown, who must at least be a bachelor in divinity, or of canon and civil laws; and in four fellows, who must be masters of arts, or bachelors of laws: they are a body corporate, with a common seal, and are denominated, by act of parliament passed in 1840, the "Dean and Canons of Christ's College." The charter provides for the appointment of a sub-warden, treasurer, collector, registrar, a master of the choir, organist, four singing men (either clerks or laymen), and four boys skilled in music; and ordains that there shall be continually in the college two chaplains, or vicars, of the degree of bachelors of arts, and two clerks, to administer the sacraments, visit the sick, and perform other religious offices. During the usurpation of Cromwell, the Independents established their own form of worship in the college, in 1649; the establishment was soon afterwards dissolved by an act of parliament for the sale of dean and chapter lands, and, during the interregnum, the last warden officiated as parochial minister, for an annual stipend. After the Restoration, the institution was revived, subject to the statutes of Charles I., and the warden reinstated in his office. The revenue is £4025, and is divided into six parts, of which two are paid to the dean, and one to each of the canons. The Church is a spacious and elaborately ornamented structure, in the later English style, with a handsome square embattled tower, strengthened with buttresses, and crowned by pinnacles; the roof of the nave, which rises to a considerable height above the aisles, is concealed by a rich pierced parapet decorated with pinnacles; the windows are filled with elegant tracery, and the exterior, which is relieved by the projection of some beautiful chapels, has a truly magnificent appearance. The view of the interior is also strikingly impressive; the lofty nave is lighted by a noble range of clerestory windows of fine proportion, and the choir is splendidly enriched with tabernacle-work of delicate execution; the roof is groined and ornamented with grotesque figures of angels playing on musical instruments, shields, and other devices, richly carved. Portions of the original stained glass are still preserved in several of the windows; and the altar is decorated with a piece of tapestry representing the offerings of the early Christians, and the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira. In different parts of the church, and in several chapels, are many ancient and interesting monuments.

Trinity church, at Salford, was founded and endowed by Humphrey Booth, Esq., in 1635, but having fallen into decay, was rebuilt in 1752; it is a neat edifice, in the Grecian style, and of the Doric order, with a steeple, and contains some handsome monuments and mural tablets. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Sir R. G. Booth, Bart. St. Ann's church, on the south side of St. Ann's-square, founded in 1709, under the auspices of Lady Ann Bland, is a spacious structure, in the Grecian style, and of the Corinthian order, with a tower formerly surmounted by a spire, which has been taken down; the interior is a fine specimen of appropriate decoration. The living is a rectory not in charge; net income, £380; patron, Bishop of Chester. St. Mary's, between Dean's-gate and the river Irwell, erected by the Warden and Fellows of the College, by act of parliament, in 1756, is a handsome edifice of the Doric order, with a lofty tower and spire, 186 feet in height. The interior, though dark, from the massive proportions of the pillars supporting the galleries, is very elegant: the altar-piece is embellished with a well-executed painting of the Ascension, after Raphael, by Williams, and the window is enriched with stained glass, beneath which are the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul. The living is a rectory not in charge; net income, £166; patrons, the Dean and Canons. St. Paul's, a neat edifice of brick, was erected in 1765: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £293; patrons, the Dean and Canons. St. John's, in Byrom-street, was built by Edward Byrom, Esq., under the authority of an act of parliament, in 1769, and is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a tower: the interior is remarkably neat, and finely ornamented; some of the windows are embellished with beautiful stained glass, and in the vestry-room are several fine paintings. The living is a rectory not in charge; net income, £290; patron, Rev. W. Huntington, the incumbent. St. James', erected by the Rev. Cornelius Bayley, D.D., in 1787, is a spacious brick edifice, with a small stone spire: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £158; patron, Rev. J. Piccope. St. Michael's, a large edifice of brick, with a foundation for a steeple not yet built, was founded by the late Rev. Humphrey Owen, in 1789: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Heirs of the founder; net income, £72. St. Mark's was founded by the late Rev. E. Ethelston, and finished by his son in 1794: the living is a perpetual curacy, also in the gift of the Heirs of the Founder. St. Peter's, erected by subscription among the inhabitants, and consecrated in 1794, is a handsome edifice of Runcorn stone, in the Grecian style, with a stately tower and a noble portico of the Doric order; the interior is remarkable for the elegance and chasteness of its decoration, and the altar-piece is embellished with a fine painting of the Descent from the Cross, by Annibal Carracci. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £160; patrons, Trustees for building the church. St. Stephen's, Salford, a neat building of brick ornamented with stone, with a handsome tower, was founded in 1764, by the Rev. N. M. Cheek, to whose memory a neat mural tablet has been erected: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Heirs of the Founder; net income, £145. St. George's, a large building of brick, with a tower of the same material, was opened for divine service in 1798, and consecrated in 1818, when it was purchased by subscription: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £220; patron, Bishop of Chester. All Saints', in the centre of Grosvenor-square, a large structure, in the Grecian style, was built at the charge of the Rev. Charles Burton, LL.B., at an expense of £14,000, and consecrated in 1820; the interior is elegantly ornamented, and in the window over the altar is a fine painting of the Passion of our Saviour in the Garden of Gethsemane. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Founder.

St. Matthew's, in Castle-field, was erected in 1825, by grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £11,917, and is an elegant structure, in the later English style, with a tower and spire: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £271; patrons, the Dean and Canons. St. Philip's, in Salford, a handsome edifice, in the Grecian style, with a tower and semi-circular portico of the Ionic order, was also erected in 1825, by grant from the commissioners, at an expense of £13,423: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £410; patrons, the Dean and Canons. St. George's, Hulme, in the later English style, with a tower 135 feet high, was built in 1828, at an expense of £14,417, by grant from the same commissioners; the interior is elegantly arranged, and has a grand and imposing effect; the roof is elaborately groined and enriched with bosses and flowers, and the altar highly decorated. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £235; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons. A church in the later English style, with a tower, was erected in Travis-street, and dedicated to St. Andrew, in 1831, at an expense of £9988, under the act of the 58th of George III.: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £144; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons. All Souls' district church, in the early Norman style, with two turrets, was erected in Every-street, in 1839, by subscription, and by a grant of £500 from the Incorporated and Diocesan Societies; it contains 1397 sittings, of which 697 are free. An episcopal chapel at Ardwick, dedicated to St. Thomas, was consecrated in 1741, and enlarged in 1777, and is a neat building of brick: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Canons. St. Clement's, in Lever-street, erected in 1793; and St. Luke's chapel, in Bedford-street, built in 1804, are open for the performance of divine service, according to the liturgy of the Church of England, but are not consecrated buildings.

The foundation-stone of the first of ten additional churches, to be erected and endowed in Manchester and Salford, was laid in Regent-road, Salford, in August, 1841; the church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew, and the living is in the gift of Trustees. A second was erected on Pin-mill Brow, and dedicated to St. Silas, in Oct. 1841; it is a handsome structure, in the Norman style, and contains 1100 sittings, one-half of which are free. A third has been built at Stretford, for which the Incorporated Society granted £800. The foundation-stone of a fourth was laid in March, 1842, in Rodney-street, in the densely-populated district of Islington; the site was given by Mr. W. Faulkner, and the church is dedicated to St. Barnabas, and will accommodate 1100 persons. There are also places of worship for Baptists, Bible Christians, the Society of Friends, the Friends' Evangelical Society, Independents, Welsh Independents, Independent Methodists, Methodists of the New Connexion; Primitive, Tent, Wesleyan, and Welsh, Methodists; Presbyterians, Swedenborgians, Unitarians, and others, with four Roman Catholic chapels, and a synagogue. Of these, several are conspicuous for architectural beauty, among which may be noticed the Roman Catholic chapel of St. Augustine, an elegant edifice in the later English style, built in 1820, from a design by Mr. Palmer, at an expense of £10,000. The meeting-house for the Society of Friends is a spacious structure, erected under the direction of Mr. Lane, at a cost of £12,000, and equally conspicuous for the chaste simplicity of its character and the beauty of its Ionic portico, of which the design was taken from that of the Temple of Ceres on the Ilyssus. The Wesleyan meeting-house in Oxford-road has a handsome portico of the Doric order; and that in Irwell-street, Salford, has an Ionic portico and pediment. The Unitarian meeting-house, erected in 1839, is in the later English style. A general cemetery, for the interment of persons of all religious denominations, comprising four acres, surrounded by a wall, was opened in 1821, in the Rochdale-road, at an expense of £6000; the buildings are of the Grecian-Ionic order, and the entrance is from Rusholme-road, through a handsome iron gate, on the left of which is a chapel.

The Free Grammar school was founded in the 7th of Henry VIII., by Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter, who endowed it with houses and lands now producing a revenue exceeding £4000. There are twelve exhibitions, of £40 per annum each, to either of the Universities, belonging to the school, which also, in turn with the schools of Hereford and Marlborough, has an interest in sixteen scholarships in Brasenose College, Oxford, and in the same number in St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Sarah, Duchess of Somerset, in 1679, and varying in value from £18 to £26 each per annum. There are also in the nomination of the Dean of the Collegiate Church, and the Rectors of Prestwich and Bury, as trustees of Hulme's estates, fifteen exhibitions, varying from £60 to £120 each, to Brasenose College, for bachelors of arts, who may remain there four years after taking that degree; these were founded by William Hulme, Esq., and are frequently conferred upon scholars from Manchester. The old school-house is a plain spacious building, erected in 1777, on the site of the original edifice, having an owl, the crest of the founder, sculptured on a large stone medallion over the entrance. A new school-house has been erected, in consequence of the flourishing condition of the estates of the charity. The Blue-coat hospital, part of which is appropriated to the use of the Cheetham library, was founded in 1653, by means of a bequest from Humphrey Cheetham, Esq., who left £7000 to trustees, to purchase estates for its endowment; and a sum of money to provide a house for the reception of 40 scholars, who are maintained and educated. The buildings of the college founded by Lord de la Warre, were, after its dissolution, purchased by the trustees from the Earl of Derby, to whom it had been presented by the crown, and appropriated to the use of the hospital. The premises occupy the site of the baronial mansion of the Gresleys, on the bank of the river Irk, near its confluence with the Irwell, and comprise an extensive range, exhibiting, through all its subsequent repairs, strong features of its collegiate architecture. A large reading-room is ornamented with antique carvings, and portraits of the founder; of Dr. Alexander Nowell, Dean of St. Paul's; Dr. William Whitaker, successively Master of Trinity, Queen's, and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge; Robert Bolton, a learned divine; and John Bradford, a native of Manchester, and a pupil in the grammar school, who was afterwards burned as a heretic in the reign of Mary. The Independent College, situated about three miles to the south-west of the town, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the later English style, lately erected, at an expense of £14,000, and consisting of a central range, with two boldly projecting wings, forming three sides of a quadrangle. In the centre of the principal range, which is two stories high, is a square embattled tower, surmounted by an octagonal lantern turret; and beneath a lofty and elegant oriel window, is the chief entrance. The Ladies' Jubilee school, for maintaining, educating, and qualifying as household servants female orphans, was established in 1809, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III., and is a neat and commodious building on the borders of Strangeways Park: Miss Hall, one of the original and most zealous promoters of the institution, bequeathed, at her death in 1828, £44,000, to be equally divided among this school, the infirmary, the lying-in-hospital, and the fever ward. In 1723, Mrs. Anne Hinde bequeathed land, now producing nearly £200 per annum, for education. There is a school for Roman Catholic children, supported by subscription; national central schools in Manchester and at Salford were founded in 1812; and a Lancasterian school was commenced in 1809, and is held in a building in Marshall-street, erected in 1813, at an expense of £5000.

The Infirmary was established in 1752, by Joseph Bancroft, Esq., in conjunction with Charles White, Esq., M.D.; and in 1755 a building for the purpose was erected by subscription: the grounds are tastefully laid out, and hot, cold, vapour, and medicated baths have been fitted up, the profits arising from which are appropriated to the support of the institution. A lunatic hospital and asylum was founded in 1765; a dispensary was established in 1792, and the building is ample and commodious. In 1830, the late king, on the solicitation of the chairman and committee, became the patron of the institution, which is now styled "The Royal Infirmary, Dispensary, Lunatic Hospital, and Asylum." The Fever hospital, in Aytoun-street, is a plain and substantial structure of brick, erected by subscription, at an expense of £5000, in 1805, and under the superintendence of a Board of Health. The Lying-in hospital, in Stanley-street, Salford, was instituted in 1790. The school for the Deaf and Dumb, formerly held in this building, was established in 1823: the necessity of increasing its means of usefulness, having led to a public subscription and a bazaar, £3848 were paid to the treasurer as the commencement of a fund for a new building; and Mr. Henshaw, of Oldham, having bequeathed £20,000 for endowing a Blind Asylum, his trustees and the committee of the Deaf and Dumb school determined to erect their buildings contiguous to each other. A beautiful pile has been built near the Botanic garden; the Deaf and Dumb institution occupying one wing, and the Blind asylum the other; the centre being allotted to a chapel for the use of both. The Deaf and Dumb institution cost about £11,000, and contains accommodation for 100 children; the Blind asylum affords room for 150 inmates. An institution in Faulkner-street, for curing Diseases of the Eye, was commenced in 1815, and though its annual income does not exceed £200, affords relief to 1500 patients generally during the year; the Lock hospital, in Bond-street, was established in 1819, and the Female penitentiary, in Rusholme-road, in 1822. There are funds at the disposal of the boroughreeve amounting to more than £4000 per annum, arising from charitable bequests, for distribution in bread, clothes, money, and other necessities, among the aged, infirm, and indigent poor. Among the distinguished natives of Manchester, or persons who have been otherwise connected with it, may be enumerated, William Crabtree, an astronomical writer and the inventor of a micrometer, born at Broughton, within the parish, and killed at the battle of Marston Moor in 1644; John Byrom, an ingenious poet, and the author of a popular system of short-hand, born at Kersal-Moor, near the town, in 1691; John Ferriar, M.D., author of Illustrations of Sterne, &c., and other popular works; Thomas Barritt, a distinguished antiquary, whose large and valuable heraldic collections in manuscript have been placed in the library of Cheetham's hospital; Thomas Faulkner, an enterprising traveller, who published the earliest authentic account of Patagonia, and died in 1774; the Rev. John Whitaker, the Manchester historian; Thomas Percival, M.D., an eminent physician and popular writer; Charles White, M.D., F.R.S., a distinguished surgeon and anatomist; Joseph Farrington, R.A., a landscape painter of considerable celebrity; and Dr. Dalton. Manchester gives the titles of Duke and Earl to the family of Montagu.

MANEA, a chapelry, in the parish of COVENEY, union of NORTH WITCHFORD, hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from March; containing 1077 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school.

MANEWDEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BISHOP-STORTFORD, hundred of CLAVERING, N. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (N.) from Bishop-Stortford; containing 688 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2486*a.* 2*r.* 36*p.*, of which 2057 acres are arable, 316 meadow and pasture, and 66 woodland. A considerable trade is carried on in malt, for which there are two malt-houses. The village is situated in a fertile valley on the banks of the river Stort; and a fair is held in it on Easter-Monday, chiefly for toys and pedlery. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14; impropiator, Launcelot A. Cousmaker, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £630, and the vicarial for £215, and the glebe comprises 55 acres. The church is an ancient cruciform structure, with a tower of stone, and contains some handsome monuments.

MANFIELD (All Saints), a parish, in the union of DARLINGTON, partly in the wapentake of GILLING-

WEST, but chiefly in that of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Darlington; containing, with the township of Cliffe, 474 inhabitants, of whom 420 are in the township of Manfield. The parish is bounded on the north by the Tees, and comprises 3454*a.* 12*p.*, of which 2173 acres are arable, 1195 pasture, and 86 woodland; the surface is undulated, the scenery picturesque, and towards the river the soil rich and productive. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown; income, £466; impropiators, the Landowners. The church is a handsome ancient structure, with a fine square tower. There is a national school with an endowment of £12 a year.

MANGERSBURY, a hamlet, in the parish and union of STOW-ON-THE-WOLD, Upper division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. S. E.) from Stow; containing 486 inhabitants. The workhouse of Stow union is situated here. The old Roman Fosse-way passes through the hamlet.

MANGOTSFIELD (St. James), a parish, in the union of KEYNSHAM, hundred of BARTON-REGIS, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Bristol; containing 3864 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2442*a.* 3*r.* 31*p.* of arable and pasture land, in nearly equal parts, and 90 acres are common or waste; a considerable portion of the Kingswood Mining district is included within the parish, and coal is found in abundance; there are also quarries of good paving-stone. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £136; patron, Thomas Wadham, Esq. In addition to the parochial church, a neat chapel of ease, dedicated to Our Saviour, was built at Downend, in 1831, by subscription, aided by a grant of £1000 from the Incorporated Society; it is a handsome edifice, in the later English style, and contains 1024 sittings, of which 770 are free. There are places of worship for Independents, and other dissenters; also a national school.

MANLEY, a township, in the parish of FRODSHAM, union of RUNCORN, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of CHESHIRE, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Frodsham; containing 385 inhabitants. The township comprises 1105 acres, of which 60 are common or waste.

MANNINGFORD-ABBOTTS, a parish, in the union of PEWSEY, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Everley and Pewsey, and N. divisions of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Pewsey; containing 148 inhabitants. This parish, which formerly belonged to the abbey of Llanthony, and subsequently, by grant from the crown, formed part of the large possessions of the Protector, the Duke of Somerset, comprises by computation 918 acres, whereof 670 are arable, 228 pasture, and 20 woodland. Its soil in some parts is sandy, and in others a clayey loam; the surface is gently undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by a rivulet which, in its course to Salisbury, obtains the name of the Avon. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 10. 2*½*; net income, £300; patron, Sir J. D. Astley, Bart. A small school is supported by subscription.

MANNINGFORD-BOHUN, a tything, in the parish of WILSFORD, union of PEWSEY, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Everley and Pewsey, and S. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Pewsey; containing 283 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £267, payable to St. Nicholas' Hospital, Sarum, and the vicarial for £133. 10.

MANNINGFORD-BRUCE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of PEWSEY, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Everley and Pewsey, and N. divisions of WILTS, 2 miles (S. W.) from Pewsey; containing 265 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1100 acres; the soil is in some parts peat resting upon clay, in others sandy and light, and in some gravelly, with a substratum of chalk; the surface is generally flat, but towards the downs rises into gentle eminences, and the lower grounds are watered by a stream which flows into the Avon. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. G. Wells: the tithes have been commuted for £310, and the glebe comprises one acre. The church is an ancient structure, with a circular chancel; over the altar is a tablet inscribed to the memory of Mary Nicholas, who was instrumental in the preservation of Charles II., after his defeat at Worcester. A school is partly supported by subscription.

MANNINGHAM, a township, in the parish, borough, and union of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. W.) from Bradford; containing 5622 inhabitants. This township, which forms part of the north-western suburbs of Bradford, comprises by measurement 1230 acres, whereof 658 are arable, and 572 pasture; the soil of the arable land is fertile, and the scenery generally picturesque. Manningham Hall, the seat of E. C. Lister Kaye, Esq., is a handsome mansion, erected on the site of the ancient house of the Lister family, taken down in 1770, and is surrounded by a park. Clock House, the property of Francis Simes, Esq. (during his lifetime); Wheatley Hill, the seat of John Rand, Esq.; and Bolton Royds, the residence of John Garnett Horsfall, Esq., are all finely situated, and command beautiful prospects of the surrounding country; and Henry Leah, Esq., of Bierley Hall, has also a mansion here. The worsted manufacture is carried on, and there is a large mill for the purpose, belonging to Messrs. Lister. St. Jude's, a district church, was erected in 1842, at an expense of £3600, exclusive of the site, valued at £2000; the amount was raised by subscription, aided by a grant of £500 from the Ripon Diocesan Society. It is a handsome structure, in the Norman style, from a design by Walker Rawstorne, Esq., and contains about 1000 sittings, of which 366 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rev. W. Scoresby, Vicar of Bradford. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

MANNINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of GUS-SAGE ALL SAINTS, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of KNOWLTON, Wimborne division of DORSET; containing 76 inhabitants.

MANNINGTON, a parish, in the union of AYLSHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Aylsham; containing 20 inhabitants. The parish comprises 548a. 1r. 26p., of which 423 acres are arable, 61 meadow and pasture, and 63 woodland. Mannington Hall is an ancient mansion, erected by William Lumner, who had license to convert it into a castle; it is surrounded by a moat. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Itteringham, and valued in the king's books at £1. 16. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. The church, which is situated near the Hall, has long been in a state of decay, and forms a picturesque ruin.

MANNINGTREE (St. Michael), a market-town and parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 9 miles (N. E. by E.) from Colchester, and 61 (N. E. by E.) from London; containing 1255 inhabitants. This place was anciently called Sciddinghoo, or, as in Domesday book, Sciddinchou; and in the reign of Henry VIII. it had received the name of Many tree, of which the present appellation is an obvious corruption. Here was formerly a guild, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the revenue of which was £8. 5. 4.; and the importance of the place may be inferred from a certificate of the value of chantry lands, in which it is termed "a great town and also a haven town, having in it to the number of 700 houseling people." The parish, which is extremely salubrious, and occupies the most pleasant situation in the hundred, is bounded on the north by the river Stour. The town is on the southern bank of the river, on the road from London to Harwich, and is irregularly built, but the streets are paved, and lighted with oil, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with excellent water. The malt trade is carried on to a great extent; and a brewery, belonging to Messrs. Alston, produces annually 5000 barrels of strong ale. At spring tides vessels drawing six feet of water come up to the quay, importing corn, coal, deals, &c. The Stour was made navigable from the town to Sudbury, by act of parliament in the 4th and 5th of the reign of Anne. The market is on Thursday, for corn and cattle; and there is a fair for toys on the Thursday in Whitsun-week. The petty-sessions for the division of Tendring take place on Mondays at Mistley and Thorpe alternately, when overseers, surveyors, and constables are appointed; and a court baron is held here annually by the lords of the manor of Mistley and Manningtree. The village of Mistley, about half a mile from the town, consists of several handsome houses; and a fair is held by permission on the green, on the 8th and 9th of August. The living is united, with the vicarage of Bradfield, to the rectory of Mistley. The church consists of a nave, with north and south aisles separated by ranges of massive pillars, and contains a monument on which is an inscription recording that a fuller, named Thomas Osmond, was burnt here for heresy, June 15th, 1555. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by subscription.

MANSELL-GAMAGE (St. Giles), a parish, in the union of WEOBLEY, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Hereford; containing 136 inhabitants, and comprising 1279 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Sir J. G. Cotterell, Bart.: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £114, and the impropriate for £93. 16. 6.; there are 2 acres of glebe. The church is seated on an eminence.

MANSELL-LACY (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of WEOBLEY, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Hereford; containing 315 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the road from Hereford to Weobley, and comprises by computation 1335 acres, of which 569 are arable, 613 meadow and pasture, and 73 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 3. 11½.; net income, £162; patron, Sir R. Price, Bart.; impropiators, Trustees of Price's Hospital: the glebe contains about 8 acres. The church is a neat edifice, in the later English style.

MANSENGH, a chapelry, in the parish of KIRKBY-LONSDALE, union of KENDAL, LONSDALE ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 3½ miles (N. N. W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale; containing 232 inhabitants. An act was passed in 1837, for inclosing 5000 acres of waste land, of which 16 were appropriated for the recreation of the inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £85; patron, Vicar of Kirkby-Lonsdale. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, was built in the year 1726. There is a school, erected and endowed by Christopher Wilson, Esq.

MANSFIELD (St. Peter), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the N. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 14 miles (N. by W.) from Nottingham, and 138 (N. N. W.) from London; containing, with the hamlet of Pleasley-hill, 9788 inhabitants. The name of this place, anciently written Maunsfield, is derived from its situation on the small river Mann, or Maun, which rises about three miles westward. The town, which is of great antiquity, is supposed to have been of British or Roman origin; and during the heptarchy it was a temporary residence of the Mercian kings, for the convenience of hunting in the Royal Forest of Sherwood. In the reigns of Edward the Confessor, William the Conqueror, and William Rufus, it was a royal demesne, and so continued till the time of Elizabeth, except that, in the reign of Henry VIII., it was, with other manors, given to the Duke of Norfolk, but afterwards restored to the crown, in exchange for other property: it was ultimately granted away, by letters-patent, in the 44th of Elizabeth. Until the year 1715, the courts for the Forest of Sherwood, celebrated in ballad story, as the scene of the exploits of the renowned archer, Robin Hood, and his band of freebooters, were held at Mansfield.

The town is situated on the road from London to Leeds, in a deep vale, in the centre of the ancient forest, and consists of three chief streets, besides others branching from them, which are narrow and irregular; the houses are principally built of grey stone, and at the entrance to the town from Southwell are several excavated in the sandstone rock. Many improvements have been made within the last few years, under acts of parliament obtained in 1823 and 1825, agreeably with the provisions of one of which the town is lighted with gas, by a joint-stock company; the approach from the London road has been widened, and the market-place considerably enlarged. A small theatre is open during the summer months, and races take place at the July fair; a subscription library was established in 1825, and there is an excellent news and reading room. The moot-hall was erected in 1752, in the market-place, at the expense of Henrietta Cavendish Holles, Countess of Oxford and Mortimer, and its front was re-chiseled in 1831, and otherwise greatly improved in appearance. Mansfield has some important manufactures in cotton, hosiery, and lace; of the first, one mill contains 2400 spindles, and affords employment to 160 persons, and besides this there are six other cotton-mills upon the river Maun, within two miles of the town. Upwards of 700 frames are at work in weaving stockings and gloves, both of silk and cotton. There are iron-foundries for light castings; and a very extensive business is carried on in malt, and in cutting and working into architectural ornaments the fine freestone obtained from the adjacent quarries. The trade has been much benefited by the construction of a double railway, about eight miles in length, from Mansfield to Pinxton basin, there communicating with the Cromford canal; it was formed under an act of parliament passed in 1817, at an expense of £33,000. In the reign of Henry III., the inhabitants procured a charter for a market on Monday, afterwards altered to Thursday; and also the privilege of housebote and haybote, or timber for repairs, and wood for fences, out of the forest, which they still enjoy. The market has been held on Thursday from time immemorial; and there are fairs on April 5th and July 10th, for the sale of cattle and hogs, and a chartered fair on the second Thursday in October, for horses, cattle, sheep, and cheese. The town is the place of election for the northern division of the county.

The parish comprises by computation 7000 acres, 5000 of which are old inclosures and in cultivation, and the remainder is principally forest land. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 7. 6.; net income, £158; patron, Duke of Portland, as lessee under the Dean of Lincoln, appropriator. A chaplaincy is attached to the church, for the support of which the vicar and churchwardens were incorporated, and invested with lands, in the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary. The church exhibits specimens of each style, from the Norman to the later English; the two lower portions of the tower are early Norman, and there is one window in the early English style; the arches, piers, and north door, are of good decorated character; the tower is surmounted by a low spire. There are places of worship for General Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Wesleyans, and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded by letters-patent of Elizabeth, dated March 8th, 1561, and was endowed by her with £30 per annum: the deed of incorporation having reference to the maintenance of the chaplain, as well as of the school, and the lands belonging to each having become undistinguishable, it was decided in chancery, about 1680, that two-thirds of the income of the estate, valued at £1200 per annum, should be paid to the chaplain, and the remaining third to the master as his assistant. A scholarship of £10 per annum was founded at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, by Dr. Sterne, Archbishop of York, for a native of Mansfield. A free school was established in 1702. In 1709, Samuel Brunt bequeathed lands, directing the proceeds, which then amounted to £436. 15., to be applied chiefly to the relief of poor inhabitants. In 1725, Faith Clerkson left the sum of £2000 to trustees, for erecting a school-house, and vesting the remainder in land, of which the rental, producing £331. 18., is divided between Mansfield and Mansfield-Woodhouse, principally in support of a schoolmaster and mistress; and, in 1784, Charles Thompson bequeathed £1200 in the three per cents. to the trustees of Brunt's charity, for education, one-half for the augmentation of Brunt's charity, and one-half for educating children, for whom a school has been built in Tothills-lane. The present income of Brunt's charity, including Thompson's bequest, amounts to £1049. By deed dated January 15th, 1691, Elizabeth Heath founded almshouses for twelve persons, and endowed them with property now producing a rental of £244. 9., of which £70 are appropriated to the apprenticing of children. The poor law union of Mansfield comprises 18 parishes or places, of which 9 are in each of the counties of Nottingham and Derby, the whole containing a population of 27,627 inhabitants. In the neighbourhood are traces of several Roman exploratory camps, two Roman villæ, and two Roman sepulchres. Humphrey Ridley, an eminent physician and anatomist, was born here about 1653. Archbishop Sterne, and Dr. William Chapel, Bishop of Cork and Ross, in Ireland, were natives of Mansfield; Robert Dodsley, author of the Economy of Human Life, was born in the vicinity, and apprenticed in the town; and James Murray, inventor of the patent circular saw, resided here. Sir William Murray, on being appointed lord chief justice of the court of king's bench, was elevated to the peerage, in 1756, by the title of Baron Mansfield, of which place he was created earl, in 1776.

MANSFIELD-WOODHOUSE (St. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of MANSFIELD, N. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.) from Mansfield; containing 1871 inhabitants. This place, which anciently formed part of the parish of Mansfield, has undergone much improvement, and many hundred acres of barren waste have been converted into rich arable land, by a judicious system of irrigation adopted by the Duke of Portland, who caused a canal to be cut through this and the parish of Clipstone, communicating with the river Maun. About 1300 acres here, with some land in Mansfield, constitute the only uninclosed portion of the ancient forest of Sherwood. The substratum abounds with limestone of good quality, and there are extensive lime-kilns, and quarries of excellent freestone. The village is large, and contains several very respectable houses; many of the inhabitants are employed in frame-work knitting, and about 200 in cotton-spinning in the factories of Mansfield. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £94; patron and impropiator, Duke of Portland. The church is a large structure, with a spire steeple, which was rebuilt in 1304, with one of the aisles, after having been injured by a fire, which also destroyed part of the village. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The free school was founded by Faith Clerkson, in 1725, and endowed with land; Richard Radford, by deed dated May 10th, 1827, gave £800, the interest to be applied in educating children; and there is a national school. In 1786, Major Rooke discovered two Roman villæ in the parish, of which one contained nine rooms and a hypocaust, with part of a very elegant mosaic pavement in the centre room, and the other thirteen rooms, two hypocausts, and a cold bath. About 100 yards to the south-east were two Roman sepulchres, in one of which was an urn containing ashes, with fragments of bones lying near it; and coins and various other Roman relics were also found. Dr. Mason, Bishop of Sodor and Man, was born in the parish.

MANSRIGGS, a township, in the parish and union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Ulverstone; containing 63 inhabitants.

MANSTON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of STURMINSTER, hundred of REDLANE, Sturminster division of DORSET, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Shaftesbury; containing 127 inhabitants. It comprises 1346a. 1r. 31p., of which 83 acres are arable, and 1202 pasture and meadow: the river Stour forms a boundary between this parish and that of Fiddleford. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 5., and in the gift of G. F. St. John, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £315, and the glebe comprises 52 acres. The church is very ancient. A parochial school is supported chiefly by the rector. Thomas Dibden, a divine, orator, and Latin poet, who died in 1741, was born here.

MANSWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish of CRITCHILL, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of BADBURY, Wimborne division of DORSET; containing 119 inhabitants.

MANTHORP, with LITTLE GONERBY, a township, in the union, soke, and borough of GRANTHAM, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 1 mile (N. N. E.) from Grantham; containing 1968 inhabitants. Allotments under several acts of inclosure for the poor, producing £22 per annum, are appropriated in aid of the poor rates.

MANTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of WITHAM-ON-THE-HILL, union of BOURNE, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Bourne; containing 113 inhabitants.

MANTON (St. HIBALD), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, partly in the wapentake of CORRINGHAM, and partly in the E. division of that of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing, with the township of Cleatham, and the hamlet of Twigmoor, 182 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £252; patron, M. D. D. Dalyson, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1805.

MANTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Uppingham; containing 272 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1150 acres, of which 150 only are arable, and the remainder pasture. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £73; patron and impropiator, E. W. Smyth, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1772. A college or chantry was founded here, in the 25th of Edward III., by William and John Wade, for a master and two brethren, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, was valued at £22. 18. 6.

MANTON, a tything, in the parish of PRESHUTE, union of MARLBOROUGH, hundred of SELKLEY, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 290 inhabitants.

MAPERTON (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of WINCANTON, hundred of CATSASH, E. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Wincanton; containing, with the hamlet of Clapton, 214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 9. 7., and in the gift of Wadham College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £330, and the glebe comprises 89 acres. Here is a national school.

MAPLEBECK, a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, N. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles

(N. by E.) from Southwell; containing 162 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1200 acres. Stone of good quality is obtained, but is used chiefly for the roads; there were formerly quarries, from which the stone was raised for the erection of the bridge at Newark. An ancient mansion near the church, once the residence of the De Markham family, has been taken down, and the materials have been sold. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £68; patron and impropriator, Duke of Newcastle.

MAPLE-DURHAM (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of BRADFELD, hundred of LANGTREE, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Reading; containing 481 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Thames, and comprises 2850*a.* 1*r.* 8*p.*, of which 2029 acres are arable, 352 meadow and pasture, and 374 woodland; the surface is undulated, and the scenery pleasingly diversified. The Hall is a handsome mansion in the Elizabethan style, and contains some stately apartments, and an extensive collection of paintings; attached is a Roman Catholic chapel, erected by the late Michael Blount, Esq., in 1800. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 10.; patrons and impropriators, Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The great tithes have been commuted for £59. 14. 3., and the vicarial for £807. 5. 9.; the glebe comprises 51 acres. The church has been the burial-place of the ancient family of Blount for many generations. There is a national school; and an almshouse for six persons is supported by M. Blount, Esq.

MAPLEDURWELL (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Basingstoke; containing 214 inhabitants. The parish comprises 818 acres, of which 101 are common or waste land. The living is annexed to the rectory of Newnham: the tithes have been commuted for £220, and the glebe comprises 8½ acres.

MAPLESCOMBE, in the parish of KINGSDOWN, union of DARTFORD, hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Seven-Oaks. The parochial church of this place is in ruins, and the living annexed to Kingsdown.

MAPLESTEAD, GREAT (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of HALSTEAD, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 2¼ miles (N. by W.) from Halstead; containing 452 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have derived its name from the number of maple-trees that formerly grew here. The parish is intersected by the river Colne, and comprises 1902*a.* 3*r.* 3*p.*, of which 1440 acres are arable, 320 pasture, and 115 woodland and plantations; the soil is rich. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 4.; patron, R. Myall, Esq.; impropriator, Rev. J. Sperling. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £335, and the vicarial for £175; the impropriate glebe comprises 88 acres, and the vicarial one acre. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a square tower, and attached to the south side is a chapel belonging to the proprietor of Dynes Hall, and containing two costly monuments of the family of Deane. Here is a national school.

MAPLESTEAD, LITTLE (St. JOHN OF JERUSALEM), a parish, in the union of HALSTEAD, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 2¼ miles (N. by E.) from Halstead; containing 407 inhabitants. It comprises 1063*a.* 3*r.* 19*p.*, of which 845 acres are arable, 98 pasture, and 72 woodland and plantations; the soil is fertile, and the scenery finely varied. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £54; patrons and impropriators, proprietors of the Hall farm, whose tithes have been commuted for £205. The church is ancient, and remarkable as one of the few remaining models of the Holy Sepulchre; the east end is semicircular, and the church is said once to have had the privilege of sanctuary. Juliana, wife of Fitz-Aldhelm de Burgo, in the time of Henry I., gave the parish to the Knights Hospitallers, who had a commandery here.

MAPPERCOMBE, with NETTLECOMBE, a tything, in the parish and liberty of POORSTOCK, though locally in the hundred of EGGERTON, union of BEAMINSTER, Bridport division of DORSET; containing 255 inhabitants.

MAPPERLEY, a township, in the parish of KIRK-HALLAM, union of BELPER, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 7¼ miles (N. E. by E.) from Derby; containing 358 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £84, and the vicarial for £130. Here is a national school.

MAPPERTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BEAMINSTER, hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division of DORSET, 2 miles (S. E. by E.) from Beaminster; containing 94 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 804 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 1½., and in the gift of H. C. Compton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £193, and the glebe comprises 51 acres, to which there is a house. The church, in 1291 styled a chapel to Netherbury, was rebuilt in 1704, by Richard Broadrep, Esq., and the interior handsomely fitted up.

MAPPLETON (St. MARY), a parish, in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, 1¾ mile (N. W.) from Ashbourn; containing 204 inhabitants. The river Dove is here crossed by a stone bridge having a remarkably flat arch. The living is a rectory, united to the vicarage of Ashbourn. The church has a dome surmounted by an urn. Rowland Okeover, Esq., in 1727, vested land in trustees for building almshouses for three clergymen's widows; the income is £30 per annum.

MAPPLETON (All Saints), a parish, in the union of SKIRLAUGH, N. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 2½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Hornsea; containing, with the hamlet of Great Cowden, and part of the township of Great Hatfield, 414 inhabitants, of whom 198 are in the township of Mappleton with Rowlston. This place, anciently Mapleton, from abounding in maple-trees, was part of the possessions of Peter le Brus: the present lord of the manor is R. Moiser, Esq. The township is bounded on the east by the German Ocean, and intersected by the road from Aldbrough to Hornsea, and comprises by computation 1946 acres, of which 250 are pasture, and the remainder arable. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4.; net income, £58; patron, Archdeacon of the East riding; impropriator, Mr. Moiser. A handsome glebe-house was erected in 1822, by the incumbent, at an expense of £1000. The church, situated on an elevation above the road, consists of a nave, north aisle, and chancel, with a square tower of three stages, and comprises, on the north side, a chapel long used as a burial-place by the family of Brough, to several members of which there are monumental inscriptions. Here is a place of worship for dissenters; also a national school, erected in 1820. Marshal Brough, who presided as judge of the court of admiralty on the trial of Admiral Byng, was interred here.

MAPPLEWELL, a hamlet, in the chapelry of WOODHOUSE, parish and union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER; containing 28 inhabitants.

MAPPOWDER (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of CERNE, hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Cerne division of DORSET, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Sturminster-Newton; containing 275 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1800 acres; and good stone for rough kinds of building, and for the roads, is quarried. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 14. 7., and in the gift of Earl Beauchamp: the tithes have been commuted for £330, and the glebe contains 82½ acres. The church is an embattled structure, in the later English style, with a low plain tower, and contains a Norman font of Purbeck marble, and several monuments to the family of Coker, whose ancient mansion, a large and handsome building, erected in the reign of Elizabeth, has been converted into a farm-house. Of this family was Mr. Coker, author of a Survey of Dorsetshire.

Corporation Seal.

MARAZION, an incorporated market-town and chapelry, in the parish of St. Hilary, union of PENZANCE, hundred of PENWITH, W. division of CORNWALL, 63½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Launceston, and 282 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 1683 inhabitants. The ancient name of this town was Marghasiewe; the more recent appellation of Market- jew, still in use among the common people, is supposed by some to take its origin from a market formerly held here, which was much frequented by Jews. In the early part of the reign of Henry VIII., a party of French soldiers, having landed from a fleet then cruising in the channel, took possession of Marazion; but on the approach of the sheriff of the county with the posse comitatus, they set fire to the place, and retreated to their ships. It again suffered by conflagration in the reign of Edward VI. The town is very pleasantly situated on the eastern side of Mount's bay, chiefly at the foot of a hill, by which it is sheltered on the north: the air is particularly mild and salubrious; the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. The profits of a fair held here were given to the priory of St. Michael's Mount, in the reign of Henry I.; and in the reign of Henry III., that religious community was empowered by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, to hold three fairs and three markets, which had been previously granted to them at Marghasbigan, by charter of the kings of England, on their own land at Marchadyon. In the year 1331, a market on Monday, and a fair on the festival of St. Andrew, to continue three days, were granted to Ralph de Bleyon. There are several mines in the chapelry, but none at present in operation; the chief manufacture is that of rope, which is carried on to a moderate extent. The market is on Saturday; and there is a fair on Michaelmas-day for horses and for cattle. The town was incorporated by charter from Queen Elizabeth, in 1595, and the corporation consists of a mayor, who is a magistrate, eight burgesses, and twelve capital inhabitants. The chapelry comprises by computation 650 acres: there are several quarries of good building-stone. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Corporation, subject to the approval of the Vicar of St. Hilary; net income, £98; impropiator, Rev. J. Rogers. The great tithes have been commuted for £105, and the vicarial for £147; the glebe comprises one acre. The chapel is dedicated to St. Ervat. There are places of worship for Baptists, Bryanites, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyans.

MARBURY, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of NORTHWICH, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Northwich; containing 37 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the township.

MARBURY, a parish, in the union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the township of Norbury, 784 inhabitants, of whom 383 are in the township of Marbury cum Quoisle, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Whitchurch. This parish, which takes its name from two meres, called respectively the greater and the less, is situated at the extremity of the county, bordering upon Shropshire, and is intersected by a branch of the Chester and Ellesmere canal. Courts leet are held for the manors of Marbury and Norbury. The living is annexed to the rectory of Whitchurch: the tithes have been commuted for £327, and the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church, an ancient structure, has an elegant chancel, rebuilt by the late Earl of Bridgewater. There are several charitable bequests, amounting to about £300, with two small crofts of land and some rent-charges, the produce of which is distributed among the poor.

MARCH, a market-town and chapelry, in the parish of DODDINGTON, union and hundred of NORTH WITCHFORD, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 31 miles (N. by W.) from Cambridge, and 80 (N.) from London; containing 5706 inhabitants. The town is situated on the banks of the navigable river Nene, by which communication is obtained with Cambridge, Lynn, Peterborough, and other places. The market, granted to Sir Alexander Peyton, in 1671, is on Friday, chiefly for butcher's meat; and there are two fairs, each of which continues three days, commencing on the Monday before Whitsuntide, and on the second Tuesday in October. Manorial courts are held in the guildhall, a modern and commodious edifice, situated in the High-street; and the place is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s. throughout the Isle of Ely, held here once a month. The tithes have been commuted for £5278. 10. 6., and there is a glebe of 5¾ acres. The chapel, dedicated to St. Wendreda, a very ancient structure, with a spire at the west end, was erected about the year 1343, at which period an indulgence was granted by the pope to all who should contribute to it; in the interior are several monuments. A school was founded in 1696, by William Neale, Esq., and endowed with 33½ acres of land in Whites Fen; and national schools were erected in 1827. There are charities for the poor yielding a rental of £470, of which part is applied to purposes of instruction. Between this town and Wisbech, urns, inclosing burnt bones, and a vessel containing 160 Roman denarii of different emperors, were discovered in the year 1730.

MARCHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ABINGDON, hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Abingdon; containing, with the chapelries of Frilford and Garford, and the hamlet of Cothill, 1109 inhabitants, of whom 760 are in the township of Marcham. The parish comprises 4069*a.* 3*r.* 7*p.* The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 15. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £455; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land in 1815. The church was rebuilt, except the tower, in 1837, at an expense of £2000, of which a considerable portion was given by Thomas Duffield, Esq. At Garford is a chapel of ease.

MARCHAMLEY, a township, in the parish of HONNET, in the union of DRAYTON, Drayton division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 441 inhabitants.

MARCHINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of HANBURY, union of UTTOXETER, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Uttoxeter; containing 471 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £92; patron, Vicar of Hanbury; appropriator, Bishop of Lichfield. Rent-charges amounting to £110 have been awarded as commutations in lieu of tithes, of which amount £90 are payable to the appropriator, and £20 to the vicar; and there is a glebe of nearly 20 acres. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. A school, endowed with £10 per annum, is conducted on the national plan.

MARCHINGTON-WOODLANDS, a township, in the parish of HANBURY, union of UTTOXETER, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Uttoxeter; containing 286 inhabitants. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £60, payable to the Bishop of Lichfield, and the vicarial for £10.

MARCHWOOD, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW FOREST, hundred of REDBRIDGE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 158 inhabitants.—See ELING.

MARCLE, LITTLE, a parish, in the union of LEDBURY, hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Ledbury; containing 152 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south-east by a portion of the county of Gloucester, and comprises 1218*a.* 3*r.* 1*p.*, of which 540 acres are arable, 541 pasture, and 3 woodland; the surface is boldly undulated, and the scenery richly diversified. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £7. 1. 4.; patron, Bishop of Hereford. The tithes have been commuted for £225, and the glebe comprises 36 acres. A good glebe-house was recently erected by the Rev. W. Jones. The church is a small ancient structure.

MARCLE, MUCH (ST. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the unions of LEDBURY and ROSS, hundred of GREY-TREE, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Ledbury; containing, with the township of Yatton, 1227 inhabitants, of whom 982 are in the township of Much Marcle. The parish is situated on the borders of Gloucestershire, and comprises 4662 acres of land, intersected by the road from Ledbury to Ross. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 0. 5.; net income, £841; patron, Sir J. R. Money, Bart. Some small tithes were commuted for land in 1795, and others have recently been commuted for a rent-charge of £333; the glebe comprises 27 acres. The tithes belonging to the Bishop of Hereford have been settled for £430. The church, an ancient structure of great beauty, and containing many interesting monuments, has been repewed. A national school is partly supported by an endowment of £6 per annum.

MARDALE, a chapelry, partly in the parish of BAMPTON, and partly in that of SHAP, West ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Orton; containing 47 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £76; patron, Vicar of Shap, in which parish the chapel is situated.

MARDEN (ST. ETHELBERT), a parish, in the hundred of BROXASH, union and county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Hereford; containing, with the chapelries of Amberly and Wisterstone, 945 inhabitants. The parish is seated on the left bank of the river Lugg, and consists of 3955 acres of a productive soil. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 13. 5., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford: the tithes have been commuted for £714. 5., of which £400 are payable to the Dean and Chapter, £298. 5. to the vicar, and £16 to an impropiator; there are $30\frac{1}{2}$ acres of appropriate, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ of vicarial, glebe. The church stands on the bank of the Lugg, over the spot where King Ethelbert was buried, and where a well, which still exists, is said to have sprung up at the time the edifice was dedicated to his memory. A school is endowed by Jane Shelley with £10 per annum.

MARDEN (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of MAIDSTONE, hundred of MARDEN, Lower division of the lathe of SCRAY, W. division of KENT, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Maidstone; containing 2076 inhabitants. The South-Eastern railway passes close to this place, by a gradual descent from Redstone Hill, near Reigate, where it diverges from the London and Brighton railway. A fair is held on October 10th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 18. 4.; net income, £829; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of Canterbury. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and a national school.

MARDEN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of DEVIZES, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS, 7 miles (S. E.) from Devizes; containing 222 inhabitants. It is celebrated as the scene of a battle which took place between Ethelred and the Danes, of whom the latter were victorious. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 17. 6.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The great tithes have been commuted for £190, and the vicarial for £175; the glebe comprises about an acre. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, and has a fine Norman arch at the south entrance into the nave, and another separating the nave from the chancel, both richly ornamented.

MARDEN, EAST, a parish, in the union of WEST BOURNE, hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 8 miles (S. E.)

from Petersfield; containing 67 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 955 acres, of which 550 are arable, 350 pasture, and 55 woodland: the village is pleasantly situated in a valley on the downs, and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 16. 8.; net income, £106; patron and appropriator, Prebendary of Marden in the Cathedral of Chichester. The church is a handsome structure, in the early English style.

MARDEN, NORTH, a parish, in the union of WEST BOURNE, hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 7 miles (S. E.) from Petersfield; containing 24 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Petersfield to Chichester, and comprises by computation 700 acres, of which 300 are arable, and 400 down pasture. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 8., and in the patronage of Capt. Phipps Hornby: the tithes have been commuted for £68, and the glebe comprises $13\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church is in the early English style, with a circular east end, and was restored and new-pewed in 1836, chiefly at the expense of the patron.

MARDEN, UP (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of WEST BOURNE, hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 8 miles (N. W.) from Chichester; containing, with the tything of West Marden, 348 inhabitants. The parish is pleasantly situated; and on the downs is a telegraph communicating with others on the line between Portsmouth and London. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Compton. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style. There was formerly a chapel at West Marden.

MAREFIELD, a township, in the parish of TILTON, union of BILLESDON, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 21 inhabitants.

MAREHAM-LE-FEN (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union and soke of HORNCASTLE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Horncastle; containing 713 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 2000 acres, much improved by draining. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 10. 10.; net income, £355; patron, Bishop of Carlisle. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1805; the glebe comprises 313 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the decorated English style, and contains many interesting details. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is partly supported by subscription.

MAREHAM-ON-THE-HILL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and soke of HORNCASTLE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Horncastle; containing 189 inhabitants, and comprising 142*a.* 2*r.* 23*p.* The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron and appropriator, Bishop of Carlisle. The church is a very ancient and dilapidated structure, in repairing which, about 40 years since, some coins of Edward IV. and his successors were found concealed in the walls. A school is supported by subscription.

MARESFIELD (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of UCKFIELD, hundred of RUSHMONDEN, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Uckfield; containing 1579 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Lewes to London, and includes a great portion of Ashdown forest, comprises 7750 acres, whereof 1677 are arable, 1314 meadow and pasture, 4663 common and wood, and 95 orchard and garden. About a mile from the village is Woodland's nursery, celebrated for the cultivation of rose-trees, of which there are nearly 1500 varieties. The scenery is pleasingly diversified, and Maresfield Park, the seat of John Villiers Shelley, Esq., is a handsome mansion. A fair for cattle is held on the 4th of September. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of Viscount Gage: the tithes have been commuted for £615. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the interior was entirely restored in 1838, and the chancel, at the expense of the Rev. Edward Turner, the rector. A national school is chiefly supported by Sir John and Lady Shelley.

MARFLEET, a parish, in the union of SCULCOATES, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESSE, E. riding of YORK, 3 miles (E.) from Hull; containing 141 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1175 acres, of which about one-third is arable, and the remainder pasture; the surface is level, and the soil clay. The village, which is scattered, is situated on the fertile marshes on the north side of the Humber. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy; net income, £54; patron, J. Hall, Esq.: the impropriation belongs to Mrs. Mander and the family of Carleil. The church was rebuilt in 1795, at the expense of the parish. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MARGARET, ST., or STREET, a hamlet, in the parish of IVINGHOE, union of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM; containing 125 inhabitants. It takes its second name from its situation on the ancient Roman Ikeneld way, which pursued a north-eastern direction through the parish. A Benedictine nunnery for nine women, dedicated to St. Margaret, was founded here in 1160, by Henry de Blois, Bishop of Winchester; the revenue at the Dissolution was valued at £22. 6.

MARGARET'S, ST., a parish, in the union of DORSET, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 13 miles (W. S. W.) from Hereford; containing 304 inhabitants. The parish consists of 2277 acres, in about equal quantities of arable and pasture land, the latter of which is of inferior quality; the surface is ornamented with fine sweeps of wood, in which the oak and ash are of very luxuriant growth, and extensive views are obtained from the high grounds. The great limestone formation, which runs across this part of the country, is here about a mile wide, and consists of numerous strata, resting upon a bed of marl of great depth; stone is quarried for various purposes. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Michael-Church-Eskley annexed; net income, £162; patron, Earl of Oxford; impropriator, Sir Velters Cornwall, Bart. The church is ancient, and has pointed windows; at the east end is a rood-loft, the lower part of which is distinguished by compartments painted and gilded.

MARGARET'S, ST., county of HERTFORD.—See STANSTEAD ST. MARGARET'S.

MARGARET, ST., at CLIFFE, a parish, in the union of DOVOR, hundred of BESBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Dover; containing 748 inhabitants. This place received the adjunct to its name from its high situation on the chalk cliffs overlooking the English Channel. It comprises 1758 acres, of which 28 are common or waste land. In a small bay, where is a small wooden pier, or jetty, for protecting the fishing craft, some of the finest-flavoured lobsters in England are caught. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 10.; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of Canterbury. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £380, and the vicarial for £105; the appropriator's glebe comprises 98 acres, and the vicar's glebe 3 acres. The church is a spacious structure, in the Norman style.

MARGARET-MARSH (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of SHAFTESBURY, hundred of STURMINSTER-NEWTON-CASTLE, Shaston division of DORSET, 4 miles (S. W.) from Shaftesbury; containing 83 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Iwerne-Minster.

MARGARET-ROOTHING, county of ESSEX.—See ROOTHING, MARGARET.

MARGARETTING (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (S. W.) from Chelmsford; containing 570 inhabitants. The parish derives its name from the Saxon Ing (meadow) and the saint to whom its church is dedicated. The Eastern Counties' railway runs through the parsonage-farm. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 2., and in the patronage of the Heiress and Legatees of the late B. Hopkins, Esq.; net income, £168; impropiator, George Straight, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £430, and the vicarial for £189. 15.; the glebe comprises five acres. The church is a very ancient edifice, with a belfry of wood, surmounted by a shingled spire. A house, called Killigrew's farm, is said to have been the frequent resort of Henry VIII.; it seems to have been a place of great security, being surrounded by a moat, which, within memory, was crossed by a drawbridge, with two watch-towers.

MARGATE (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a sea-port, market-town, and parish, in the cinque-port liberty of DOVER, of which it is a member, and in the union of the ISLE of THANET, locally in the lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $72\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from London; containing 11,050 inhabitants. This place, formerly a small fishing-village, was distinguished by a mere, or stream, having its influx into the sea, from which circumstance it obtained the name of Meregate, afterwards changed to Margate. About the middle of the last century it became much frequented as a bathing-place, from the fineness of the beach and the purity of the air; and, though originally consisting of one scattered and irregular street, it has, by the erection of new buildings at various times, to meet the wants of the increased number of visitors, attained its present importance. The town is pleasantly situated, partly on the acclivities of two hills, and partly in the valley, and is lighted with gas, well paved, and abundantly supplied with excellent water from wells. Considerable improvements have been effected, and others are still in progress, by the commissioners for paving and lighting, under the authority of numerous acts of parliament. The London entrance, which is distinguished by an esplanade, protected by a stone wall, presents an imposing appearance, and forms an extended crescent, terminated by the pier: the whole of the sea defences, which are constructed of stone, and exceed a mile in length, cost upwards of £15,000. The market is held on Wednesday and Saturday, under a grant obtained in 1777. The town-hall and market-place were rebuilt in 1821, at an expense of £2400. The public subscription library, in Hawley-square, is a handsome building, and there are three other excellent libraries. The different bathing-rooms in High-street, and on the New-road, and the more recently-constructed and extensive works of that kind on the Fort, are all of the best description. The theatre is a neat building, erected in 1787, at an expense of £4000. The subscription and assembly rooms, attached to the Royal hotel, are very spacious; and several handsome bazaars and boulevards have lately been erected by individuals at a considerable cost. Adjoining the town are the Tivoli Gardens for concerts, fireworks, &c., possessing the advantages of a delightful situation, ornamental sheets of water, and thick plantations; and at St. Peter's, two miles from Margate, are the Ranelagh Gardens, which are tastefully laid out. Steam-packets ply daily between London and Margate, making the passage in about six hours and a half, and in the season, 2000 persons frequently arrive in one day. The trade is almost entirely connected with the supply of visitors; there are, however, a very extensive brewery and a rope manufactory, and considerable quantities of corn are exported. Margate being a member of the port of Dover, the mayor of that place appoints one of the inhabitants to act as his deputy, and the town is subject to the jurisdiction of that port. A court of requests is held for the recovery of debts under £5, and a court leet for the manor of Minster takes place about Michaelmas.

A pier of timber was constructed at a very early period, and, for its preservation, two pier-wardens and sub-deputies were appointed by the lord-wardens of the cinque-ports, and certain rates on corn, and other imported produce, were granted in the reign of Elizabeth. In 1787, an act was passed for the paving, lighting, and general improvement of the town, and for rebuilding the pier, of which the entire property and management were vested in commissioners. Under this act the old wooden pier was cased with stone; but in a violent storm, on the 14th of January, 1808, it was irreparably injured. In July, 1812, an act was obtained for establishing a joint-stock company, under whose direction a new pier was commenced; but in consequence of the destruction of part of the works by a succession of violent storms, the work was abandoned. A pier was, however, completed from a design by Mr. Rennie and Mr. Jessop, in 1815, at an expense of upwards of £67,000; it is a handsome and substantial stone structure, 900 feet in length from east to west, in its plan forming a portion of a polygon, and well calculated to afford protection to the vessels in the harbour. It is divided into two stages of buildings, the lower forming a quay, and the upper a promenade, defended on the sea-side with a stone parapet, and on the land-side by iron railings: this promenade, which as a marine walk is probably unrivalled, was designed by Mr. Thomas Edmunds-builder, of Margate. At the extremity of the pier is a stone lighthouse, erected from a design by Mr. William Edmunds, and a new pier-house has been built, under the superintendence of the same architect. To the east of the pier is the jetty for passengers, used when the depth of water will not allow vessels to reach the pier, and which was executed in the year 1824, without any additional toll or cost to the public, by the Pier Company, at an expense of £8000; it is constructed entirely of English oak, and extends northward into the sea 1120 feet from the shore. The harbour, though from its situation much exposed to storms from the north-east, has been greatly improved by the construction of the new pier, and affords good shelter; several trading vessels are constantly sailing between this place and the Dutch coast. Amongst the distinguished persons who have embarked or landed at Margate are, the Elector Palatine and his consort, in the reign of James I.; William III.; George I.; George II. and his queen Caroline; the Duke of Marlborough; the late Duke of York, on his expedition to Flanders, in 1793; and Admiral Duncan, after his victory off Camperdown, in 1797.

Seal of the Pier Company.

The parish comprises by measurement 3852 acres, of which by far the greater portion is arable land in a high state of cultivation. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £681; patron and appropriator, Archbishop of Canterbury. St. John's church, a spacious building of flint and stone, with a square tower and low spire, erected at various periods and in different styles, was originally a chapel of ease to Minster, and was made parochial in 1290. The new district church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and completed in 1829, from a design of Mr. Wm. Edmunds, is an elegant structure of Bath stone, in the early English style, with a tower which rises to the height of 135 feet, and is visible at a considerable distance: at the west end of the interior is a deep recess for the organ, which cost £750, and was presented by the late James Taddy, Esq. The total expense of the building was about £28,000, towards which the Parliamentary Commissioners contributed £10,000, and the Pier Company £2000; the living is held by the vicar of St. John's, but after his death will be made parochial. The Baptists, Wesleyans, Lady Huntingdon's Connexion, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics, have places of worship; there is a Seamen's chapel; the Wesleyans have a small meeting-house at Garlinge, and the Society of Friends possess one at Drapers' hospital. Here are a national, and an infants' school, for which the late James Taddy, Esq., in 1825, invested £500 three per cents. Drapers' hospital, about half a mile from the parochial church, was founded in 1709, by Michael Yoakley, a member of the Society of Friends, for nine aged women. The Royal sea-bathing infirmary was instituted in 1792, and opened in 1796, under the patronage of George IV.; the building consists of a centre and two wings, capable of accommodating 200 patients. In 1839, Mrs. Kidman bequeathed the interest of £2500 consols., to poor seamen at Margate, and their widows, to be paid annually; and there are numerous other charitable bequests for the relief of the poor. At the distance of a mile to the south-west of the town is Dandelion, the fortified mansion of a family of that name in the reign of Edward I., of which a gate-house is still standing: the last of the family was buried in the north chancel of St. John's church, and the stone over his grave bears his effigy in brass, and the date 1445. About a quarter of a mile to the south of the church is Salmstone Grange, where are the remains of a chapel, or oratory, formerly belonging to the monastery of St. Augustine; and in the middle of a field, about a mile and a half further, at a place called Chapel Bottom, are the ruins of Dene chapel, held under a license from the abbey of St. Augustine, in 1230, by Sir Henry de Sandwich. It is supposed that a severe battle was fought between the Danes and the Saxons in this neighbourhood, from the number of graves discovered on both the hills contiguous to the town. Various coins, also, and other antiquities have, at different times, been dug up; and, on the excavations being made for Trinity church, two urns, filled with human bones, standing in, and likewise covered with, patere, were found, in a fine state of preservation, having the name of the Roman Emperor Maximilian impressed on the different pieces.

MARHAM-CHERRY (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, 8 miles (N. E.) from Downham; containing 817 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3966a. 3r. 24p., of which 2529 acres are arable, 1169 pasture and meadow, 74 woodland, and about 200 fen, allotted to the poor. It was anciently remarkable for the number of its cherry-trees, and subsequently for walnut-trees of stately growth. The river Nar intersects the parish on the north-west, and near the village are some chalk-pits, in which various fossils are found. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; patrons and impropiators, Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The great tithes have been commuted for £645. 15., and the vicarial for £371; the glebe comprises 28 acres, with a house, built in 1830, by the Rev. A. Browne. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; under a canopy are the recumbent effigies of Sir John Steward and his lady. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; also a national school, erected in 1841. A Cistercian nunnery, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here in 1251, by Isabella de Albini, Countess of Arundel, and, at the Dissolution, had a revenue of £42.

MARHAM-CHURCH (ST. MARVENNE), a parish, in the union and hundred of STRATTON, E. division of CORNWALL, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Stratton; containing 659 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north-west by the Bristol Channel, and comprises by estimation 2600 acres, of which 150 are common or waste land: the Bude canal passes through it. There is a small iron-foundry. Fairs are held on the Wednesday after the 25th of April, and on the 12th of August. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 11. 0½., and in the gift of the Rev. John Kingdon: the tithes have been commuted for £390, and the glebe comprises 38 acres, with a house.

MARHOLM (ST. CUTHLAC), a parish, in the union and soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Peterborough; containing 197 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 2. 3½.; net income, £266; patron, Earl Fitzwilliam. The church has an ancient font, and, amongst other memorials, a magnificent marble monument to William, Earl Fitzwilliam, and Anne, his countess. In the parish is Abbey Milton, one of the seats of that noble family, a large irregular structure, the most ancient part of which is of the time of Elizabeth.

MARI-ANSLEIGH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SOUTH MOLTON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from South Molton; containing 338 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1740 acres, of which 540 are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patrons, Trustees of Davey's Charity; impropiator, W. Stabback, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £165, and whose glebe comprises 2 acres.

MARK, a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of BEMPSTONE, E. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Cross; containing 1308 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 4477 acres, the greater portion of which is pasture; great quantities of cheese are produced, and fairs are held on the Tuesday before Whit-Sunday, in August, and in September. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £154; patron and impropiator, Earl of Harrowby, whose tithes have been commuted for £295, and whose glebe comprises 8 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school.

MARK-EATON, a township, in the parish of MACKWORTH, union of BELPER, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W. N. W.) from Derby; containing 200 inhabitants. This township is entitled to an annual payment of £12. 12. for apprenticing a boy, the gift of German Pole, of Radbourn, in 1682.

MARKBY (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Alford; containing 102 inhabitants. A priory for canons of the Gilbertine order was anciently established here, of which nothing now remains but the site, indistinctly pointed out by the inequalities of the ground. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £72; patron and impropiator, P. Massingberd, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 60 acres. The church is an ancient structure, built with the materials of the priory. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

MARKET-BOSWORTH.—See BOSWORTH, MARKET.—And other places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

MARKET-STREET, a chapelry, in the parishes of CADDINGTON, FLAMSTEAD, and STUDHAM, partly in the hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, and partly in that of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Luton. The ancient name of Markgate, or Mark-gate, of which the present is a corruption, appears to have been derived from Merk, a boundary, and Yate, or Gate; this place having formerly been the end of the inclosed country, where it is supposed there was a gate on the high road or Watling-street. On a hill in the vicinity, where is now an ancient mansion, a nunnery of the Benedictine order, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, formerly stood; it was founded about 1145, principally by Geoffrey, Abbot of St. Alban's, on land given by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £143. 13. 8. The village is on the road from London to Birmingham, and consists of one long street: the manufacture of hats and bonnets of straw-plat is somewhat considerable; and a fair is held about Michaelmas. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £227; patron, D. Goodson Adey, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is situated in Cell, or Priory Park, and was erected about a century since, in lieu of one at the manor-house, which had been burnt down. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; and a national school.

MARKET-STREET, a township, in the parish of WYMONDHAM, incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK; containing 1324 inhabitants.

MARKET-WESTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of BLACKBURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (S.) from East Harling; containing 330 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Bury, through Buckenham, to Norwich; the scenery is varied, and the seat of the Thruston family is within the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Rev. H. T. Wilkinson, incumbent: the tithes have been commuted for £324. 19. 1., and there are 16 acres of glebe. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and has a porch of earlier date; it was thoroughly repaired in 1838. A rectory-house was built in 1837.

MARKFIELD (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of MARKET-BOSWORTH, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Leicester; containing 1203 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 8.; net income, £441; patron, Marquess of Hastings. The church has been enlarged, and 85 free sittings have been provided. Land producing £10 per annum was bequeathed to the poor by Mrs. Jane Avery, in 1723.

MARKHAM, EAST (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, South Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Tuxford; containing 771 inhabitants. The parish, consisting of 2700 acres, formerly contained a wide tract of moorland, which was inclosed in 1811; the soil is generally a fertile clay. The village, situated on an acclivity, is large and well built. The living is a vicarage, with the rectory of West Drayton annexed, valued in the king's books at £11. 18. $11\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £334; patron and impropiator, Duke of Newcastle: the tithes were commuted for land in 1810. The church is a large structure, with a lofty embattled tower, and contains several ancient monuments to the Markham, Cressy, and other families. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and schools are supported by charity.

MARKHAM, WEST, or MARKHAM-CLINTON (All Saints), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, South Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Tuxford; containing, with the hamlet of Milton, 191 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1067 acres. The living is a vicarage, with that of Bevercoates united, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 1.; net income, £254; patron and impropiator, Duke of Newcastle: the tithes were commuted for land in 1808. A church, erected at the expense of his Grace, to supersede the old edifice, now in a state of decay, and also as a place of sepulture for the family, was consecrated on the 3rd of January, 1834, and is a handsome structure of the Grecian-Doric order, of Roche-Abbey stone, in a picturesque situation. Sir John Markham, chief justice of the king's bench in the reign of Edward IV., was born here.

MARKINGFIELD, an extra-parochial place, in the liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Ripon; containing 27 inhabitants, and comprising 650 acres. The old Hall, a large mansion, formerly encompassed by a moat, was long the seat of the knightly family of Markingfield, of whom Sir Ninian was at the battle of Flodden, in 1513. The estate was forfeited to the crown by the rebellion of Thomas Markingfield, in 1569, and was granted to the Chancellor Egerton.

MARKINGTON, with WALLERTHWAITHE, a township, in the parish and liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ripon; containing 510 inhabitants. The township comprises about 3000 acres of land, including that part of the pleasure-grounds of Studley Park in which stand the splendid ruins of Fountains Abbey, and the mansion of Fountains Hall. The village is situated west of the road from Ripon to Ripley. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school, built in 1795, has a small endowment.

MARKSBURY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of KEYNSHAM, E. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Pensford; containing, with the hamlet of Houndstreet, 328 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1420 acres, principally pasture; the soil is generally a stone brash, but black and blue marl are found, and successfully applied to the improvement of the land; the surface is hilly, and the lower grounds are watered by several rivulets. Coal is obtained. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 4. 2.; net income, £240; patron, General Popham, to whom a small portion of the tithes belongs. A national school is supported by subscription. There are slight remains of an ancient chapel on Wingsbury Hill; and a monastery formerly existed, the site of which is now occupied by a private mansion.

MARKSHALL (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of WITHAM, Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (N.) from Kelvedon; containing 33 inhabitants. This parish, originally called Mercheshald, comprises by admeasurement 806 acres, of which about 200 are arable, 420 pasture, and 180 woodland; the situation is low, and the soil generally a strong loam, resting on a substratum of clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14, and in the gift of W. Honeywood, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £176, and the glebe comprises 32 acres. The church is a modern brick edifice, of octangular form, erected by General Honeywood, and containing a finely-executed monument to Mrs. Mary Waters Honeywood, who died aged 93, leaving 367 immediate descendants.

MARKS-TEY, ESSEX.—See TEY, MARKS.

MARLAND, PETER'S (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Black Torrington and Shebbear, and N. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Torrington; containing 351 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Ven. Archdeacon Moore; the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £195.

MARLBOROUGH, a borough and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of SELKLEY, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of WILTS, 27 miles (N. by E.) from Salisbury, and 75 (W. by S.) from London; containing 3391 inhabitants.

The name, anciently written Marleberg, or Marlbridge, is supposed to be derived from the marl, or chalk, hills by which the town is surrounded. Camden supposes this to have been the Cunetio of Antoninus, but more recent researches induced the late Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart., to place that station at Folly Farm, about a mile and a half eastward, where that celebrated antiquary discovered a tessellated pavement, and other relics of a Roman settlement. At the time of the Norman survey, Marlborough had a church, and was held in royal demesne, soon after which period a castle was erected, which seems to have been the cause of the subsequent enlargement of the town. In the time of Richard I., and during his imprisonment in Austria, his brother John took possession of this fortress; but Richard, on his return from captivity, seized it, with all the other possessions belonging to his brother, and on their reconciliation he still retained the castle of Marlborough in his own hands. During the subsequent reign, King John occasionally kept his court here; and in the civil war of this period, Marlborough was held alternately by the king and the barons: it seems, indeed, to have been the occasional residence of the sovereign till the time of Henry VII., and to have formed part of the dowries of several queens. There was also a royal residence at Ogbourne, about a mile and a half from the town. The assizes were held here from the time of Henry III. to that of Charles I.; and in the 52nd of Henry III. a parliament was assembled here which enacted the laws relative to the police of the kingdom, and to the administration of justice, commonly called the "Statutes of Marlebridge." The castle and borough were granted by Henry VIII. to Edward, Duke of Somerset, and became forfeited to the crown on the attainder of that nobleman, in the reign of Edward VI., but were subsequently restored to the Seymour family, and have descended, by intermarriage, to the Marquess of Ailesbury. Even in Camden's time a few fragments only of the castle were remaining. A large house which occupies its site, and is now used for the purposes of the college of Marlborough, is said to have been commenced by Francis, first Lord Seymour, of Trowbridge, and to have been improved by the first Duke of Somerset of the Seymour family, and subsequently by the Earl of Hertford, in the early part of the eighteenth century. The old keep has been converted into a spiral walk, in the grotto of which Mrs. Rowe wrote the most celebrated of her works, Friendship in Death; and here, also, Thomson is said to have composed a great part of his Seasons, when on a visit to the Earl of Hertford, one of the most distinguished patrons of literature of that age. civil war between Charles I. and the parliament, the latter had a garrison here under the Earl of Essex; but the royal army, commanded by Lieut.-General Wilmot, marching hither from Oxford, in Dec. 1642, captured above 1000 prisoners, besides large stores of arms and ammunition, with all which they returned in safety to that city.

The town is delightfully situated on the banks of the Kennett, up the northern verge of the forest of Savernake, and on the north of it are the open downs; it consists principally of one long street, running from east to west, which is paved, and lighted with gas. The older houses are constructed of wood, and ornamented in front with curious carved work; the more modern are of stone and brick. On the north side of the chief street is a piazza projecting in front of the houses, serving for a promenade in wet weather; and at its eastern extremity is a market-house, erected on the site of a former one, by the corporation, in 1790. The inhabitants are well supplied with water. The trade is mainly in corn, coal, malt, bacon, and butter and cheese, of which vast quantities are sent every week to London; and some advantages arise from the situation of the town on a great thoroughfare. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, of which the former is only for vegetables, and the latter, which is considerable, has long been celebrated for its extensive supply of grain, cheese, butchers' meat, &c. Fairs are held on July 11th, for horses and wool; Aug. 22nd, for lambs, horses, and cows; and Nov. 23rd, for sheep, horses, and cows. Marlborough, which is a borough by prescription, received its first existing charter from King John, in 1205, and others from Henry III., in the 13th and 30th years of his reign, which were confirmed by several succeeding kings. In 1577, Queen Elizabeth bestowed a charter, by which the town was governed until 1836, when the corporation was made to consist of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors; the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, the county magistrates having concurrent jurisdiction. The privilege of sending members to parliament has been exercised ever since the 23rd of Edward I.: the right of election was, by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, extended to the £10 householders of the old borough (containing 211 acres) and the parish of Presbute, which together constitute the new borough, and comprise 3983 acres: the mayor is returning officer. Courts leet are held by the corporation; and the King's court, for the recovery of debts to any amount, takes place every three weeks, under the charter of John. The county bridewell and house of correction was erected in 1787.

Marlborough comprises the parishes of St. Mary the Virgin, containing 1871 inhabitants, and St. Peter and St. Paul, containing 1520, the whole divided into five wards. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 9. 4.; net income, £100; patron and appropriator, Dean of Salisbury. The church, a neat edifice of stone, with an ancient tower, beneath which is a Norman doorway, sustained considerable damage during the civil war, in 1641; but it is now undergoing extensive repairs, and will be repewed and beautified. The living of the parish of St. Peter and St. Paul is a discharged rectory, valued at £12; net income, £130; patron and impropiator, Bishop of Salisbury. The church, which stands at the western extremity of the main street, has a lofty square tower with battlements and pinnacles. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The free grammar school was founded, and endowed with the revenue of the dissolved hospital of St. John, by grant of Edward VI.; the income is about £180 per annum, and the scholars share, alternately with those of the free schools of Manchester and Hereford, in four of sixteen exhibitions at Brasenose College, Oxford, and sixteen scholarships at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Sarah, Duchess of Somerset, in 1679. Marlborough College, or school, for the education of the sons of the clergy and others, was formally opened in August, 1843, by the bishop of the diocese, in the presence of the Marquess of Ailesbury, the mayor and corporation, and several distinguished members of the school-council: the design is to provide the clergy of the country with a means of classical instruction for their children at a more moderate rate than is charged in the great public schools. The number of pupils at present is limited to 200, of whom two-thirds are sons of clergymen, and one-third sons of laymen; but it is the intention of the council to admit 500 pupils so soon as their funds enable them to enlarge their plan. The fine mansion of the former dukes of Somerset, known of late years as the Castle hotel, has, together with extensive new buildings, been fitted up for the establishment. A national school is supported by subscription. The poor law union comprises fourteen parishes or places, containing a population of 9234. The monastic institutions here were, a Gilbertine priory, dedicated to St. Margaret, and founded in the reign of John, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was £38. 19. 2.; a convent of White friars, established in 1316, by the merchants of the town; St. John's Hospital, founded in the reign of Henry II.; and St. Thomas', in that of Henry III., and annexed to the priory of St. Margaret in the reign of Richard II. A chapel and other portions of the priory were standing a few years since. Among the distinguished natives of the town the following may be specified: Henry, of Marlborough, an English historian of the fourteenth century; Sir Michael Foster, an eminent lawyer, and one of the judges of the court of king's bench, born in 1689; Walter Harte, poet and historian, who died in 1773; Dr. Henry Sacheverell, of political celebrity, born in 1672, during the incumbency of his father, in the parish of St. Peter and St. Paul; and John Hughes, a poet, and one of the writers in the Spectator, born in 1677. Marlborough confers the title of Duke on the family of Spencer-Churchill.

MARLCLIFF, a hamlet, in the parish of BIDFORD, union of ALCESTER, Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5 miles (S.) from Alcester; containing 159 inhabitants.

MARLDON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of TOTNES, hundred of HAYTOR, Paington and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (W.) from Torquay; containing 470 inhabitants. It comprises 2158a. 2r., of which 789 acres are arable, 1097 meadow and pasture, and 193 woodland; the surface is undulated, and the soil of the long and well-wooded vale in which the district is situated, is rich and fertile. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Paington: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £215, and the vicarial for £235. The church is a handsome edifice, of which the interior has lately been fitted up with new and substantial pews. A school is partly supported by an individual. In the village of Compton are considerable ruins of an ancient and extensive castellated mansion, occupied by the family of Gilbert, of whom Sir Humphry Gilbert the great circumnavigator, was brother, by his mother's side, to Sir Walter Raleigh, who accompanied him in some of his voyages.

MARLESFORD (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of PLOMESGATE, hundred of LOES, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Wickham-Market; containing 424 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of A. Arcedeckne, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £352, and there are 30 acres of glebe. A school is chiefly supported by the rector.

MARLINGFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Norwich; containing 195 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south and west by a stream tributary to the Yare, and comprises 674a. 3r. 38p., of which 459 acres are arable, 136 pasture and meadow, 22 woodland, and 44 common. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Rev. T. Greene: the tithes have been commuted for £151. 2., and the glebe comprises about 36 acres, with a small parsonage-house. The church is in the early and later English styles, with a rich Norman doorway on the south, and a square embattled tower. There is a national school.

MARLOW, a township, in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, union of LUDLOW, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD; containing 66 inhabitants.

MARLOW, GREAT (All Saints), a borough, market-town, and parish, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, $35\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Buckingham, and 31 (W. by N.) from London; containing 4480 inhabitants. The ancient name of this place was Merlaw, supposed to be derived from the Saxon word Mere, a marsh, and Law, or Low, a hill. The town, situated on the bank of the Thames, consists of two principal streets, which cross in the market-place; and the surrounding scenery is replete with variety and beauty. There is a good news-room. The river is crossed by an iron suspension-bridge, lately erected at an expense of £20,000, including the approaches, of which sum the county of Bucks paid two-thirds, and that of Berks one-third; it is a handsome structure, and a great ornament to the town. Races are held in August. There are two paper-mills, and some copper-works at Temple, which, with the manufacture of baby-linen, caps, lace, and covered wire, and rope-making, furnish considerable employment to the labouring class: there is likewise a good trade in corn, timber, and malt. The market is held on Saturday, and the market-house is a spacious building: fairs take place on May 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, for horses and cattle, and October 29th, for cheese, butter, and hops. The town first sent representatives to parliament in the 28th of Edward I., and continued so to do till the 2nd of Edward II., when the privilege ceased for upwards of 400 years, but was restored upon petition to the house of commons in the 21st of James I., and has since been exercised without intermission. The borough includes also the parishes of Little Marlow and Medmenham, in the county of Buckingham, and Bisham, in Berks; the high constable is returning officer. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £172; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The new church, erected in 1835, at an expense of £10,000, is an elegant structure in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty spire. A church has also been built at Lane-End, principally at the expense of Mr. Elwes. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. In 1628, Sir William Borlace bequeathed estates, now producing £118. 13. per annum, for purposes of instruction, and for the maintenance of a workhouse or house of correction. A national school is supported by subscription. In the 7th of James I., John Brinkhurst devised almshouses for six widows, who have an income of £79. 9.; and about £140, arising from bequests by William Lofton, Esq., and others, are annually distributed to the poor.

MARLOW, LITTLE (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the borough of GREAT MARLOW, union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. N. E.) from Great Marlow; containing 927 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 5. 10.; net income, £155; patron, S. Birch, Esq.; impropiator, Sir G. Nugent, Bart. The church is principally in the later English style. A girls' school is supported by Mrs. Piggott. Here was a small convent of Benedictine nuns, founded in honour of the Virgin Mary, by Geoffrey, Lord Spencer, before the reign of John, and the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was estimated at £37. 6. 11.

MARLSTON, a tything, in the parish of BUCKLEBURY, union of BRADFIELD, hundred of READING, county of BERKS, 7 miles (E. N. E.) from Newbury; containing 66 inhabitants. A rent-charge of £225 has been awarded as a commutation for the vicarial tithes, and there is a glebe of about 7 acres. Here is a chapel, an ancient building, erected by Sir Jeffrey Martell, lord of the manor.

MARLSTON, with LEACH, a township, in the parish of ST. MARY, CHESTER, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Chester; containing 148 inhabitants.

MARNHAM (St. Wilfrid), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, N. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Tuxford; containing, with the township of Grassthorpe, 350 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the west bank of the Trent, and comprises by measurement 2452 acres: the village is near the river, over which is a ferry, and a cattle-fair is held in it on the 12th of September. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 19. 2.; net income, £298; patron and impropiator, Earl Brownlow.

MARNHULL (St. Gregory), a parish, in the union and hundred of STURMINSTER-NEWTON-CASTLE, Sturminster division of DORSET, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Shaftesbury; containing 1464 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the river Stour, and comprises 3751 acres, of which about one-third is arable, and the remainder pasture, with 146 acres of common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £31. 6. 10½, and in the gift of the Rev. H. J. Place: the tithes have been commuted for £1024, and the glebe comprises 22 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Roman Catholics.

MARPLE, a chapelry, in the parish and union of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 4¾ miles (E. S. E.) from Stockport; containing 3462 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises by measurement 3000 acres, and is situated on the river Goyt, which separates the counties of Chester and Derby. The village, seated near the Peak Forest and Macclesfield canals, and on the road from London to Manchester, through Buxton, was anciently called Murpull, in allusion to an expansion of the waters of the stream in the vale below. The scenery is remarkably picturesque: the banks of the river, which from the highest points may be seen for several miles, are rocky, precipitous, and well-wooded; and the view from the churchyard includes the mountains of the Peak on one side, and the Welsh hills on the other. The cotton manufacture is carried on to a very great extent, and there are three large mills in operation, affording employment to 1500 persons; many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of hats, and there are extensive quarries of good stone for building. The living is a perpetual curacy, net income, £143; patron, Rector of Stockport: the glebe comprises 24 acres. The chapel, dedicated to All Saints, was rebuilt in 1812, and is a neat edifice, capable of accommodating 1000 persons. Samuel Oldnow, Esq., who projected the Peak Forest canal, and was a great benefactor to the neighbourhood, was interred here. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. This is the birthplace of John Bradshaw, president of the court that condemned Charles I.; he bequeathed £700 for a free school at Marple, but the Restoration prevented his bequest becoming available. A free school was established by Henry Bardsley, in 1762, to the support of which several small legacies have been bequeathed; and a national school is maintained by subscription, for the children of the poor.

MARR (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of DONCASTER, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Doncaster; containing 206 inhabitants. This place was formerly part of the parish of Adwick, and its church is of comparatively modern foundation. It was once the residence of the family of Metham, of whose spacious and handsome mansion considerable remains existed some years since; and it was afterwards occasionally the residence of members of the house of Granville, and especially of George Granville, the poet, subsequently Lord Lansdowne. The parish comprises about 2140 acres, held chiefly by the trustees of the late Peter I. Thellusson, Esq. The village is pleasantly situated on the road from Doncaster to Barnsley. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £128; patrons and impropiators, the late Mr. Thellusson's Trustees. The church is principally in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a small spire. A school is partly supported by a private individual.

MARRICK (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 7½ miles (W. S. W.) from Richmond; containing, with the hamlet of Hurst, 648 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 6000 acres, including high moorland extending from three to six miles north of the village, which is pleasantly situated on the northern acclivities of Swaledale, and south of the road from Richmond to Reeth. At Hurst are extensive lead-mines and smelt-works, the former supposed to be the oldest in the kingdom. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £98; patron and impropiator, F. Morley, Esq., by whom schools are partly supported. The church occupies part of the site of a Benedictine nunnery founded in honour of the Blessed Virgin, by Roger de Asc, about the close of the reign of Stephen, and which at the Dissolution had a revenue of £64. 16. 9. There is a place of worship for dissenters at Hurst; also a school.

MARRINGTON, a township, in the parish and hundred of CHIRBURY, S. division of SALOP; containing 92 inhabitants.

MARRISH, EAST and WEST, a township, in the parish, union, and lythe of PICKERING, N. riding of YORK, 3¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Pickering; containing 243 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1500 acres of low marsh land, of a rich alluvial soil, the property of various persons. The inhabitants mostly reside on the north bank of the river Rye, near Howe-Bridge.

MARSDEN, a chapelry, partly in the parish of HUDDERSFIELD, but chiefly in that of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Huddersfield; containing 2403 inhabitants. This chapelry is situated on the river Colne, and comprises about 8670 acres, of which 4050 are in the parish of Huddersfield; the surface is diversified with hill and dale, and the scenery generally characterised by a boldness of aspect, to which the lofty hills of Saddleworth, immediately adjoining, materially contribute. The village, which is extensive, is on the road from Huddersfield to Manchester, at the confluence of the rivers Colne and Wessenden, and near the base of Pule and Standedge. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of woollen-cloth, which is carried on to a considerable extent in mills of which the machinery is put in motion by numerous copious and rapid streams descending from the hills; there are also factories for spinning cotton and one for twisting silk, an iron-foundry, and a steam-engine manufactory of great celebrity. The Manchester and Huddersfield canal at this place enters a tunnel under the Standedge mountain, more than three miles in length, opening into the hilly district of Saddleworth, and constructed under the superintendence of Brindley; and near the mouth of the tunnel is a reservoir belonging to the canal, which, from its picturesque beauty, has obtained the appellation of the Windermere of Marsden. The chapel, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, was erected at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1758, on the site of a former building which had become dilapidated; it is a neat structure in the Norman style, and contains about 650 sittings. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Almondbury, endowed by Edward IV., in 1462, with four marks, payable out of the manor, which grant was confirmed by Queen Elizabeth, and is still received by the minister; net income, £150. Here are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and a parochial and a national school, partly supported by subscription. There are some remains of the ancient manor-house, at Highgate.

MARSDEN, GREAT, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of BURNLEY, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Burnley; containing 4987 inhabitants.

MARSDEN, LITTLE, a chapelry, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of BURNLEY, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Burnley; containing 3171 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises by measurement 1200 acres, the whole of which is in pasture. The chapel was rebuilt about the year 1810, and has been since enlarged: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patron, Vicar of Whalley.

MARSH-BENHAM, a tything, in the parish of SPEEN, union of NEWBURY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS; containing 316 inhabitants.

MARSH-CHAPEL (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Louth; containing 503 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3067 acres, of which 127 are common land or marsh: the canal, which connects the town of Louth with the river Humber, forms one of the boundaries. The surface is flat, and the scenery of uninteresting character. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £76; impropiators, the Representatives of the late J. G. Floyer, Esq. The church is a handsome edifice, consisting of a nave, aisles, chancel, and chantry chapel, with a tower, and has been much improved of late by the incumbent and the family of Floyer. There is a national school, supported by subscription; and the interest of various bequests is annually distributed among the poor.

MARSH-GIBBON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Bicester; containing 863 inhabitants. The parish is situated upon the eastern border of Oxfordshire, and comprises 2821 acres, of which 560 are common or waste: there are some good stone quarries. An inclosure act was passed in 1841. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £500, and the glebe comprises 127 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school has been established. Near the manor-house are some slight vestiges of earthworks, said to have been thrown up by the parliamentarians, in their advance to this place in the year 1645.

MARSHALL, RED.—See REDMARSHALL.

MARSHAM (All Saints), a parish, in the union of AYLHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (S.) from Aylham; containing 698 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1819a. 1r. 28p., of which 1230 acres are arable, 154 meadow and pasture, and 187 heath and waste, which were inclosed in 1801, and allotted to the poor. The manufacture of worsted and bombasin is carried on. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 9., and in the gift of the Earl of Lichfield: the tithes have been commuted for £30, payable to the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, and £330 to the rector; the glebe comprises 65 acres. The church is ancient, in the early and later English styles, with a low square tower; the nave is separated from the chancel by a carved oak screen, and the font is richly sculptured. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists. The poor receive £16. 5., the rent of land purchased with £100 bequeathed by Thomas Bulwer, Esq., and subsequent donations.

MARSHFIELD (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Upper division of the hundred of THORNBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Bristol, and 102 (W. by S.) from London; containing, with the hamlets of Becks, Rocks, and Weston Town, 1674 inhabitants. The town consists mainly of a single street, nearly a mile in length: the trade is principally in malt, of which a great part is the produce of the vicinity. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on May 24th and Oct. 24th, the former chiefly for horned-cattle, and the latter for sheep, horses, and cheese. A bailiff is annually elected at the manorial court, and is assisted by a serjeant-at-mace. The parish comprises 5845 acres, of which 72 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £29. 4. 9.; patrons and impropiators, Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £680, with 118 acres of glebe; and the vicarial for £321. 14., with a glebe of 15 acres. The church is a handsome and spacious edifice, in the later English style, with a fine square tower at the west end. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. A free school was founded about 1722, by John Harrington, Esq., and was endowed with lands in 1731, by Dionysia Long: the income is £62. Almshouses for eight persons were endowed by Nicholas Crispe, in 1625; and there are benefactions for other charitable purposes. In the parish are some barrows and intrenchments, supposed to have been raised about 561, when the battle of Dirham took place in the neighbourhood; and Leland mentions the existence of a nunnery, of which, however, there are no vestiges.

MARSHFIELD, a parish, in the union and division of NEWPORT, hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (S. W.) from Newport; containing 503 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 2. 6.; patrons and impropiators, Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The great tithes have been commuted for £175, and the vicarial for £48; there is a glebe-house, and the vicar's glebe contains 27 acres. The church is a large and handsome structure, in the later English style.

MARSHWOOD, a chapelry, in the parish and hundred of WHITCHURCH-CANONICORUM, union of BEAMINSTER, Bridport division of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Beaminster; containing 554 inhabitants. This place, which takes its name from the marshy woody vale in which it is situated, was anciently an honour, the only one in the county, and the head of a barony. The living is annexed, with those of Chideock and Stanton St. Gabriel, to the vicarage of Whitchurch-Canonicorum. The church, which fell down in 1662, has only been recently rebuilt. A school is partly supported by Mrs. Ames, for the instruction of the children of the lower classes.

MARSK (St. CUTHBERT), a parish, in the union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Richmond; containing, with the township of Feldom and the hamlet of Skelton, 274 inhabitants. The lordship of Marsk was bestowed upon the Hutton family in the 12th century, by Conan, Earl of Richmond, whose original grant is still preserved in the Hall. The parish comprises by computation 5220 acres. The village is small, and picturesquely seated on the north side of Swaledale, upon the road from Richmond to Reeth; about a mile and half north of it, on the high moors, is the hamlet of Feldom, and half a mile westward that of Skelton. Marsk Hall and Clints Hall are beautifully situated in fine lawns and pleasure-grounds, and near the former is an obelisk 60 feet in height, which covers the remains of Captain Matthew Hutton, who died in 1813. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 6. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of J. Hutton, Esq., with a net income of £179. A school, endowed with about £20 per annum, is conducted on the national system.

MARSK, in CLEVELAND (St. GERMAIN), a parish, in the union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Marsk and part of Redcar, 1177 inhabitants, of whom 503 are in the township, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Guisborough. The manor was one of the lordships granted by the Conqueror to Robert de Brus, lord of Skelton, whose family held it for some time; and it was afterwards possessed by the Fauconbergs, since which the lands have belonged to various families, including those of Neville, Lowther, and Dundas. The parish, which extends along the sea-coast, and is divided by the Saltburn beck from the parish of Skelton, comprises about 3500 acres; the soil of a portion is of a fine sandy kind; the other parts are more inclined to a strong fertile clay, suitable to the growth of wheat. The village is of considerable extent, and contains some neat houses; and near its centre is Marsk Hall, built by Sir William Pennyman, Bart., in the style that prevailed in the time of Charles I. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Earl of Zetland, with a net income of £91; appropriator, Archbishop of York. The church, founded before the Norman Conquest, and rebuilt in 1821, stands near the edge of the cliff, its spire serving as an excellent landmark. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school, for which a house was built by the Earl of Zetland, is chiefly supported by his lordship.

MARSTON, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of NORTHWICH, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Northwich; containing 479 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the township.

MARSTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWARK, wapentake of LOVEDEN, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Grantham; containing 434 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Hougham. Dame Margaret Thorold, in 1718, gave land, the income to be applied to instruction.

MARSTON (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of BRACKLEY, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (E.) from Ban- bury; containing 540 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1865a. 28p., and several of the tributaries of the river Ouse have their rise in it. The female part of the population is employed in making pillow-lace. There are some quarries of stone, which is used for building and for repairing the roads. The living is a vicarage, with that of Warkworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £316; patrons and improprators, the family of Blencowe. The tithes were commuted for land in 1759; the glebe comprises 190 acres. The church contains 77 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £100 in aid of the expense. Two schools are partly supported by charity.

MARSTON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of HEADINGTON, hundred of BULLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Oxford; containing 396 inhabitants. In the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the treaty for the surrender of Oxford to the parliamentarians, was negotiated here, in the ancient mansion-house of the family of Croke, now converted into a farm-house. The parish comprises 1177 acres, of which 220 are arable, 950 pasture, and 7 woodland; the meadows on the banks of the river Cherwell are luxuriantly rich. The living is a discharged vicarage; net income, £195; patron, incumbent, and improprator, Rev. T. H. Whorwood.

MARSTON, a chapelry, in the parish of St. MARY, STAFFORD, union of STAFFORD, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Stafford; containing 178 inhabitants. The district comprises about 1500 acres of land, of which the soil is a rich loam; a considerable extent of waste was inclosed in 1800, when 125 acres were given to the parishioners in lieu of their right of common. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £41; patron, Rector of St. Mary's, Stafford. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £242, payable to the trustees of the Stafford charities, and the small tithes for £100. The chapel is a neat edifice of stone, with a campanile turret.

MARSTON, a quarter, in the parish of CHURCH-BICKENHILL, union of MERIDEN, Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Coleshill; containing 310 inhabitants.

MARSTON, a hamlet, in the parish of WOLSTAN, union of RUGBY, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Coventry; containing 486 inhabitants.

MARSTON, a chapelry, in the parish of YARDLEY, union of SOLIHULL, Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, though locally in the Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Northfield and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Birmingham. The living is a donative; net income, £120; patrons and improprators, certain Trustees. The chapel was erected in 1704, by Job Marston, Esq.

MARSTON-BIGOTT (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Frome; containing 534 inhabitants. This place derives the affix to its name from the Bigott family, to whom the manor for several centuries belonged, and the site of whose ancient mansion is still marked by the moat. The parish comprises about 2000 acres of land, watered by two small rivulets; the scenery is richly diversified. A line of hills extends through the parish from east to west, on each side of which are woods of luxuriant growth; and Marston House, the seat of the Earl of Cork and Orrery, is beautifully situated, overlooking a fertile valley. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 19. 9½, and in the gift of the earl: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises 46 acres. The church was taken down, and rebuilt on another site, by the father of the present earl. A room at Gaer Hill, formerly used as a dissenters' meeting-house, has been converted into a chapel; and schools are partly supported by the earl and countess.

MARSTON, BROAD, a hamlet, in the parish of PEBWORTH, union of EVESHAM, Upper division of the hundred of KIFTGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 289 inhabitants.

W. by S.) from Kington; containing 313 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1650 acres, chiefly arable; the soil is clayey, and the surface undulated, rising in some parts into considerable hills. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 4.; net income, £88; patrons and impropiators, Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church is an ancient structure, principally in the Norman style. Upon an artificial mound on the green is a decayed elm of large dimensions, capable of containing twelve persons, and formed by nature into the appearance of a grotto.

MARSTON-FLEET (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Aylesbury; containing 38 inhabitants. It is beautifully situated in the vale of Aylesbury, and comprises by measurement 918 acres, of which 102 are arable, and the remainder pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 8½; net income, £176; patron, S. P. Humphreys, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style.

MARSTON-JABBETT, a hamlet, in the parish of BULKINGTON, union of NUNEATON, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 3¼ miles (S. by E.) from Nuneaton; containing 93 inhabitants.

MARSTON, LEA.—See LEA-MARSTON.

MARSTON, LONG, a chapelry, in the parish of TRING, union of BERKHAMPTSTEAD, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 3½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Tring; containing 269 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to All Saints. The extra-parochial place of Long-Marston, with Asthorpe, adjoins this chapelry, but is in the parish of Marsworth, county of Buckingham; it contains 12 inhabitants.

MARSTON, LONG (All Saints), a parish, in the W. division of AINSTY wapentake, W. riding of YORK, 7½ miles (W.) from York; containing, with the townships of Angram and Hutton-Wandesley, 649 inhabitants, of whom 446 are in the township of Long Marston. This place is memorable as the scene of a most sanguinary battle which occurred on the 2nd of July, 1644, upon Marston Moor, between the royalists, commanded by Prince Rupert, and the parliamentarians under Cromwell, and which, after an obstinate and protracted conflict and considerable slaughter on both sides, terminated in the total defeat of the Royal army, and the ultimate abandonment of York to the republican forces, after the retreat of Rupert into Lancashire. The parish comprises 4260 acres, of which 2540 are in the township of Long Marston; the surface is generally flat, and the soil a stiff clay, alternated with portions of lighter quality and greater fertility; the lands are principally arable, and the system of cultivation is improved. The village, which is on the road to Wetherby, consists chiefly of irregularly built and scattered houses, and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 3. 9.; net income, £865; patron, Lord Wenlock: the tithes were commuted for land in 1766. The church is an ancient structure in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, and was repaired and repewed in 1810. A school is partly supported by a bequest of £10 per annum, paid by Fontayne Wilson, Esq., and partly by subscription.

MARSTON MAGNA (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SHERBOURNE, hundred of HORETHORNE, E. division of SOMERSET, 5¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Yeovil; containing 357 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £6. 10. 10., and in the gift of the Rev. John Williams: the tithes have been commuted for £300, and the glebe comprises 87 acres. The church is a neat stone structure, with a strong tower, crowned by an embattled pediment and pinnacles. Sir John St. Barbe, in 1736, gave to the vicar the rectory, parsonage-house, and lands, on condition that he should educate, or cause to be educated, ten boys. On opening a pit in 1788, near the margin of a brook, some fine specimens of a calcareous blue stone, almost filled with cornua ammonis, overspread with white pearl, were discovered, and raised in masses sufficiently large to form slabs which took a beautiful polish. In the same field irregular heaps of mundic, with large metalliferous cornua ammonis, were also found; and the quarries on the hills, from one of which the brook takes its rise, abound in ammonites, nautili, belemnites, &c.

MARSTON-MAISEY (St. James), a parish, in the union of CIRENCESTER, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Cricklade and N. divisions of WILTS, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Cricklade; containing 245 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £57; patron, Rector of Maisey-Hampton: the tithes have been commuted for £250. A school is partly supported by endowment; and several small legacies have been bequeathed at various times for the benefit of the poor.

MARSTON-MONTGOMERY (St. Giles), a parish, in the hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 6¼ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ashbourn; containing 477 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Cubley: the tithes have been commuted for £140. A school is supported by subscription.

MARSTON-MORETAINE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of AMPHILL, hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (N. W.) from Amptill; containing 1147 inhabitants, and comprising 4171a. 2r. 21p. The females are employed in lace-making by hand, and in platting straw. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £33. 17. 3½, and in the gift of St. John's College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £1120, and the glebe comprises 68 acres. The church is a very elegant structure, in the later English style, and contains some curious brasses; the tower, which is of earlier date, and of which the walls are six feet in thickness, is detached. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MARSTON, NORTH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WINSLOW, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Winslow; containing 619 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1904a. 1r. 16p.; the soil is a dark loam, resting on a strong clay, and the surface is pleasingly undulated. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy; net income, £94; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The church is a neat structure, containing three stone stalls and a piscina; the chancel was built by the offerings of those who frequented a chalybeate spring here, once in high repute.

MARSTON, POTTER'S, a hamlet, in the parish of BARWELL, union of BLABY, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Hinckley; containing 11 inhabitants. It comprises 1200 acres, in general very good land, and about equally divided between arable and pasture.

MARSTON, PRIORS' (St. Leonard), a parish, in the union of SOUTHAM, Burton-Dassett division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Southam; containing 701 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by a portion of Northamptonshire, and comprises by measurement 3386 acres: there are some quarries of stone, but of inferior quality, and used only for repairing the roads. The Oxford canal passes through a small part of the parish, and on its bank is a spacious wharf. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed, with that of Lower Shuckburgh, to the vicarage of Priors'-Hardwick; the glebe comprises 103 acres. James West, in 1705, and Josiah Kay, in 1711, bequeathed property now producing £40 a year, for teaching children.

MARSTON-SICCA (St. James), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, Upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 6½ miles (N.) from Chipping-Campden; containing 337 inhabitants. The parish, which derives its affix from the scarcity of water in the immediate neighbourhood, comprises 1300 acres, and the village is a long line of houses irregularly built. Charles II. is said to have taken refuge here after the battle of Worcester, and for the purpose of concealment turned a jack at the kitchen-fire, disguising himself as a domestic of the house. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 10.; and in the gift of the Rev. R. G. Jeston: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment, under an act of inclosure, in 1773, and have recently been commuted for a rent-charge of £420; the glebe comprises 29 acres. The church is an ancient structure. A school was endowed in 1643, by John Cooper, Esq., with an estate now producing upwards of £100 per annum.

MARSTON, SOUTH, a chapelry, in the parish of HIGHWORTH, union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Highworth; containing 442 inhabitants. Here is a neat chapel; and a school is supported by subscription. The Great Western railway passes through the chapelry.

MARSTON-STANNETT, a chapelry, in the parish of PENCOMBE, union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 6½ miles (W. by N.) from Bromyard; containing 27 inhabitants. The chapel was erected by the incumbents of this and the adjoining parishes, for the accommodation of those at a distance from their churches. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £75; patron, the Rector of Pencombe.

MARSTON-TRUSSEL (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 3¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Harborough; containing, with Thorpe-Lubbenham, extra-parochial, 247 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1300 acres, and is situated on the borders of Leicestershire, a portion of which bounds it on the north-west. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 2. 11.; net income, £429, arising from land; patron, the Rev. William Law: the glebe comprises 314 acres, with a house. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower.

MARSTON-UPON-DOVE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of APPLE-TREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Burton; containing, with the townships of Hatton, Hilton, and Hoon, 1177 inhabitants, of whom 85 are in the township of Marston. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 15. 2½; net income, £225; patron and impropriator, Duke of Devonshire: the tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1780 and 1789. The church is partly in the early and partly in the decorated English style.

MARSTOW (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (S. W.) from Ross; containing 139 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on its south-eastern extremity by the river Wye, and intersected by the small river Garran, and by the road from Ross to Monmouth, comprises according to admeasurement 810 acres: red sandstone is quarried for building, and for the roads. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Pencoyd united; patron, Vicar of Sellack; impropriator of Marstow, the Rev. W. Coke; appropriators of Pencoyd, Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The tithes have been commuted for £202. 10.; the glebe comprises about half an acre. The church is an ancient structure: the churchyard is frequently inundated. There is a place of worship for dissenters; and a school is partly supported by the incumbent.

MARSWORTH (All Saints), a parish, in the union of BERKHAMSTEAD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (N.) from Tring; containing 472 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1200 acres, of which about 1050 are arable, and 150 pasture: the Grand Junction canal passes through it, and the London and Birmingham railway within a mile of the church. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 7.; net income, £136; patrons and impropiators, Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1809. The church has an appearance of considerable antiquity; in the windows are some fragments of stained glass, and parts of the floor are of Roman brick. The Roman Ikeneld-street bounds the parish on the south-east, and in forming the Junction canal numerous swords, urns, coins, and other relics of Roman antiquity were discovered.

MARTALL, with LITTLE WARFORD, a township, in the parish of ROSTHERN, union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Nether Knutsford; containing 254 inhabitants.

MARTHA, ST., ON-THE-HILL, or MARTYR-HILL, a parish, in the union of HAMBLEDON, First division of the hundred of BLACKHEATH, W. division of SURREY, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Guildford; containing 193 inhabitants. This parish, which is called Martyr-Hill from a tradition that in the early ages some Christians were burnt by the Pagan Britons on the site where the church now stands, contains 1070 acres, and in point of picturesque beauty is almost unrivalled: there are extensive gunpowder and paper manufactories. The living is a donative; net income, £25; patron and impropiator, W. Tinkler, Esq. The church occupies a bleak situation on a high hill about a mile from Chilworth, the small village of the parish, and was formerly an extensive cruciform structure, in the early English style; but the nave is now in ruins. The ecclesiastical property, prior to the Dissolution in 1538, belonged to the abbey of Newark in Send, near Guildford; and at Tyling are the remains of a religious house.

MARTHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the EAST and WEST FLEGG incorporation, hundred of WEST FLEGG, E. division of NORFOLK, 9 miles (N. W.) from Yarmouth; containing 1032 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2526a. 2r. 20p., of which 1675 acres are arable, and 851 pasture; the surface is varied, and the scenery of pleasing character, enlivened by an extensive lake, interspersed with islets. The river North bounds the parish on the north. A pleasure-fair is held on the last Tuesday and Wednesday in July. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £247; the glebe comprises 10 acres, with a house. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty embattled tower surmounted by a small spire; the windows contain some remains of ancient stained glass, and the font is richly sculptured. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. Thirty-six acres of land, allotted at the inclosure, are let for £45 per annum, distributed to the poor, who also have some small bequests.

MARTIN (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Horncastle; containing 58 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the Horncastle canal, and comprises by measurement 764 acres, of which 100 are moorland. On the moor are the remains of an octagonal turret sixty feet high, supposed to have been built by the Lord Treasurer Cromwell as an appendage to the castle of Tattershall; from the summit, to which is an ascent by a winding staircase, is an extensive view of the surrounding country. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 4. 2., and in the gift, alternately, of John E. Oldham and W. Gilliat, Esqrs.: the tithes have been commuted for £143. In the neighbourhood is Woodhall Spa, recently discovered.

MARTIN, a township, in the parish of TIMBERLAND, union of SLEAFORD, First division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Sleaford; containing 926 inhabitants. A small school is supported by endowment.

The parish is bounded on the west by Looe harbour, and on the south by the English Channel, and comprises by computation 2719 acres, of which 2324 are arable, 257 woodland, and 66 pasture. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of East Looe annexed, valued in the king's books at £36. 2. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dowager Countess of Sandwich and the family of Vane: the tithes have been commuted for £415, and there are 108 acres of glebe. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school. Here was formerly a nunnery.

MARTIN, ST., a parish, in the hundred of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (E. by S.) from Chirk; containing 2200 inhabitants. It comprises 5314a. 2r. 25p., and is situated on the road from London to Holyhead. The Ellesmere canal passes through the parish, and at its verge crosses the valley of the Ceiriog by means of an aqueduct, in the vicinity of Chirk, where it enters Wales: on its banks near the Welsh boundary are some coal-works. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 2. 3½, and in the gift of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the tithes have been commuted for £1122, of which £862 are payable to the impropiators, and £260 to the vicar, who has a glebe of 23½ acres. There is an ancient wood carving in the roof of the church, in allusion to the patron saint. Here is a national school; and the poor have some minor bequests.

MARTIN, ST., an extra-parochial liberty, locally in the chapelry of HIPSWELL, parish of CATTERICK, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK, ¾ of a mile (S. E.) from Richmond; containing 8 inhabitants. About the year 1100, Wymar, chief steward to the Earl of Richmond, gave the chapel of St. Martin, with land adjoining, to the abbey of St. Mary at York, upon which a cell of Benedictine monks was established here, which continued till the Dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £43. 16. 8.

MARTIN, ST., in MENEAGE, a parish, in the union of HELSTON, W. division of the hundred of KERRIER and of the county of CORNWALL, 6¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Helston; containing 565 inhabitants. It comprises 2294 acres, of which 380 are common or waste; the river Hel is navigable on the north side of the parish. The living is a rectory not in charge, united to that of Mawgan: the tithes have been commuted for £300. The church, with the exception of the tower, was rebuilt in 1830. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school. At Gear is a circular encampment, comprising an area of fourteen acres, and defended by a very deep fosse; and there is also an encampment on the estate of Carvallack. Captain Wallis, the circumnavigator, resided for some time at Tremayne, in the parish.

MARTIN'S, ST., STAMFORD-BARON, a parish, in the borough and union of STAMFORD, soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, ½ a mile (S. E.) from Stamford; containing, with the hamlet of Wothorpe, 1443 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the navigable river Welland; the surface is varied, and the scenery is enriched with wood; the substratum contains freestone of excellent quality. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 9., and lately endowed by the Marquess of Exeter, who is patron and impropiator, with £1800, and by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with £100 per annum; net income, previously to this endowment, £98. The tithes were commuted for land in 1795. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, erected by a bishop of Lincoln in the fifteenth century, and contains monuments to several of the Cecil family, and one to Lord Treasurer Burghley, whose ancient mansion, in the immediate neighbourhood, Burghley House, is now the magnificent residence of the Marquess of Exeter. William, Lord Burghley, about 1597, founded an hospital, and endowed it with a rent-charge of £100, for a warden and twelve poor men, and the endowment was subsequently augmented by various gifts. Dorothy, Countess of Exeter, in 1596, and Elizabeth, Countess Dowager, in 1722, bequeathed property now producing £123 per annum, which sum is appropriated to the support of schools, and in assisting the poor. A Benedictine nunnery, in honour of our Lady St. Mary and St. Michael, was founded here in the time of Henry II., by William de Waterville, abbot of Peterborough, to which abbey it was subordinate; it had at one period forty nuns, but at the Dissolution possessed a revenue of only £72. 18. 10.

MARTIN-HUSSINGTREE (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of DROITWICH, Upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Droitwich; containing 237 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 908a. 3r. 33p., is intersected by the road from Birmingham to Bristol, and the Droitwich canal passes through the lower part of it. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 14. 4½, and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester: the tithes have been commuted for £248. 10., and there is a glebe-house, with about 3 acres of garden and orchard. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style.

MARTIN, STOWE, a chapelry, in the parish of TAMERTON-FOLIATT, union of PLYMPTON ST. MARY, hundred of ROBOROUGH, Midland-Roborough and S. divisions of DEVON, 7¼ miles (N. by W.) from Plymouth.

MARTINDALE, a chapelry, in the parish of BARTON, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 8 miles (S. S. W.) from Penrith; containing 198 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises by measurement 3542 acres of inclosed land, of which 966 are arable, 2480 pasture, and 96 wood; and there is a tract of common, containing about 4600 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £43; patron and impropiator, John de Whelpdale, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £22, and the vicarial for £11. A free school has an endowment of £13 a year; and there is a national school.

MARTINHOE (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of SHERWILL, Branton and N. divisions of DEVON, 14 miles (N. E. by N.) from Barnstaple; containing 236 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2425 acres, of which 1265 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 10. 10.; net income, £109; patron, Rev. John Pyke.

MARTINSCROFT, with WOOLSTONE, a township, in the parish and union of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3¼ miles (E. by N.) from Warrington; containing 548 inhabitants.

MARTINSTHORPE (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, 3½ miles (N.) from Uppingham; containing 8 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. 5.; patron, Duke of Devonshire. The church is in ruins.

MARTLESHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of CARLFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Woodbridge; containing 510 inhabitants. It comprises 2559 acres, of which 32 are common or waste land: the navigable river Deben forms the eastern boundary. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 18. 9., and in the gift of F. G. Doughty, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £420, and the glebe comprises 13 acres.

MARTLEY (St. PETER), a parish, and the head of a union, in the Upper division of the hundred of DOD-DINGTREE, Hundred-House and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Worcester; containing 1354 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4382 acres. The views from several parts of it are peculiarly fine; the Teame forms its southern boundary, and the vale through which the river flows is remarkably fertile, and produces hops of the finest quality: the district also abounds with luxuriant orchards of apple and pear trees. There is a good quarry of limestone, which supplies excellent materials for the roads, and of which great quantities are burnt into lime. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 10.; net income, £835; patron and incumbent, Rev. James Hastings: the glebe comprises 80 acres. The church contains 150 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £100 in aid of the expense. An estate, producing £59 per annum, and left as an endowment for a grammar school, is applied to the support of a national school; another school has a bequest of £20 a year, and the poor receive several benefactions. The union of Martley comprises 28 parishes or places, containing a population of 13,117.

MARTOCK (ALL SAINTS), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of YEovil, hundred of MARTOCK, W. division of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Ilchester, and 130 (W.) from London; containing, with the hamlets of Ash, Bower-Hinton with Hurst, Coat, Milton, Stapleton, and Witcombe, and the chapelry of Long Load, 3025 inhabitants. The name of this place is said to be derived from mart and oak, the market having been formerly held under an oak-tree in the centre of the town, the site of which is now occupied by an elegant fluted column, in imitation of the pillar of Trajan at Rome. The manor was given by James I. to Lord Montague for his assistance in detecting the gunpowder plot, and the site of the ancient manor-house is still called the Moat. The town consists principally of one street, about a mile and a half in length, and is intersected by a small stream tributary to the river Parret. The manufacture of fine gloves is carried on to a considerable extent, being the chief occupation of the females; and some hand-loomers are employed in weaving sail-cloth. There is a fair on Aug. 21st; and a court leet is held in October, by the lord of the manor. The parish comprises by measurement 7150 acres; the surface is pleasingly varied, and the scenery in many parts picturesque. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Load annexed, valued in the king's books at £15. 10., and in the gift of the Treasurer in the Cathedral of Wells: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £316, and the impropriate for £182. 12., and £799. 15. are paid to the treasurer. The church is an elegant structure, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, and the walls are surmounted by a handsomely perforated parapet; the roof of the nave is richly groined, and in the chancel, which is of more ancient date, is a beautiful window, partly concealed by an altar-piece of modern date, exquisite in itself, but not in keeping with the style of the church. There is a chapel of ease at Load, and a church has been erected at Ash. The Independents have two places of worship. The old Roman Fosseway skirts the south-east boundary of the parish; and there are several remains of ancient religious houses, of which one near the church is in fine preservation.

MARTON, a township, in the parish of WHITEGATE, union of NORTHWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Northwich; containing 675 inhabitants. Schools are supported by Lord and Lady Delamere.

MARTON, a chapelry, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Congleton; containing 307 inhabitants. The manor was given to an ancestor of the Davenport family, as a dowry with the daughter of Venables, Baron of Kinderton, in the reign of Henry I. The grand serjeantry of Macclesfield forest, with the right to levy heriots over that hundred, was attached to it; and when a moiety was alienated a few years previously to 1700, £3700 were paid in order to re-purchase it. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £48; patron, E. D. Davenport, Esq. The chapel, a rude building of wood, with a chancel and spire of more modern date, had formerly a chantry, which is said to have been founded in the reign of Edward III., by Sir J. Davenport and his son, of whom there are two recumbent figures in armour in the cemetery. Here is a national school.

MARTON, a chapelry, in the parish of POULTON, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Kirkham; containing 1562 inhabitants, of whom 935 are in Great, and 627 in Little, Marton. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100; patrons, certain Trustees. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £506, and the vicarial for £84. A free school, founded in 1717, by James Baines, who endowed it with land producing £91 a year, is now conducted on the national plan.

MARTON (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Gainsborough; containing 523 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Trent, and comprises by admeasurement 1180 acres, has communication with the towns on that river, and a considerable trade is carried on in the import and export of corn, timber, coal, lime, and other articles. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4.; net income, £115; patron, Bishop of Lincoln: the impropriation belongs to Mr. Hindley. The tithes were commuted for land in 1770; the glebe comprises 70 acres, and there is a glebe-house. The church is an ancient structure, with a tower, and combines various Norman details with others of more modern date. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; and a national school is supported partly by subscription. The Roman Tilbridge-lane passes through the parish.

MARTON, a township, in the parish and hundred of CHIRBURY, S. division of SALOP; containing 289 inhabitants.

MARTON (ST. ESPERIT), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Southam; containing 324 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Coventry to Oxford, at the confluence of the rivers Itchen and Leame, and comprises 1009a. 2r. 21p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 14. 8., and has a net income of £160; the patronage and impropriation belong to Mrs. Knightley. The tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1802; the glebe comprises 116 acres. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Independents.

MARTON, with SEWERBY, a township, in the parish and union of BRIDLINGTON, wapentake of DICKERING, E. riding of YORK, 2 miles (N. E.) from Bridlington; containing 352 inhabitants. The township comprises about 2000 acres: the hamlet, which is very small, is half a mile north-west from the village of Sewerby. Here are vestiges of an ancient ravine, consisting of a double line of defence with breast-works, extending one mile and a quarter from the southern shore of Flamborough-head, and termed "Danes Dike."

MARTON, a township, in the parish of SWINE, union of SKIRLAUGH, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Hull; containing 119 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 950 acres, chiefly the property of the Constable family: the village, which is scattered, stands on a lofty ridge, a little to the south of the Lambwith stream. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

MARTON (St. CUTHBERT), a parish, in the union of STOKESLEY, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Stockton-on-Tees; containing 410 inhabitants. This place was formerly the property of the Bruces, who at one time held under the Conqueror; and among the subsequent owners of land mention occurs of the nuns of Basedale; a considerable portion of the soil was also possessed by the priests connected with the cell of Middleborough; and of more recent proprietors may be named the families of Lowther, Ramsden, and Rudd. The parish is in the district of Cleveland, and on the road from Stockton to Guisborough, and comprises about 3436 acres, of which rather more than 2000 are arable, 150 woodland and plantations, and the remainder meadow and pasture. In the northern extremity of the parish the surface is nearly level, but towards the south the grounds rise by an easy ascent, and become varied and uneven; the soil is fertile, chiefly consisting of a clayey loam, and the scenery is, on the whole, of a pleasing character. Tolesby Hall is the property of John Bartholomew Rudd, Esq., and residence of Charles Hutton Roe, Esq.; and Marton Lodge, sold in 1836 to the late Judge Park, is now the property of the Rev. James Allan Park, rector of Elwick, in the county of Durham, but was burnt down a few years since, and is still in ruins. The village, which was once of greater extent, is pleasantly seated on the road from Yarm to Redcar. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 9.; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of York: the great tithes have been commuted for £541. 16., and the vicarial for £137. 15., and the glebe comprises 5 acres. The church, situated on an eminence, to the west of the village, is a small ancient structure, which is about to be rebuilt on a larger scale; it contains a neat tablet to the memory of Capt. James Cook, the great circumnavigator, who was born in this parish on the 27th of October, 1728, and was killed at Owbyhee on the 14th of February, 1779. There are places of worship for Wesleyans. A grammar school is chiefly supported by the vicar and other subscribers; and the poor have £18 per annum arising from lands in Skelton and at Broughton, left by an unknown benefactor. It is in contemplation to erect by public subscription a monument to Capt. Cook, near the site of the house in which he was born.

MARTON, a township, in the parish of SINNINGTON, union and lythe of PICKERING, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Pickering; containing 240 inhabitants. It comprises about 640 acres, belonging to various owners: the village is seated in the picturesque valley of the small river Seven.

MARTON, with GRAFTON, a parish, in the Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S.) from Boroughbridge; containing 514 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1198a. 1r. 20p.; the soil is fertile, producing wheat, barley, and beans, with some turnip and grass land; the substratum is chiefly gravel, of good quality for the roads. The scenery is generally pleasing, and frequently picturesque. The village is situated between the roads from York and Wetherby to Boroughbridge, a short distance from each, and nearly adjoining the village of Grafton. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Grafton annexed, valued in the king's books at £2. 19. 4½.; patrons and impropiators, Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The great tithes have been commuted for £288. 14., and the vicarial for £28, with a glebe of 106 acres, and a glebe-house. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, with a square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. Various small donations are applied to instruction.

MARTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Skipton; containing 381 inhabitants. This parish, which includes the villages of East and West Marton, with the hamlet of Marton Scars, comprises about 2310 acres, almost entirely the property of R. H. Roundell, Esq., who is lord of the manor. The soil is of moderate quality, and the land meadow and pasture; the surface is undulated, and the scenery picturesque; the substratum is limestone, which is quarried for building and repairing the roads, and of which great quantities are sent by the Leeds and Liverpool canal to Leeds and Lancaster. Marton Hall, the ancient residence of the Heber family, is now the property of R. H. Roundell, Esq.; Marton House, the property and residence of T. Hastings Ingham, Esq., is a modern building; Gledstone House, the seat of Mr. Roundell, is a handsome mansion, pleasantly situated. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 4. 4.; net income, £150; patron, Mr. Roundell. The church, situated in the village of East Marton, is an ancient structure, with a square embattled tower. A free school was founded by the Heber family, in 1755, and endowed with 17 acres of land. There is a spring strongly impregnated with sulphur. Reginald Heber, an eminent divine, and father of Bishop Heber, was born at Marton Hall, and was rector of the parish.

MARTON-IN-THE-FOREST, a parish, in the union of EASINGWOULD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Easingwoud; containing, with the hamlet of Moxby, 173 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Farlington. A priory of Augustine canons and nuns, the latter of whom soon after removed to Moxby, was founded here in honour of St. Mary, by Bertram de Bulmer, who lived in the reigns of Stephen and his successor; the revenue at the Dissolution was £183. 2. 4.

MARTON-LE-MOOR, a chapelry, partly in the parish of TOPCLIFFE, and partly in that of KIRBY-ON-THE-MOOR, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Boroughbridge; containing 212 inhabitants. It comprises about 940 acres of land, the property of the Duke of Devonshire, who is lord of the manor. The village is situated a little to the west of the Leeming-Lane, and a short distance north of the road from Boroughbridge to Ripon. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Topcliffe, and has a net income of £72: the tithes have been commuted for £440. 12. 6., of which £370 are payable to the impropiators, £48. 10. to the vicar of Topcliffe, £18 to the vicar of Kirby, and £14. 2. 6. to the Dean and Chapter of York; and there is a glebe of 12 acres. Here is a national school.

MARTON, LONG (St. MARGARET), a parish, in EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Appleby; containing, with the townships of Brampton and Knock, 804 inhabitants, of whom 303 are in Long Marton township. The village is one of the most considerable in the county, and presents an appearance of neatness and opulence. Marton House, a handsome stone edifice, situated at its northern extremity, is occupied by the principal agent to the London Lead Company, whose mining office is here. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 15. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £673; patron, Earl of Thanet. The tithes were commuted for land, under acts of inclosure, in 1804 and 1815. The church is a large edifice. A place of worship for Wesleyans was erected in 1816.

MARTYR-WORTHY.—See WORTHY, MARTYR.

MARWELL, or MEREWELL, a hamlet, in the parish of CARISBROOKE, liberty of WEST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Newport. A college of four priests was founded here by Henry de Blois, Bishop of Winchester, and augmented by two of his successors.

MARWOOD (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of BRAUNTON, Branton and N. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (N. W.) from Barnstaple; containing 1012 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5403a. 31p., of which 400 acres are woodland, 700 common, and the remainder arable and pasture; the soil is a light loam, resting on a substratum of schist rock; the surface is pleasingly undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by two small brooks. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 8. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £328; patrons, Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church, a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, has an ancient wooden screen, inscribed with the name of Sir John Beapul. There were formerly chapels in the parish, one at Patsford, and the other at Whitefield. A school has a small endowment; and there is also a school of industry for females. Judge Littleton is said to have been born at Middle Marwood.

MARWOOD, a township, in the parish of GAINFORD, union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of DURHAM; containing 224 inhabitants. The township comprises 3679a. 2r. 4p., and is bounded on the south by the river Tees, which separates it from Yorkshire; it is a suburb of the town of Barnard-Castle, a small part of which, together with the ruins of the ancient castle and demesne, is within its limits. The soil is fertile in those parts adjoining the river; in other places it is various; there are some slate quarries in the township. Marwood park and the liberty of Marwood chase, with the castle and demesne lands of Barnard-Castle, were purchased in the seventeenth century by Sir Henry Vane, who disparted the district in 1626, and whose descendant, the Duke of Cleveland, is the present proprietor. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £155, payable to Trinity College, Cambridge, and the vicarial for £74, payable to the incumbent of Gainford. On an eminence close to Barnard-Castle, some vestiges of the ancient town of Marwood, once a considerable place, have been discovered; and near the same is an old chapel, which has been converted into a farm-house, but is still called Bede Kirk.

MARY, ST., CHURCH, a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of HAYTOR, Paington and S. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (N. W.) from Torbay; containing 1668 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2465 acres, of which 568 are common or waste; it is situated on Babbicombe bay, a singularly picturesque spot. There are marble rocks, and some quarries of limestone, the strata of which terminate here. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Coffinswell annexed, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter (the appropriators), and valued in the king's books at £31. 11. The great tithes have been commuted for £305, and the vicarial for £205; the vicar's glebe contains $1\frac{1}{2}$ acre, to which there is a house. A school on the national plan is chiefly supported by subscription.

MARY, ST., EXTRA.—See SOUTHAMPTON.

MARY, ST., IN ARDEN, a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, partly in the hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, and partly in the hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 1 mile (E.) from Harborough. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford.

MARY, ST., IN-THE-CASTLE, a parish, in the union of HASTINGS, partly in the hundred of BALDSLOW, rape of HASTINGS, but chiefly within the cinque port of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX; containing 2933 inhabitants. The parish adjoins the town of Hastings on the north-west, and comprises part of St. George's-street, Pelham Parade, and Crescent (in the centre of which a proprietary chapel has been erected), Castle-street, Wellington-square, and York-buildings. Although yet a parish for civil purposes, the living is merged in that of the united parishes of All Saints and St. Clement, but still presented to by the Bishop of Chichester. Schools are partly supported by the perpetual curate.

MARY, ST., IN-THE-MARSH, a chapelry, in the parish of NEWTON, union and hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Wisbech.

MARY-LE-BONE, ST., a metropolitan parish and borough, in the Holborn division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX; containing 138,164 inhabitants. This district, now covered with buildings of the first order, and inhabited by families of the highest rank, was formerly an obscure village, difficult of access, and containing only a few solitary houses, with a small church, approached by two irregular and inconvenient paths, leading from Vere-street and Tottenham Court-road. The adjoining fields were the lurking-place of robbers; and the church, in Bishop Braybrook's license for its removal, is described as being, on account of its lonely site, exposed to continual depredation. From its vicinity to a bourne, called Aye, or Eye, brook, and from its dedication to the Virgin, the parish was called St. Mary at Bourne. Mary-le-bone park, now covered by buildings, was an extensive tract, well stocked with deer, in which Queen Elizabeth entertained the Russian ambassador with the diversion of hunting. The ancient manor-house, in which the Harleian library was deposited previously to its removal to the British Museum, has been taken down, with the exception only of that part of the building containing the library, which is now a boarding-school. Behind the manor-house were Mary-le-bone Gardens, much frequented as a place of public entertainment in the reign of Anne, but the site of which is now occupied by Beaumont and Devonshire streets. On Conduit mead, the modern Stratford-place, was the banquet-hall used by the mayor and aldermen of the city of London, when they visited the conduits in this part of the parish, which supplied the city with water. Among the earlier of the numerous and magnificent ranges of building that have been erected in the parish, are, Cavendish, Manchester, and Portman squares; Portland-place, a pile of lofty and commodious mansions, opening at the northern extremity into Park-crescent, and commanding a beautiful view of the Regent's Park, bounded by the Hampstead and Highgate hills; Stratford-place, Cumberland-place, and various noble ranges, with numerous spacious streets leading from Oxford-street and the Edgware-road, and traversing the parish in all directions. Of more recent additions are, the buildings in Lisson Grove and St. John's Wood, on the west; Osnaburgh-street and terrace, and Albany-street, on the east; and on the south, the continuation of Regent-street, Langham-place, and Park-crescent. Opposite this crescent, on the other side of the New-road, which is bordered by ranges of good houses, are two avenues leading into the Regent's Park, forming fine lines of building, the eastern of which including the Diorama, is the only range on that side of the park which is within the parish. To the west are Ulster, York, Cornwall, Clarence, and Hanover terraces, and Sussex-place; all elegant ranges mostly of the Corinthian order, in the Grecian style, with porticoes and columns of handsome design, and having in some instances gracefully-formed colonnades.

The park, recently opened to the public, is tastefully laid out in plantations, lawns, and pleasure-grounds, interspersed with elegant villas embosomed in trees, and varied with beautiful sheets of water, in which are some islands of picturesque appearance. The western side commands a fine view of the Colosseum, which has an imposing grandeur of effect; of the handsome terraces on that side of the park which is without the parish; and of the chapel of St. Katherine's Hospital, and other interesting objects. On the north side are the Zoological Gardens, an extensive tract of ground, arranged for the reception, classification, and exhibition of animals of every description. A public Botanic Garden has been laid out in the inner part of the park, and appropriated to plants of different countries, and ornamented with a variety of characteristic buildings: a charter of incorporation was lately granted to the Royal Botanic Society, "for the promotion of botany in all its branches, and its application to medicine, arts, and manufactures." The Portman barracks, for the guards, in Portman-street, afford accommodation for 500 men, with sufficient ground for drilling them. The bazaar in King-street and Baker-street, for the sale of horses, carriages, furniture, and fancy articles by commission, is a most extensive establishment, containing stabling for 300 horses, and galleries for 500 carriages, which are constantly on sale; attached is a commodious riding-school of large dimensions. The Oxford-street bazaar, for the sale of fancy articles and the exhibition of panoramic views, is on a smaller scale, and has recently been rebuilt, having, not long after its original establishment, been destroyed by fire. The Infirmary for sick and lame horses, in Regent-street, near Langham-place, is a neat building, with a colonnade of the Grecian-Doric order, and contains arrangements for the reception of from twenty to thirty horses. The London carriage repository, in Langham-place, is a spacious edifice, with a handsome stone front, and upwards of 300 carriages of all descriptions are constantly on sale in it. The streets are well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water by the West Middlesex and other companies. Portman market, opened as a market for hay in December 1830, and for vegetables and general produce in the following year, occupies a square area of about three acres, and affords accommodation for more than 100 loads of hay; the market-days are Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, Mary-le-bone, with the parishes of Paddington and St. Pancras, was constituted a borough, with the privilege of sending two members to parliament: the returning officer is annually appointed by the sheriff. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the magistrates at the police-office, High-street, Mary-le-bone; and of the county court of Middlesex, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

Mary-le-bone is divided into five separate ecclesiastical districts, of which the livings are all rectories not in charge, in the patronage of the Crown; net income of the district attached to the new parochial church, £1898; of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, £915; of All Souls', Langham-place, £1186; of Christ-Church, Stamford-street, £780; and of Trinity Church, Portland-road, £943. The new Parochial church built from a design by Mr. Hardwicke, situated on the south side of the New-road, near Nottingham-place, and of which the foundation was laid on July 5th, 1813, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the Grecian style, with a noble portico of the Corinthian order supporting a triangular pediment, and having at the angles of the building groups of Corinthian pillars, surmounted by a cornice, and balustrade. From the lower part of the tower, which is square, rises a circular turret, surrounded by pillars of the Corinthian order, and surmounted by a dome sustained by caryatides. The expense of building and furnishing the church was nearly £80,000. St. Mary's is a spacious edifice of brick, with a circular portico of the Ionic order, supporting a cornice and close balustrade, from which rises a circular tower, surrounded by pillars of the composite order, and surmounted by a campanile turret and dome; it was erected in 1823, from a design by Sir Robert Smirke, and by grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £18,746. All Souls' was completed in 1824, by grant from the same commissioners, at a cost of £17,633, and is a handsome structure, with a circular range of twelve columns, of the Roman-Ionic order, surrounding the base of the tower. These columns support a cornice and balustrade, and are surmounted by a circular range of Corinthian pillars, from within which rises a spire terminating in a point, of graceful form and beautiful proportion, but of which the effect is destroyed by the concealment of the base and a considerable portion of its elevation. The altar-piece is adorned with a fine painting, by Westall, of Christ crowned with Thorns. Christ-Church, Stafford-street, was erected in 1824, by grant from the commissioners, at an expense of £17,872, and is a handsome edifice of brick, ornamented with stone, with a portico of four Ionic columns sustaining a triangular pediment; above is a square tower, of which the sides are decorated with four Corinthian pillars supporting an entablature and cornice, surmounted by an open campanile turret and dome, from a design by Sir John Soane. Holy Trinity church in Portland-road, was erected in 1827, also by grant from the commissioners, at an expense of £21,525; it is a neat edifice of brick, ornamented with stone, having on each side a range of Ionic pillars supporting a cornice and balustrade, and at the west end an Ionic portico of four columns, above which is a square tower with duplicated Ionic pillars at the angles, surmounted by a small campanile turret surrounded by pillars of the composite order sustaining a conical dome. Christ-chapel, Maida-Hill, in the district of Christ-Church, is a neat and substantial edifice of brick, ornamented with stone, with a campanile turret and dome: the living is a district incumbency. The old parochial church, in High-street, is now used as a chapel, as is also St. John's, at St. John's Wood, a handsome structure of brick, with a stone portico of four Ionic columns, supporting a triangular pediment, and surmounted by an open campanile turret: the livings are both perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Crown: net income of the former, £150, and of the latter, £312. Attached to St. John's chapel is an extensive cemetery; and in addition to the burying-ground of the former, there are two capacious cemeteries belonging to the parish, one on the south side of Paddington-street, consecrated in 1733, and the other on the north side, consecrated in 1772. The proprietary episcopal chapels are, Oxford chapel, in Vere-street, built about the year 1724, and dedicated to St. Peter, of which the net income is £600; Portland-street chapel, built in 1766, and dedicated to St. Paul, of which the net income is £350; Bentinck chapel, in Chapel-street, Lisson Grove, built in 1772; Welbeck chapel, in Westmorland-street, built in 1774, and dedicated to St. James, of which the net income is £350; Portman-street chapel, built in 1779; Quebec-street chapel, built in 1788; Margaret-street chapel, converted to its present use in 1789; Brunswick chapel, in Upper Berkeley-street, built in 1795; Baker-street chapel; and Percy chapel, in Charlotte-street. A chapel has also been recently built in Aberdeen-place, St. John's Wood; and there are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, Calvinistic Methodists, and Seceders from the Scottish Church; a chapel belonging to the Greek Church; a French, and a Spanish, Roman Catholic chapel; and a Roman Catholic chapel recently erected in St. John's Wood.

The parochial school in High-street, for the maintenance and instruction of 100 girls, was founded in 1750. The Philological Society's school was established for the gratuitous instruction of children of clergymen, and of naval and military officers, in 1792, and was removed in 1827 to its present situation in Gloucester-place, New-road. The central national school, in High-street, is supported by subscription, and contains 420 boys and girls; the western district national school, in Upper York-street, Bryanston-square, was erected in 1824, and contains 530; the eastern district school, in Langham-place, instituted in the same year, affords instruction to 500. Christ-chapel national school, for which a handsome building has been erected in North-street, contains 400; the Bentinck school 250; and the workhouse schools 320, who are maintained and instructed. The schools of the Incorporated Society for maintaining and educating Orphans of Clergymen of the Established Church, in which are about 120 children, were originally founded at Acton and at Lisson Grove, and continued there until 1812, when a spacious brick building was erected at St. John's Wood, near the Regent's Park. Middlesex hospital, in Charles-street, instituted in 1745, is a large edifice of brick, for the reception of invalids and pregnant women, forming a school of medicine and surgery, where lectures are read on the practice of medicine and surgery, and a gratuitous course of clinical lectures regularly delivered; it has recently been considerably enlarged by the extension of the wings, and its external appearance improved by stucco, and by a small addition to the height. Queen Charlotte's lying-in hospital, in Harcourt-street, Bryanston-square, is adapted to the reception of from twenty to thirty patients. The Asylum for the recovery of health, in Lisson Grove North, was originally established in 1821, under the patronage of his late Majesty and the Princess Augusta, for patients who are in circumstances to contribute towards the expense of their maintenance in the institution.

MARY'S, ST., a parish, in the union and liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, though locally in the hundreds of NEWCHURCH and MARTIN-POUNTNEY, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division of KENT, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from New Romney; containing 129 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £23. 3. 9.; net income, £252; patron, Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is an ancient commodious building.

MARYPORT, a chapelry, market-town, and seaport, in the parish of CROSS-CANNONBY, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 30 miles (S. W. by W.) from Carlisle, and 310 (N. W. by N.) from London; containing 5311 inhabitants. This place, situated at the foot of the river Ellen, which intersects the town, was a very inconsiderable fishing-town, called Ellen-foot, consisting only of a few small huts, previously to 1750, at which period the foundations of the present town and harbour were laid, by Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., the proprietor of the land, who bestowed upon it the name of Maryport, in compliment to his lady. It is irregularly built, partly on the sea-shore, and partly on the cliff; the streets are spacious, and the atmosphere healthy. In 1833, an act was obtained for the improvement of the harbour, and for lighting and otherwise improving the town. Coal, limestone, and red freestone are procured in the vicinity and exported; the port is a member of the port of Whitehaven, and of late years has been rapidly rising into commercial importance. There are three yards for ship-building, and a patent-slip; and many vessels have been built for the coasting and foreign trade, by means of which timber is imported from America and the West Indies, and iron and flax from the Baltic. The number of vessels of above 50 tons registered at the port is 56, and their aggregate burthen 7074 tons. A tram-road has been constructed for the more ready conveyance of the coal-waggons to the harbour; and a railway for locomotive steam-engines leads to Carlisle, where it joins the Newcastle line. The manufactures consist chiefly of cotton and linen checks, sail-cloth, cables, coarse earthenware, leather, nails, and anchors. The herring-fishery is productive, and considerable quantities of salmon trout are caught in the river. A new market-house has been built at the expense of Humphrey Senhouse, Esq. The principal market is on Friday, but not for corn; and there is an inferior one on Tuesdays. The chapelry comprises by computation 2415 acres, of which about 400 acres are meadow and pasture, and the remainder arable; the surface is varied, and the higher grounds command some fine marine views. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £102; patron, Mr. Senhouse. The chapel, erected in 1760, and consecrated in 1763, is a neat structure, in the later English style, dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Baptists, Burghers, the Society of Friends, Presbyterians, and Wesleyans. A school on the Madras system, and a school of industry for girls, are supported by subscription. The remains of an important Roman station, with military roads leading to Moresby, Old Carlisle, and Ambleside, are visible on an eminence northward of the town, at the village of Ellenborough; and numerous relics of antiquity have been discovered. From this station a wall, extending to Workington, is said to have been constructed by the Romans, as a protection against the invasions of the Picts and Scots. In the southern part of the town is Mote Hill, on which is an artificial moated mound, 160 yards in circumference.

MARY-STOW (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Lifton and S. divisions of DEVON, 8 miles (E. by S.) from Launceston; containing 574 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2500 acres, of which 300 are wood, 440 common or waste, and the remainder chiefly arable; the whole surface is hilly, and the valleys deep; the river Lyd passes through it, and it is also intersected by the road from Exeter to Falmouth. On the manor of Sydenham is an old mansion, erected early in the seventeenth century, by Sir Thomas Wise, and garrisoned by some of the adherents of Charles I., from whom it was taken by Col. Holbourn, in 1645. There are two mines, from which manganese is procured; and a large limestone quarry. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, with Thrushelton annexed, and valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 0½.; net income, £276; patron, and impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, J. Hearle Tremayne, Esq. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £87, and the vicarial for £148; and the glebe comprises 110 acres. The church has evidences in its porch of Norman origin, and a fine Norman arch still remains; it contains an ancient font and two stone stalls, and also a curious monument to Sir Thomas Wise.

MASBROUGH, a village, in the township of KIMBERWORTH, parish and union of ROTHERHAM, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, ½ a mile (N. W.) from Rotherham; containing nearly 5000 inhabitants. This place forms part of the suburbs of the town of Rotherham, with which it is connected by an ancient bridge of five pointed arches, over the river Don, on the central pier of which is an ancient chapel of elegant design, now used as a prison. It is nearly of equal extent with the town, and has long been distinguished as the seat of numerous works connected with the manufactures of the district, whereof, a few years since, the principal were the extensive foundry and iron-works of the late Samuel Walker, Esq., in which, during the war, immense quantities of cannon and ordnance of the largest calibre were cast, and subsequently, various iron bridges, including that of Southwark, in London. Since the establishment here of a station of the North-Midland railway, by which vast quantities of sheep and cattle are sent weekly to Manchester, Liverpool, and other towns, a wonderful increase has taken place in the value of landed property; and the facility of advantageous intercourse with distant parts afforded by that line of conveyance, promises to render it one of the principal seats of manufacture and commerce. A large tract of land, forming the estate of Benjamin Badger, Esq., has been surveyed and laid out in lots for building; and several streets, intersecting each other at right angles, and forming direct approaches from Rotherham and the neighbourhood to the railway station, have been marked out, which, when completed, will render Masbrough one of the most important towns in this part of the county. A spacious hotel, for the accommodation of passengers by the railway, and some handsome dwelling-houses, have been built; and a great increase has been made in the number of manufacturing establishments. Among these last are, the Effingham iron-works, for the manufacture of stove-grates, including an extensive pottery by James Yates, Esq., of Barbot Hall; the Warrington steel-works, forges, and tilts, belonging to Messrs. Stubbs, the celebrated file and tool manufacturers of Warrington, in Lancashire, under the firm of Peter Stubbs, who, in 1842, erected buildings at the cost of £20,000; also those of Messrs. Grant and Lilley; an extensive forge, belonging to Messrs. Knowles and Brown; the Phoenix forge and iron-foundry of Messrs. Sandford, Son, and Owen, for engines and all kinds of machinery; the Holmes' engine foundry and works of Isaac Dodds, Esq., of Hall Carr House, Sheffield; the glass-works of Messrs. Clark and Beatson; the chemical-works of Mr. W. Beatson; and a timber-yard, belonging to Mr. John Singleton, of Carr House. The railway station is a spacious and handsome building of stone, opposite the end of New-street, facing the hotel; and a branch diverges from the North-Midland line at this place to Sheffield. The Independent College, noticed under the head of Rotherham, is situated here; and a Roman Catholic chapel has been built.

MASHAM (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, in the union of BEDALE, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Burton-upon-Ure, Ellingstring, Nether and Over Ellington, Fearby, Healey with Sutton, Ilton with Pott, Masham, and Swinton with Warthermask, 2974 inhabitants, of whom 1318 are in the town, 34 miles (N. W. by W.) from York, and 223 (N. N. W.) from London. This place was anciently the residence of the baronial family of Seroop, of whom Henry, Lord le Seroop, lord treasurer, and Archbishop Seroop, were both beheaded for high treason in the reign of Henry IV. The town is very pleasantly situated upon a gentle eminence in a fertile district, on the western bank of the river Ure; the houses are well built, and the air is remarkably pure. The trade consists principally in the spinning of yarn, for which an extensive manufactory has been established, affording employment to about 100 persons. There is a small market on Wednesday; a fair is held on Sept. 17th and 18th, for live stock; and during the spring a fair for cattle and sheep takes place on alternate Mondays. A court leet is held annually, at which a constable is chosen, its jurisdiction also extending to the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a vicarage, united to that of Kirkby-Malzeard, and valued in the king's books at £30: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £941, and the vicarial for £236. Masham prebend, the richest in the cathedral of York, being rated in the king's books at £136, was dissolved, and made a lay-fee, by Archbishop Holgate, in 1546. The church is a small but handsome edifice, in the English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty and elegant spire. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyans. The grammar-school, founded by William Danby, Esq., in 1760, is endowed with property producing about £80 per annum, of which about £25 are paid to the master of a charity school, otherwise supported by subscription.

MASHBURY, a parish, in the union of CHELMSFORD, hundred of DUNMOW, N. division of Essex, 6 miles (N. W.) from Chelmsford; containing 85 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Chignal St. James, and valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 7. The church is a plain edifice.

MASON, a township, in the parish of DINNINGTON, union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Newcastle-upon-Tyne; containing 144 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1063 acres of land, and is one of six townships formed by a late act of parliament into the parish of Dinnington, and of which one has been taken from the parish of Newburn, and five have been taken from that of Ponteland, to which latter this township hitherto belonged. The village is situated on the east of Prestwick Carr, and adjoins that of Dinnington.

MASSINGHAM, GREAT (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Rougham; containing 905 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 4112 acres, of which 3042 are arable, 170 pasture, 10 woodland, and the remainder common and sheep-walks. The village had formerly a market on Friday, which has been discontinued; but fairs, chiefly for pleasure, are held on Maundy-Thursday and the 8th of November. The living consists of two consolidated rectories, valued jointly in the king's books at £33. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Marquess of Cholmondeley: the tithes have been commuted for £875, and the glebe comprises 93 acres. The church of St. Mary has been demolished: that of All Saints is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel are three sedilia of stone, and a piscina of elegant design. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school, endowed with a rent-charge of £20, by Charles Calthorpe, is conducted on the national plan, and a commodious building was erected for it in 1838. A priory of the order of St. Augustine, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Nicholas, was founded here before 1260, by Nicholas le Syre, the buildings of which having fallen to decay, and the estate become wasted, in 1475 it was united to the priory of Castleacre, and became a cell to that house.

MASSINGHAM, LITTLE (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. W.) from Rougham; containing 152 inhabitants. It comprises 2278a. 1r. 38p., of which 2080 acres are arable, 97 pasture, and 80 woodland; the soil is fertile. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the gift of J. Wilson, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £570, and the glebe comprises 33 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower. A parochial school is supported by the rector, the Rev. C. D. Brereton, author of a well-known pamphlet on the administration of the poor laws in agricultural districts, and other writings on that subject.

MASTER'S CLOSE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of HEXHAM, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing 11 inhabitants.

MATCHING (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of EPPING, hundred of HARLOW, S. division of Essex, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Harlow; containing 687 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 2000 acres; the soil is chiefly clay, alternated with gravel, and the surface is gently undulated. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Governors of Felsted School (the impropiators), on the nomination of the Bishop of London. The great tithes have been commuted for £440, and the vicarial for £246. 10.; the impropriate glebe comprises 56 acres, and the vicarial 10 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with a tower. Here is a national school.

MATFEN, EAST, a township, in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, union of CASTLE ward, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hexham; containing 110 inhabitants. It lies on the south side of the river Pont, above a mile west from Stamfordham, and comprises 1834a. 1r. 6p. of land: the village consists of a few straggling cottages only, although it seems to be pretty certain that it was once a place of some importance. The Roman wall is not very far distant on the south. The tithes have been commuted for £240. 7. 11., of which £18. 19. 11. are payable to the vicar, and £221. 8. to the Bishop of Durham.

MATFEN, WEST, a township, in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, union of CASTLE ward, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Hexham; containing 429 inhabitants. The township comprises 2067*a.* 32*p.* of land, and has a well-built village, about two miles north of the site of the Roman wall. Matfen Hall, the beautiful seat of Sir Edward Blackett, Bart., is situated here, on a fine eminence sheltered by extensive woods. The tithes have been commuted for £225. 7. 3., of which £28. 17. 3. are payable to the vicar, and £196. 10. to the lessees of the Bishop of Durham. A church in the early English style, built by the munificence of Sir Edward Blackett, has just been consecrated: the patron of Stamfordham, the Lord Chancellor, has allowed £80 per annum to be charged upon the vicarage towards the maintenance of the minister, and Sir Edward has given a parsonage for his residence. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. On opening a tumulus, supposed to have been a Druidical mausoleum, coffins of four stones set edgewise, with stone bottoms and covers, were found, containing human ashes: near it was an upright stone pillar called the Stob-stone. A little to the south of the village, is a Druidical stone, 3 feet high, named the Standing-stone, and there was probably once a Druidical temple here. A chapel, also, seems to have formerly existed at the place.

MATHERN (St. THEODORIC), a parish, in the division and union of CHEPSTOW, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Chepstow; containing 434 inhabitants. This place derives its name from Merthyr Tewdric, a prince of Glamorganshire, who flourished in the fifth century, and who defeated, on several occasions, parties of invading Saxons, in a conflict with whom, at Tintern, he was at length mortally wounded; a church was built by his son, on the spot where he expired, and called after his name, since corrupted into Mathern. The parish, which is bounded on the south by the Severn, and intersected by the road from Chepstow to Newport, comprises, with Runston, 2673*a.* 3*r.* 17*p.*, whereof 942 acres are arable, 1154 meadow and pasture, and 577 woodland. The surface is undulated; the soil of various qualities, resting on limestone; and the views are very fine, especially from Wyelands, the handsome seat of John Buckle, Esq. Moynes Court is supposed to have been formerly a monastery; the present house was erected about 1609, by Dr. Godwin, Bishop of Llandaff, and in 1624 was the property of Col. Hughes, the parliamentary governor of Chepstow Castle. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Caerwent and the perpetual curacy of Llanvair-Discoed united, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Llandaff, with a net income of £352. The church is chiefly in the early and decorated styles, and consists of a nave, chancel, and side aisles, with a lofty square embattled tower; in the interior are several neat monuments. Adjoining the churchyard is the ancient palace of the bishops of Llandaff, last occupied by Bishop Beau, who died in 1706, and of which the chapel and remains are memorials of its former grandeur. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. Drs. Anthony Kitchen ab Dunstan, Hugh Jones, William Blethyn, and Matthew Murray, bishops of Llandaff, are said to have been buried here.

MATHON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of LEDBURY, Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Ledbury; containing 716 inhabitants. The parish is surrounded by the county of Hereford on all sides except the south, where it is bounded by the parish of Great Malvern; it comprises by measurement 3140 acres, exclusively of 230 acres of common or waste. There are some quarries of good limestone, which is used for the roads, and also burnt into lime. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £93; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Westminster, whose tithes have been commuted for £528. The church is an ancient structure, in the later English style, with an embattled tower. A district church has recently been erected, a handsome edifice, in the early English style, containing 330 sittings; it was built and endowed by subscription.

MATLASK (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of NORTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Aylsham; containing 198 inhabitants. It comprises 472*a.* 37*p.*, of which 351 acres are arable, 91 pasture, and 10 woods and plantations. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster: the tithes have been commuted for £130, and the glebe comprises 42 acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a circular tower of more ancient date.

MATLEY, a township, in the parish of MOTTRAM-IN-LONGDENDALE, union of ASHTON-UNDER-LINE, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Stockport; containing 251 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £55, payable to the Bishop of Chester.

MATLOCK (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of BAKEWELL, hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Derby; containing 3782 inhabitants. This place, which was formerly called Mesterford or Metesford, is equally celebrated for the beauty of its scenery, and the purity of its medicinal springs, and consists at present of the village and baths, nearly a mile and a half distant from each other. The waters were first applied to medicinal uses about the end of the seventeenth century, prior to which period the neighbourhood comprised only a few rude dwellings inhabited by miners. The original bath of wood was rebuilt of stone by the Rev. Mr. Fern, of Matlock, and Mr. Hayward, of Cromford, who erected some small rooms adjoining it, for the accommodation of invalids; and the lease of the buildings was afterwards purchased by Messrs. Smith and Pennell, of Nottingham, who erected two large houses with stabling, constructed a carriage-road by the side of the river from Cromford, and improved the horse-road from Matlock bridge. A second spring was subsequently discovered, at the distance of a quarter of a mile from the former; a new bath was formed, and additional lodging-houses were built for the reception of visitors. A third spring was opened, at a still later period, within 400 yards of the first, which, after some difficulties in levelling the hill, in order to obtain the water previously to its mixing with those of a cold spring, was rendered available to medicinal uses; and a third bath was constructed, and another hotel erected. The three principal hotels, which are all handsome stone buildings, and the lodging-houses, afford accommodation for about 400 or 500 visitors. There is a museum replete with the natural curiosities of the district, and with urns and vases formed of spar, marble, and alabaster, obtained in the county; and guides constantly attend to conduct visitors through the several caverns in the vicinity.

Matlock Dale, in which the baths are situated, presents, in varying combination, the richest features of majestic grandeur and romantic beauty. The river Derwent, for nearly three miles, pursues its course through the windings of the vale, in some places expanding into a broad lake, reflecting from its surface the luxuriant foliage of the woods, and the towering precipices which overhang its banks, and in others rushing with impetuosity through the rugged masses of projecting rocks which contract its channel, forming a variety of beautiful cascades. The High Tor, rising perpendicularly from the river to the height of 400 feet, is a prominent feature in the scenery of the dale; and on the opposite bank is Masson Hill, from the summit of which, called the Heights of Abraham, is an extensive and most interesting view. The village is romantically situated on the banks of the Derwent, over which is a neat stone bridge forming the principal entrance; the houses, which are of stone, are irregularly built on the steep acclivity of a mountain, rising above each other in gradual succession from the base nearly to the summit. Lead-mines were formerly worked to a great extent in the parish, but at present there are only a few in operation: the cotton manufacture was established here by the late Sir Richard Arkwright, who built a factory near the upper end of the dale. The market, chiefly for provisions, is well supplied; and fairs are held on Feb. 25th, April 2nd, May 9th, and Oct. 24th, for cattle, sheep, and swine. The parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 2. 6.; net income, £320; patron, Dean of Lincoln. The church, situated on the summit of a rock, is a small edifice, chiefly in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Independents. A free school, which has an income of about £40 a year, was founded in 1647, by Mr. George Spateman; and there are some charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. On Riber Hill, near the church, are the Hirst Stones, probably the remains of a cromlech.

MATSON, a parish, in the Middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union and E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Gloucester; containing 61 inhabitants. This place, during the siege of Gloucester, became the head-quarters of Charles I.; and the ancient manor-house, erected by Sir Ambrose Willoughby, Knt., in the reign of Elizabeth, was on that occasion occupied by the king's sons, Charles and James. Matson House once belonged to the celebrated George Selwyn. The parish comprises 466a. 3r. 1p. Out of the vale rises Robin Hood's Hill, of a conical form, a beautiful object in the surrounding country; it has for many centuries supplied Gloucester with water, by means of aqueducts, which are mentioned in numerous ancient documents; and it is also said, that before the Conquest it produced iron-ore for the forges of that city. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 16. 5½.; net income, £184; patrons, Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1796.

MATTERDALE, a chapelry, in the parish of GREYSTOCK, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 10 miles (S. W. by W.) from Penrith; containing 363 inhabitants. The chapelry is situated on the east side of an extensive moor, affording only coarse pasture, and comprises about 20 acres of inclosed arable and meadow land. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £54; patron, Rector of Greystock. The chapel was erected in 1685. Robert Grisdale, in 1722, built a school, and endowed it with £11 a year.

MATTERSEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Bawtry; containing 519 inhabitants. This parish, consisting of 2561 acres, is in a fertile district, abounding with pleasing scenery, and the lands were inclosed in 1770. The village is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Idle, over which is a neat stone bridge; and the Chesterfield canal passes within a mile. A fair, chiefly for horned-cattle, is held on the 29th of September. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 8. 9.; patron, Archbishop of York; impropiator, Earl Spencer. The tithes have been commuted for 130 acres of land, valued at £300 per annum; and there is a glebe-house. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, forming an interesting feature in the landscape. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a parochial school is supported partly by a small endowment. A priory of Gilbertine canons, dedicated to St. Helen, was founded here before 1192, by Roger de Maresay, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £61. 17. 7.

MATTINGLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of HECKFIELD, union of HARTLEY-WINTNEY, hundred of HOLDSHOT, Odiham and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2¾ miles (W. by S.) from Hartford-Bridge; containing 270 inhabitants.

MATTISHALL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from East Dereham; containing 1155 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2280a. 1p., of which 1898 acres are arable, 338 pasture and meadow, and 10 woodland. The worsted manufacture was formerly carried on, but since the introduction of machinery it has been discontinued. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Pattesley united, valued in the king's books at £7. 7. 3½.; patrons and impropiators, Master and Fellows of Caius College, Cambridge. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £448, and the vicarial for £293; the impropriate glebe comprises 6 acres, and the vicarial 23. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, surmounted by a spire; on the south side of the chancel is a piscina of elegant design, and there are several monuments, and some ancient brasses. Here are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Primitive Methodists; and a national school. At the inclosure of the parish, 60 acres were allotted to the poor, which, with other lands, produce £90 per annum; and the poor have some other sums, arising from benefactions.

MATTISHALL-BURGH (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of MIFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MIFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from East Dereham; containing 230 inhabitants. It comprises 604a. 38p., of which 510 acres are arable, 70 pasture and meadow, and 10 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Hockering, and valued in the king's books at £3. 15. 10.: the tithes have been commuted for £192. 10., and there are 20a. 2r. 12p. of glebe. The church, chiefly in the decorated and later styles, consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a square embattled tower; a carved screen separates the chancel from the nave. In 1689, Mary Thornton bequeathed annual clothing for the poor of this and the adjoining parish of Mattishall, derived from a house and land, now producing £15 per annum.

MATTISHALL-HEATH.—See MERKSHALL.

MAUGHAN'S, ST., a parish, in the division and hundred of SKENFRETH, union and county of MONMOUTH, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Monmouth; containing 204 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Munnaw, which separates the counties of Monmouth and Hereford; it comprises by computation 1302 acres, whereof 541 are arable, 632 pasture and meadow, 101 woodland, and 28 roads and waste. The surface is undulated, the soil fertile, and the scenery abounds in variety and beauty. From the higher grounds are extensive and picturesque views, especially from the summit of Coedangra, whence may be seen the Wrekin (Salop), the Malvern hills (Worcester), Fairford (Oxford), and also the Hereford, Gloucester, Monmouth, Glamorgan, and Brecknockshire hills. Hilstone House, a handsome mansion in the Grecian style, situated on an eminence, is the seat of George Cave, Esq. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Llangattock-Vibon-Avel: the whole of the tithes have been commuted for £158. 8. 4., of which £50. 8. 4., are payable to Robert A. Price, R. Nation, and John Roberts, Esqrs., and the remainder to the vicar. The church is chiefly in the early style, and consists of two aisles, with a low square tower. In the grounds of Hilstone is a Holy well, formerly much resorted to by pilgrims.

MAULDEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of AMPTHILL, hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Ampthill; containing 1330 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation nearly 3000 acres, of which 260 are woodland and plantations, and of the remainder two-thirds are arable and one-third pasture; the surface is varied, and the low grounds are watered by the river Flitt, a branch of the Ivel. Many of the females are employed in lace-making and the platting of straw. There are some quarries of sandstone. A pleasure-fair is held in the week nearest to St. Bartholomew's-day. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 9. 7.; net income, £512; patron, Marquess of Ailesbury: the tithes were commuted for land and a corn-rent in 1796. The church, principally in the later English style, was restored in 1837. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents.

MAUNBY, a township, in the parish of KIRBY-WISK, union of THIRSK, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, 268

N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (S. by W.) from North-Allerton; containing 283 inhabitants. It is on the east bank of the Swale, and comprises by computation 1474 acres of land. The Leeming-Lane passes at about two miles' distance on the west.

MAUTBY (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the EAST and WEST FLEGG incorporation, hundred of EAST FLEGG, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Caistor; containing 66 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1600 acres, of which 960 are arable, and 650 meadow and marsh land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the gift of Robert Fellowes, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £580, and the glebe comprises 46 acres. The church is in the early and decorated English styles, with a circular tower, octagonal in the upper part, and of earlier date.

MAWDESLEY, a township, in the parish of CROSTON, union of CHORLEY, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Chorley; containing 867 inhabitants. The township comprises 2887 acres, of which 122 are common or waste land. A church was erected in 1829, and an additional one consecrated in June, 1840: the living of that dedicated to St. Peter has a net income of £120. The tithes have been commuted for £416, of which £366 are payable to the rector of Chorley, and £50 to the rector of Croston. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics; and a school has been erected by subscription.

MAWES, ST., a small sea-port and market-town, in the parish of ST. JUSTIN-ROSELAND, union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (E.) from Falmouth (across the harbour), and 265 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing 941 inhabitants. The name is with probability considered to be a corruption of St. Mary's, and the place is called St. Mawes, alias St. Mary's, in various ancient records, perhaps from having belonged to the priory of St. Mary, at Plympton. A castle was erected here in 1542, by Henry VIII., during the war with France, as a protection to Falmouth harbour; and at the Dissolution, the fortress, with the lands which had belonged to the priory at Plympton, became the property of the Vyvyan family, who possessed them for several generations. The town, which consists principally of one street fronting the sea, and lies at the foot of a hill rising somewhat abruptly from the vale, is irregularly built, and chiefly inhabited by fishermen and pilots. The only branch of manufacture is that of cables, ropes, &c. for small craft. The pilchard fishery, although on the decline, is the main source of occupation; and 14,000 hogsheads of the fish have been exported from St. Mawes and Falmouth, of which port this is a member, in one season. A small market for butchers' meat is held on Friday. A portreeve, commonly called mayor, is presented by a jury at the court leet of the manor, held in October, in the town-hall. St. Mawes first sent members to parliament in 1562, but was disfranchised by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A school for boys is supported by the Duke of Buckingham, and another on the national system by subscription.

MAWGAN-IN-MENEAGE (St. MAWGAN), a parish, in the union of HELSTON, W. division of the hundred of KERRIER and of the county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Helston; containing 1084 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the head of the Helford creek, comprises a portion of the small port of Gweek, and contains some pleasing scenery and some good views, especially from Point Downs, from which there is a picturesque view of the valley of Mawgan, with a branch of the river Hel. Trelowarren, the seat of Sir R. Vyvyan, Bart., is a handsome mansion, in the later English style, erected in 1644; attached is a chapel, splendidly decorated. Fairs are held on the first Tuesday after Lady-day, the second Tuesday in August, and the first Tuesday in December, for cattle. The living is a rectory, with that of St. Martin-in-Meneage united, valued in the king's books at £35. 10. 2½., and in the gift of the Rev. G. Trevelyan: the tithes have been commuted for £600, and there is a glebe-house, with a glebe containing 23 acres. The church contains some interesting monuments. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; also national schools, erected in 1823, at the expense of the Rev. H. Mann. At Trevesack is an ancient encampment, in which an earthen pot was turned up by the plough a few years since, containing a large quantity of Roman coins.

MAWGAN-IN-PYDER, a parish, in the union of St. COLUMB MAJOR, E. division of the hundred of PYDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from St. Columb Major; containing 749 inhabitants. This place is on the shore of the Bristol Channel, by which it is bounded on the west, and contains a small cove called Mawgan Porth; the cliffs are remarkably fine, especially at that part called Bodrathan Steps, where is a firm sandy beach, three miles in extent, named Trevarrian. The parish comprises by computation 6078 acres, of which 600 are common or waste. Slate, thought to be equal in quality to that of the Delabole quarries, is procured in vast quantities from the cliffs, and sent to different parts of the kingdom. The village is beautifully situated in a picturesque valley watered by a considerable stream which, at the distance of two miles, falls into the sea between two immense cliffs. A fair for cattle takes place on Midsummer-day; and a court leet and baron is held annually for the manor of Carnanton. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and in the gift of H. Willyams, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £605, and the glebe comprises 64 acres. The church is an ancient structure: in the churchyard is a cross with a niche, in which is sculptured, in high relief, the Crucifixion, with several other figures. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school for girls is supported by Mr. Willyams, at Carnanton; and one for boys by the rector. Lanherne House, long the residence of the Lords Arundel, was fitted up by the eighth lord, as an asylum for Carmelite nuns, who emigrated from Antwerp, and by such it is still occupied.

MAWNAN (St. MONA), a parish, in the union of FALMOUTH, E. division of the hundred of KERRIER, W. division of CORNWALL, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Falmouth; containing 582 inhabitants. The parish is bounded, on the south-east by the English Channel, in which, within its limits, are two small open bays, called respectively Paisk and Bream; on the south runs the Helford river, an arm of the sea, about a mile in breadth. It comprises 2058a. 3r. 37p.: the soil is indifferently; in some parts coarse and shallow, and in others overgrown with furze: the surface is hilly, and the lower grounds are watered by numerous rivulets. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 16. 3., and in the gift of the Rev. John Rogers: the tithes have been commuted for £304. 10., and the glebe comprises 38 acres, with a spacious house. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style: on rebuilding the north wall, in 1827, the foundations of a wall were discovered, which had evidently belonged to a former church. At Penwarne was formerly a chapel, with a cemetery. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans, and a national school. At Carlinnack is a circular intrenchment.

MAWTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of WELL, union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Alford; containing 30 inhabitants.

MAXEY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 1¼ mile (S. S. W.) from Market-Deeping; containing, with the hamlet of Deeping-Gate, 611 inhabitants, of whom 410 are in the hamlet of Maxey. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £304; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Peterborough. The church is principally Norman, with portions in the decorated and later English styles. A national school is partly supported by subscription. In the parish are Lolham bridges, constructed by the Romans, to conduct the Ermin-street over the low grounds adjoining the river Welland.

MAXSTOKE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of MERIDEN, Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 2¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from Coleshill; containing 346 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the west and south by the river Blythe, comprises by computation 2719 acres; the soil is generally a stiff clay, producing good crops of wheat, and the surface is usually flat, except on the east, where it rises into a hill of considerable elevation. The Derby and Birmingham railway passes through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £70; patron and impropiator, Lord Leigh. A school is supported by his lordship and Mrs. Dilke. There are extensive remains of a priory of Augustine canons, founded in 1336, by Sir William de Clinton, Earl of Huntingdon, and which was dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Michael, and All Saints, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £129. 11. 8.—See COLESHILL.

MAYFIELD (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD; containing, with the chapelry of Butterton, part of Calton, and the township of Woodhouses, 1348 inhabitants, of whom 847 are in the township of Mayfield, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Ashbourn. This place, from the discovery of Roman antiquities in the immediate vicinity, is supposed to have been occupied by the Romans: in digging a morass, vestiges of a paved road were discovered, and traces of an old fortification were found at a place in the parish called Clines. The parish is pleasantly situated in a tract of beautifully picturesque country, watered by the river Dove, and comprises 1815*a.* 1*r.* 35*p.* Hanging Bridge, an ancient stone structure of five arches, crosses the romantic vale of the Dove, about half a mile north of the church. The cotton manufacture is carried on; the spinning of yarn affords employment to about 100 persons, and an equal number are engaged in the works at Hanging Bridge, on the other side of the river. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 8.; net income, £151; patron, Dr. Greaves; impropriators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, the family of Bill. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty embattled tower, and contains some details of Norman character, of which the arched doorway on the south side is a fine specimen. There are chapels of ease at Butterton and Calton, a place of worship for Wesleyans, and a national school. Within the parish are two barrows, called Harlow and Rowloo; and at Halsteads are considerable remains of a large moated residence, approached by an ancient bridge in fine preservation, though much obscured by foliage and overhanging rocks.

MAYFIELD (St. DUNSTAN), a parish, in the union of UCKFIELD, hundred of LOXFELD-CAMDEN, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 9 miles (E. N. E.) from Uckfield; containing 2943 inhabitants. Henry III. granted a charter for a market and two fairs to be held here, of which the former has long been disused, and the latter are on May 30th for pedlery, and November 13th for cattle and pedlery. A great fire broke out at Mayfield, in 1389, which burned the church and the greater part of the village. The parish is situated on the road from Tonbridge-Wells to Eastbourne, and comprises by computation 13,133 acres, of which about 500 are hop-grounds: the surface is diversified with hills, and the lower grounds are watered by the river Rother. The soil is principally clay, alternated with sand; iron sandstone is abundant, and there were formerly furnaces for smelting ore. A corn-market is held every Wednesday. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £17. 13. 4.; net income, £834; patron and incumbent, Rev. John Kirby; chief impropriators, Lord Carrington and the Trustees of Smith's charity. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square tower surmounted by a low spire, and from its elevated situation is conspicuous for many miles in every direction. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A free school, founded in 1749, has an endowment of £27 per annum; and a national school was established in 1839. There are some fine remains of a mansion belonging to the archbishops of Canterbury before the Reformation, consisting of the gatehouse, porter's lodge, and a considerable portion of its magnificent hall: a large room in that part of the building still habitable, was occupied by Elizabeth, in 1573, during the entertainment given by Sir Thomas Gresham, then proprietor of the house, to the queen and her suite, in her progress through Kent.

MAYLAND (St. BARNABAS), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Maldon; containing 200 inhabitants, and comprising 2030*a.* 2*r.* 22*p.* The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; patrons and impropriators, Governors of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London: the great tithes have been commuted for £410, and the vicarial for £142. There is a small national school. Dr. John Gauden, successively Bishop of Exeter and Worcester, and supposed by some to have been the author of Eikon Basilike, was born here in 1605.

MAYSHILL, a hamlet, in the parish of WESTERLEIGH, union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, hundred of PUCKLE-CHURCH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 149 inhabitants.

MEABURN, KING'S, a township, in the parish of MORLAND, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Morland; containing 200 inhabitants. A school, built in 1834, is endowed with the interest of £200.

MEABURN MAULDS, a township, in the parish of CROSBY-RAVENSWORTH, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Shap; containing 310 inhabitants. This place is situated in a fertile valley, watered by the Lyvennet rivulet, and abounding with luxuriant pasturage: the village is large, and a fair for sheep and cattle is held in it on the Monday before Easter. £14. 14. 6., the amount of various bequests, are distributed among the poor annually.

MEALRIGG, with LANGRIGG, a township, in the parish of BROMFIELD, union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Wigton; containing 262 inhabitants, of whom 58 are in Mealrigg hamlet.

MEANWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish of LEEDS, wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Leeds. The hamlet is beautifully situated on the east side of a thickly-wooded dell, embracing a fine prospect of the town of Leeds and the adjacent country; the scenery is richly diversified. Meanwood House, the seat of Christopher Beckett, Esq., is a handsome mansion, erected in 1841, and pleasantly seated on an eminence commanding extensive views. A school-house has been erected by Mr. Beckett, and is licensed by the bishop for the performance of Divine service.

MEARE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WELLS, hundred of GLASTON-TWELVE-HIDES, E. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Glastonbury; containing, with the chapelry of Godney, 1522 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 2. 8.; net income, £228; patrons, B. Wake and W. Purlewent, Esqrs.; impropriators, Feoffees of a charity at Shepton-Mallett. The tithes were commuted for land in 1778. The church is in the early English style, with an embattled tower. There are a chapel of ease and a national school. Here are the remains of encampments, of Danish origin, with a double ditch.

MEARLEY, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of CLITHEROE, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (S. E. by E.) from Clitheroe; containing 53 inhabitants.

MEASAND, a hamlet, in the parish of BAMPTON, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 4 miles (S. W.) from Bampton. A small stream called Fordingdale, runs in the vicinity, and has several waterfalls in its course; on the east is Hawes-water lake. The free school was endowed in 1713, by Richard Wright and Richard Lacy, with an estate producing about £34 per annum.

MEASHAM (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ashby; containing, with part of the hamlets of Donisthorpe and Oakthorpe, 1615 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south and east by the small river Mease, from which it derives its name, comprises by measurement 1818 acres; coal is found, though no mines are in operation, and there are quarries of good stone, but not wrought at present. The manufacture of tape is carried on to some extent, affording employment to about 200 persons. The Ashby canal passes through the village. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £97; patron and impropiator, Marquess of Hastings: there is a glebe of 15 acres, with a house. The church is an elegant structure, in the early English style, with later insertions. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. National schools are supported by a small endowment and by subscription: Queen Adelaide visited them in 1839.

MEAVY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of ROBOROUGH, Midland-Roborough and S. divisions of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Tavistock; containing 361 inhabitants. This place was the residence of Sir Francis Drake, of whose ancient mansion there are still some remains. The parish comprises 3351a. 3r. 35p., of which about 2400 acres are profitable land, and the remainder, with the exception of 360 acres of coppice wood, open and unproductive common. The surface is undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by the river Mew, which winds through a valley of great beauty, and on the banks of which the village is situated. The Plymouth railway passes through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £220; and the glebe comprises 23 acres. There is a small national school. Near the church is a hollow oak of very large dimensions, and adjoining it are the remains of a stone cross.

MEDBOURNE (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Rockingham; containing, with the chapelry of Holt, 574 inhabitants. An act for the inclosure of land was passed in 1842. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £35. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £606; patrons, Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. There is a chapel of ease at Holt. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. A school is endowed with £32 per annum; and there are bequests producing £38. 11. per annum for the poor. In a field north-westward from the village are the remains of intrenchments, with foundations of buildings, covering a piece of ground about half a mile square. In 1721, a tessellated pavement was discovered; and other Roman remains have been dug up at different times.

MEDLAR, with WESHAM, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Kirkham; containing 209 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £123. 15. 8., of which £61 are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford, £32 to the impropiators, £29. 2. 4. to the vicar, and £1. 13. 4. to the clerk, of the parish.

MEDMENHAM (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Great Marlow; containing 385 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £5. 7. 1., and in the patronage of Mrs. Scott: the incumbent's tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 3 acres. A school is chiefly supported by Mrs. Scott. An abbey for Cistercian monks was founded here by Hugh de Bolebec, as a cell to the monastery at Woburn, and the revenue was valued at £20. 6. 2.; a very small portion of the conventual building remains, and the site is partly occupied by a modern erection, in imitation of ruins, nearly overgrown with ivy. Above the village are vestiges of a large camp, nearly square, with a single vallum and ditch, the area comprising about seven acres; and there is an ancient circular intrenchment in the parish, called Danesfield.

MEDOMSLEY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of LANCHESTER, W. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Shotley-Bridge, and 11 (S. W. by W.) from Gateshead; containing about 3000 inhabitants, of whom 796 are in the township of Medomsley. It includes the townships of Benfieldside, and Conside with Knitsley, and is situated on the northern limit of the county, and divided for about six miles from Northumberland and the parishes of Winlaton and Ryton by the river Derwent. The township, which is crossed in its western part by the Roman Watling-street, from the Lanchester to the Ebchester station, contains by computation 5890 acres, and consists of a number of small farms, partly arable and partly grass land, interspersed with about 500 acres of natural oak copse and other wood. In general the soil is a strong clay, suited to the culture of wheat, but in some parts is of a lighter quality; the surface rises rapidly both from the east and west, until, at the village, it attains a height of about 900 feet above the level of the sea. The seam of coal called the "Hutton Seams," which is here upwards of seven feet thick, is worked in two collieries: in one by the Pontop and Shields Railway Company, lessees under the Bishop of Durham, and in the other by Edward Richardson, Esq., lessee under General Sir Martin Hunter and the representatives of the late John Hunter, Esq. There are also quarries of good freestone, used for building purposes, and various strata of iron-stone, which are extensively worked by the Derwent Iron Company, and the produce conveyed by railway to their furnaces at Conside: the quality of the iron is said to be superior to that of any hitherto produced in the north of England. At Derwent Cote, in the township, is a forge for iron and steel, worked by Thomas Cookson, Esq. The village is pleasantly situated on an eminence skirted by rich meads, and commanding a beautiful view of the vale of Derwent, and the distant hills beyond the Tyne.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy in the patronage of the Bishop, with a net income of about £250, arising out of glebe lands and certain augmentations from the surplus revenues of the see of Durham: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £183. 19. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and built in 1280, stands at the west end of the village, and is in the early English style, consisting of a nave and chancel of equal width, separated by an arch springing from corbels on either side; the roof is of lead, resting on massive oak beams, but from neglect the walls are in a dilapidated state. The windows are lancet-shaped, and of very small dimensions; the east window, which is handsome, is of three lights; and there is a piscina in the south wall under a trefoil arch with good mouldings. A porch existed about eighty years since, on the south side, but it was taken down, and a vestry built against the south door: the chapel is said to have suffered much from the inroads of the Scots. In the burial-ground are three stone coffins, two having the figure of a cross with a sword suspended, and the other bearing a longitudinal inscription, now illegible. There are places of worship for Baptists, Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, and the Society of Friends; and numerous schools, of which one, in the village, is in connexion with the Church, and supported by subscription. To the west of the village, on a farm called Bunker's hill, may be traced three distinct lines of military defence, supposed to have been thrown up by the Scottish army when retreating from the battle of Nevill's Cross. The elegant and accomplished Henry Swinburne, author of Travels in Spain, 1779, was the owner of the manor of Hamsterley in this township; and Hamsterley Hall, a handsome mansion in a sheltered valley on the Pont burn, bears strong proofs of his refined taste, in the beautiful arrangement of its shrubberies and walks, and the magnificent selection of fine trees that adorn them.—See SHOTLEY-BRIDGE.

MEDSTED (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of ALTON, hundred of FAWLEY, Alton and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Alton; containing 450 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 2000 acres; the surface is elevated, and the surrounding scenery pleasingly diversified. The living is a rectory, annexed, with that of New Alresford, to the rectory of Old Alresford. A school is supported by the rector, the Earl of Guilford.

MEER, city of LINCOLN.—See WADDINGTON.

MEER, a hamlet, in the parish of FORTON, union of NEWPORT, W. division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Newport. Meer town is a small village, containing several neat houses, situated upon an eminence on the Shropshire border; it takes its name from Aqualate Meer, a large sheet of water, bounding on the north Aqualate Hall and Park, the seat of Lady Boughey. The roads from Newport to Eccleshall and to Stafford are in the immediate vicinity.

MEERBECK, a hamlet, in the township and union of SETTLE, parish of GIGGLESWICK, W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 2 miles (S.) from Settle. This place is situated upon an acclivity on the road from Skipton to Settle, commanding extensive views of Ribblesdale, including the celebrated height of Pendle Hill; the scenery is enriched with wood, and is beautifully diversified. Here is the seat of John Preston, Esq., whose family have been settled in Craven for more than four centuries.

MEERBROOK, a chapelry, in the parish and union of LEEK, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Leek; containing 652 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £97; patron, Vicar of Leek. The chapel, dedicated to St. Matthew, is a small edifice, with a square tower. Some children are educated for £14 per annum, the proceeds of a bequest by John Stoddard, in 1673. In the neighbourhood are the Leek rocks, stupendous overhanging masses, two miles in length, with scattered fragments at their bases and in other parts of the valley.

MEESDEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of EDWINSTREE, county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Barkway; containing 181 inhabitants. It comprises 1008 acres, of which 20 are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4.; patron and incumbent, Rev. A. Gausson: the tithes have been commuted for £178, and the glebe comprises 108 acres. A school is supported by the rector.

MEESON, a township, in the parish of GREAT BOLAS, Newport division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Newport; containing 85 inhabitants.

MEETH (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Black Torrington and Shebbear, and N. divisions of DEVON, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Hatherleigh; containing 314 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 7. 6., and in the gift of the Rev. F. D. Lempriere: the tithes have been commuted for £221. 10., and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church contains a marble monument to Dr. Lempriere, author of the Classical Dictionary and other works, who died in 1824. Here is a national school.

MELAY, with HAYTON, a township, in the parish of ASPATRIA, union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Cockermouth; containing 378 inhabitants.

MELBECKS, a township, in the parish of GRINTON, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 14 miles (W. by S.) from Richmond; containing 1633 inhabitants. The township is situated on the north side of Swaledale, along which extend numerous hamlets, and comprises by computation 10,106 acres, whereof 8643 are wild and uncultivated moors: extensive and productive lead-mines are in operation. A church, dedicated to the Trinity, to which a district has been assigned, was erected in 1843, by subscription, aided by a grant of £300 from the Ripon Diocesan Society; it is a light and handsome edifice in the later English style. The living has been endowed with £150 per annum by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and is in the patronage of the Vicar of Grinton; a parsonage-house was built in 1843. There are places of worship for Presbyterians and Wesleyans; also a school, founded in 1806.

MELBOURN, a township, in the parish of THORNTON, union of POCKLINGTON, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Pocklington; containing 514 inhabitants. The township is intersected by the Pocklington canal, and contains 3085a. 3r. 36p., presenting generally a flat surface. A small stream flows near the village, which consists chiefly of detached houses; and at a short distance to the south is Melbourne Hall, the seat of Sir Henry M. Vavasour, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1777. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists.

MELBOURNE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ROYSTON, hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Royston; containing 1724 inhabitants, of whom the female poor are employed in straw-plaiting. The parish comprises 4688 acres, of which 852 are common or waste: an act for inclosing lands was passed in 1839. A pleasure-fair is held on the first Thursday in July. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £19. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Ely. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £860, and the vicarial for £220; the appropriate glebe comprises 186 acres, and the vicarial 43. The church is a fine edifice, built by Henry VII. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents; and a school, endowed with £2000 and other property, by the late John Trigg, Esq., is conducted on the Lancasterian system.

MELBOURNE (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of SHARDLOW, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, 8 miles (S. S. E.) from Derby; containing 2583 inhabitants. This place was formerly the residence of the bishops of Carlisle, who had a palace here; and there was anciently a baronial castle, in which John, Duke of Bourbon, who had been made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, was confined for several years; the castle was destroyed in 1460, by order of Queen Margaret, and, though subsequently restored, there is scarcely a vestige of it remaining. Melbourne Hall, the seat and occasional residence of Lord Melbourne, was the episcopal palace; and King's-Newton Hall was the seat of the Hardinges, ancestors of Sir Henry Hardinge. The parish, which is bounded on the north by the river Trent, comprises by survey 3480 acres; the soil is generally a rich loam, alternated with strong clay, and on the commons of lighter quality; the surface is hilly, and the scenery pleasingly varied. The principal manufacture is that of lace gloves. Sandstone of good quality for building is quarried extensively, and also a peculiarly fine kind, which is used for sharpening scythes. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 4.; net income, £179; patron, Bishop of Carlisle; impropiator, Viscount Melbourne. The tithes were commuted for land in 1787; the glebe comprises 78 acres, with an old glebe-house. The church is a good specimen of Norman architecture, with round massive piers, circular arches, and zigzag ornaments. There are places of worship for General Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Swedenborg-ians; and a national school is endowed with £30 per annum. Melbourne gives the title of Viscount to the family of Lamb.

MELBURY-ABBAS, a parish, in the union of SHAFESBURY, hundred of SIXPENNY-HANDLEY, Shaston division of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Shaftesbury; containing 390 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2275 acres, of which 830 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Sir R. P. Glyn, Bart.; the tithes have been commuted for £380. Walter Blandford, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Worcester, was a native of this place.

MELBURY-BUBB (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of CERNE, hundred of YETMINSTER, Cerne division of DORSET, 2 miles (N. E.) from Evershot; containing, with the tything of Woolcombe, 126 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 1227 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 10. 5., and in the gift of the Earl of Ilchester: the tithes have been commuted for £181, and the glebe comprises 48 acres. The church is built of brick and stone, chiefly in the later style, with a tower on the south side, the lower stage of which forms a porch. There was anciently a chapel at Woolcombe, which has entirely disappeared, and even the site of it is now unknown. On an eminence called Bubb Down, was formerly a beacon.

MELBURY-OSMOND (ST. OSMOND), a parish, in the union of BEAMINSTER, hundred of YETMINSTER, Sherborne division of DORSET, 14 miles (N. W. by N.) from Dorchester; containing 404 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 1192 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Melbury-Sampford united in 1750, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the gift of the Earl of Ilchester. The tithes have been commuted for £177, and the glebe comprises 86 acres; the glebe-house, a great part of which was built in 1641, is beautifully situated, and in the gardens is a remarkably fine yew-tree. The church, rebuilt in 1745, is a neat structure of freestone, with a square embattled tower at the east end. A school, with an income of £15 per annum, is conducted on the national plan; and another is partly supported by the Earl of Ilchester. The fossil called the tortoise stone is prevalent here, and when polished is highly ornamental.

MELBURY-SAMPFORD, a parish, in the union of BEAMINSTER, hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of DORSET, 13 miles (N. W. by N.) from Dorchester; containing 43 inhabitants. The parish, which derives the affix to its name from a former lord of the manor, comprises by measurement 1024 acres; and Melbury House, one of the seats of the Earl of Ilchester, is situated here in a spacious park. The living is a discharged rectory, united in 1750 to that of Melbury-Osmond, and valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$.: the tithes have been commuted for £57. The church is a venerable cruciform structure, in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower rising from the centre; the windows are enriched with delicate tracery, and embellished with ancient stained glass.

MELCHBOURN (ST. MARY), a parish, in the hundred of STODDEN, union and county of BEDFORD, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Kimbolton; containing 274 inhabitants, and comprising by computation 2600 acres.

The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £75; patron and impropriator, Lord St. John: the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church contains ancient monuments and brasses. Here was a commandery of Knights Hospitallers, to whom a market and an annual fair were granted, in 1264; the revenue was £241. 9. 10. Leland, the historian and antiquary, was a native of this place.

MELCHET-PARK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of ALDERBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 31 inhabitants.

MELCOMBE-HORSEY (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of CERNE, hundred of WHITEWAY, Cerne division of DORSET, 8½ miles (W. S. W.) from Blandford-Forum; containing, with the hamlet of Hartsfoot-Lane, 173 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 2000 acres: many of the labouring class are employed in making hurdles, spars, and other articles of wood for the farmers in the neighbourhood. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16, and in the gift of Lord Rivers: the tithes have been commuted for £278. 6., and the glebe contains 18 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, and beautifully situated. A school is partly supported by the curate. In the vicinity are vestiges of the hamlet of Melcombe-Bingham, consisting of foundations of houses; and in the parish are the remains of various ancient mansions, now converted into farm-houses. On an eminence called Nettlecombe Tout, is a square encampment, occupying a space of 20 acres.

MELCOMBE-REGIS.—See WEYMOUTH.

MELDON (St. John the Evangelist), a parish, in the union of MORPETH, W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6½ miles (W. S. W.) from Morpeth; containing 152 inhabitants. This place was a manor in the barony of Mitford till the time of Henry III., since which period the estate has been held by various families of distinction; it eventually became the property of Lord Derwentwater, by whom it was forfeited in 1715, and it was subsequently appropriated by the crown to the support of Greenwich Hospital, from the governors of which it was purchased by Isaac Cookson, Esq., the present proprietor. The parish comprises 1026 acres; the surface is pleasingly undulated, rising in some parts into bold eminences, and the lower grounds are watered by the river Wansbeck, which runs from east to west, between richly-wooded banks. The soil along the southern boundary is clayey, and well adapted for the growth of wheat, and in other parts is light and gravelly, resting on a substratum of clay, producing turnips and green crops of every kind, and well suited for pasture and for dairy farming. Meldon Park, the newly-erected seat of Mr. Cookson, is beautifully situated on an eminence in the north-western part of the parish, on the bank of the Wansbeck, and commands a fine view of the vale to which that river gives name. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham; net income, £322. The Rev. James Raine, M.A., the present incumbent, discovered, in his antiquarian researches, an ancient document, by which he claimed and recovered the tithes of the parish from the proprietors of the estate. The church, supposed to have been founded at a very early period, by the Bertram family, is situated on one of the most elevated knolls, and, within the walls, is only 28 feet in length, and 15 feet wide. There was an ancient tower in the parish in the reign of Henry VI.; several foundations of buildings have been discovered in Meldon Park, and there is every reason to suppose that the place was once of more importance than it is at present.

MELDRETH (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of ROYSTON, hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Royston; containing 730 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 15. 10.; net income, £224; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Ely. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1813.

MELFORD, LONG (Holy Trinity), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of BABERGH, W. division of SUFFOLK, 22 miles (W.) from Ipswich; containing 2597 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5185a. 4p. The village is pleasantly situated on a branch of the river Stour, in one of the most fertile parts of the county, and is surrounded by very beautiful and richly-diversified scenery. Melford Hall, formerly a country-house of the abbots of Bury, and now the seat of Sir Hyde Parker, Bart., is a noble mansion, in the Elizabethan style, forming an interesting feature in the landscape; and Kentwell Hall, the residence of the family of Bence, is a venerable structure, in the ancient domestic style, and contains much old painted glass. A large cattle-fair is held on Thursday in Whitsun-week, and continues for three days: the market, on Tuesday, has been long discontinued; the pedestal of the old stone cross remains on the green. A court baron is held annually by the lord of the manor, and the county magistrates hold a petty-session for the division, every fortnight. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £28. 2. 6., and in the gift of I. Cobbold, Esq. The church is a spacious and interesting structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a lofty embattled tower, and at the east end is a Lady chapel of very beautiful character, which for some time was used as a schoolroom, but has been recently restored in all its pristine elegance. Under the upper and lower battlements surrounding the church and chapel are numerous inscriptions in black letter, and partly in Latin, recording the names of various individuals by whom different parts of the edifice were rebuilt about the year 1480. The whole of the windows, nearly ninety in number, and mostly of large dimensions, appear to have been originally embellished, about the reign of Henry VII., with portraits of persons either recently dead or living at that time; and there are still many representations of characters eminent in history, but in a very mutilated condition. The church contains many interesting monuments and recumbent figures, among which are, one to the memory of Sir William Cordell, Knt., speaker of the house of commons and privy councillor in the reign of Mary, and master of the rolls in that of Elizabeth; one to William de Clopton, dated 1446; one to John de Clopton in 1497; a monument to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker; and numerous brasses to the families of Clopton and Martin. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A national school for girls has been established; and there are two schools with small endowments. An hospital, now very venerable and collegiate in appearance, for a warden, twelve poor men, and two women, was founded in 1573, under letters-patent, by Sir W. Cordell, Knt., who endowed it with an estate and tithes, producing an income of £1000 per annum. Under the will of Mrs. Oliver, the poor receive annually coal to the value of upwards of £100. Sir John Milborne, lord mayor of London in 1521; Sir Roger Martin, mayor of London in 1567; John Reeve, commonly called John de Melford, last abbot of Bury; and Dr. Johnson, late Bishop of Worcester, and son of a rector of the parish, were natives of this place.

MELKINTHORPE, a township, in the parish of LOWTHER, WEST ward and union, county of WEST-MORLAND; containing 99 inhabitants.

MELKRIDGE, a township, in the parish and union of HALTWHISTLE, W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 2 miles (E.) from Haltwhistle; containing 290 inhabitants. It belonged, at an early period, to the Ridleys, of whom Sir Nicholas Ridley was proprietor in the 16th century; it afterwards came to the Nevilles, of Chevet, and from them it passed to the Blacketts, the present owners. The Tyne bounds the township on the south for about two miles; the surface is undulated, and mountainous towards the north, where part of the Roman wall passes through, of which some portions are visible. There is a small land-sale colliery, the property of Sir Edward Blackett, Bart., who is lord of the manor; good freestone is quarried for building, and a bastard limestone for the roads, as also heavy grey slates for roofing houses. The village is agreeably seated on a sunny slope rising gradually from the Tyne, and has the Newcastle and Carlisle railway running between it and the river. Much of the place, especially the part called the High Town, belongs to the Carricks, of whom Robert Carrick, Esq., has recently built Croft House, a handsome residence on the west side of the village, with a sloping lawn before it towards the road, and having splendid views of the rising hills of the opposite side of the Tyne, which here abounds with trout. The great tithes are payable to Sir Edward Blackett, and have been commuted for £63. A commodious school-house was erected a few years since, by subscription. In the township is Whitchester, a Roman station, of which the site is defended on three sides by deep glens.

MELKSHAM (St. MICHAEL), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of MELKSHAM, Melksham and N. divisions of WILTS, 28 miles (N. W.) from Salisbury, and 95 (W. by S.) from London; containing, with the chapelries of Earl-Stoke and Seend, and the tythings of Beanacre, Blackmore, Cannonhold, Melksham Town, and Woodrow, 6236 inhabitants, of whom 535 are in the town of Melksham: The name is supposed to be derived from Milch, or Melch, milk, and Ham, a dwelling, the adjacent land being chiefly occupied as dairy-farms. During the Saxon era this was a place of some importance, and at the period of the Norman survey, and for several subsequent reigns, it was held in royal demesne, and gave name to an extensive forest: in the reign of Henry VIII. it had fallen into decay, but during the last century experienced a revival from its cloth manufacture. The town, situated on the road from London, through Devizes, to Bath, and on the banks of the Avon, consists principally of one street, nearly a mile in length, which is paved, and lighted with gas; the houses are in general good, and built of freestone, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. Two mineral springs, one saline, and the other chalybeate, were discovered in the vicinity, some years since; and in 1816, a new saline spa was formed, to which a pump-room, and hot and cold baths, with every requisite accommodation, have been added. The surrounding country abounds with diversified and pleasing prospects. There is a convenient reading-room, also a circulating library. The business of the town formerly consisted in the manufacture of broad-cloth and kerseymere, of which it was once the chief seat, but this is now on the decline: some business is done in malt, and in leather. The Wilts and Berks canal passes on the east, and about a mile and a half southward joins the Kennet and Avon canal. The river Avon passes through the town, and is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of four arches, with light and elegant balustrades: adjoining it is one of the largest corn-mills in the county, and contiguous are an extensive factory and dye-houses. The market is held every alternate Monday, for cattle, sheep, pigs, &c.; and there is a cattle-fair on July 27th. The county magistrates hold a petty-session here for the division, on the last Wednesday in every month; a court leet takes place half-yearly by the joint lords of the manor; and a court of requests, under the act of the 47th of George III., for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, is held once in three weeks, on Tuesday, alternately with Bradford and Trowbridge. The parish comprises, exclusively of waste, 7920 acres, of which about 400 are arable, 150 woodland, and the remainder pasture and meadow; the soil is clay, alternated with gravel, and the prevailing timber is elm. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £38. 9. 4½.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Salisbury: the great tithes have been commuted for £1278, and the vicarial for £1214. The church is a spacious cruciform structure of freestone, chiefly in the Norman style, with later additions, and has a handsome tower rising from the intersection; part of the building is of the period of the twelfth century, and in the interior, on the south side, are two chantry chapels. A district church was consecrated at Shaw Whitley, in 1837, a neat structure in the early English style, containing 480 sittings, of which 320 are free; and there are chapels of ease at Earl-Stoke and Seend; also places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans. The poor law union of Melksham includes six parishes or places, with a population of 18,879.

MELLING (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the chapelries of Arkholme with Cawood, and Hornby, and the townships of Farleton, Roeburndale, Wennington, and Wray with Botton, 2039 inhabitants, of whom 195 are in the township of Melling with Wrayton, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 1. 10½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £113; impropiators, the Representatives of John Marsden, Esq. A district church has been erected at Wray, of which the patronage is vested in certain Trustees. A school has a permanent income of £12 per annum, the proceeds of bequests.

MELLING cum CUNSCOUGH, a chapelry, in the parish of HALSALL, union of ORMSKIRK, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ormskirk; containing 607 inhabitants. The chapelry is intersected by the Leeds and Liverpool canal, and contains some quarries of a kind of freestone, used for building. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patron, Rector of Halsall, whose tithes have been commuted for £505, and who has a glebe of about a quarter of an acre. A new chapel, dedicated to St. Catherine, and built by subscription, was consecrated in 1835, and has a handsome stone tower: there are several ancient monuments to the memory of the family of Bootle, which were removed from the old edifice. A school is supported by voluntary contributions.

MELLION, ST., or MELLYN, a parish, in the union of ST. GERMAN'S, Middle division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Callington; containing 395 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1480 acres, of which 970 are arable, 150 woodland, and 350 pasture and common; the soil is light, and the lower grounds are watered by the river Lynher; the scenery is richly diversified. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 12. 6., and in the gift of J. T. Coryton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £225, and the glebe comprises 64 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the early English style, with a lofty tower of granite; it contains some rich Norman details, and monuments to the Coryton family.

MELLIS (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Eye; containing 532 inhabitants. It comprises 1344*a.* 2*r.*, of which 180 acres are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 15., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £345, and the glebe comprises 8 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style; the tower fell down about 1720. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MELLONS, ST., a parish, in the union of CARDIFF, hundred of WENTLOOG, division of NEWPORT, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Cardiff; containing 613 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Llanedarn in the county of Glamorgan annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 1. 5., and in the alternate patronage of the Bishop and the Chapter of Llandaff, who, with the Dean and Chapter of Bristol, are the appropriators; net income, £160.

MELLOR, a chapelry, in the parish of GLOSSOP, union of HAYFIELD, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chapel-en-le-Frith; containing 2015 inhabitants. Here are extensive cotton-works, which afford employment to a considerable portion of the inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £136; patrons and impropiators, Trustees of the late John Thornton, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas, is very ancient, and contains a pulpit, formed out of an old oak-tree, and a font, also rudely carved. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Independents; and a free school, built about the year 1639, is endowed with £25 per annum.

MELLOR, a township, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Blackburn; containing 1844 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1620 acres, of which about 14 are woodland and plantations, and the remainder arable and pasture. A district church, dedicated to St. Mary, was commenced in 1827, and has been completed at an expense of £5275, defrayed out of the fund appropriated by parliament; it is a handsome building, in the later English style, with a tower and spire. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Blackburn, with a net income of £108. A school is supported by subscription. On Mellor moor are the remains of a Roman encampment.

MELLS (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of FROME, hundred of MELLS and LEIGH, E. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Frome; containing 1261 inhabitants. There are extensive coal-works, and iron-manufactories, principally for agricultural implements; and fairs are held on the Monday after Trinity-week, and on Michaelmas-day. The river Frome here flows between rocks of a great height, somewhat resembling St. Vincent's rock, below Bristol. The living is a rectory, with that of Leigh-upon-Mendip annexed, valued in the king's books at £33. 16. 8., and in the gift of T. S. Horner, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £600, and the glebe comprises 16 acres. Schools are supported by subscription.

MELLS, a hamlet, in the parish of WENHASTON, union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SURREY, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Halesworth; containing 123 inhabitants. There was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Margaret.

MELMERBY (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Penrith; containing 329 inhabitants. This place was anciently of greater importance, and had a weekly market, and an annual fair; the former has been long discontinued, but a pleasure-fair is still held on old Midsummer-day. The parish comprises by measurement 1651 acres of land in cultivation, exclusively of about 3000 of fell and common: there are extensive beds of limestone, some quarries of freestone, and a mine of lead. On the eastern side of the parish is Hartside Fell, a lofty mountain rising 1312 feet above the village, over which passes a new road from Alston to Penrith. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 11. 5*½*., and in the gift of John E. Pattenson, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £118, and the glebe comprises $35\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is built of red freestone, and contains several ancient monumental stones. In the parish are two springs, one sulphureous, and the other chalybeate. The Roman road called the Maiden-way, is visible here, where its width is 21 feet.

MELMERBY, a township, in the parish of COVERHAM, union of LEYBURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Middleham; containing 110 inhabitants. At this place, of which Sir William Chaytor is lord of the manor, the monks of Coverham possessed 2 oxgangs of land, granted to them by Roger Fitz-Richard. The township is situated north-west of the river Cover, and comprises 930 acres, including a portion of moorland fell.

MELMERBY, a township, in the parish of WATH, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Ripon; containing 322 inhabitants. The township comprises 1109*a.* 14*p.*, of which 839 acres are arable, 252 pasture and meadow, and 18 woodland; the soil is generally fertile, but part of the land consists of a fox-cover, which extends eastward to Leeming-Lane. The village is handsome, and has some neat houses with gardens attached. As a commutation for the tithes, a rent-charge has been awarded, amounting to £333. 10., and there is a glebe of 3½ acres.

MELPLASH, a tything, in the parish of NETHERBURY, union and hundred of BEAMINSTER, Bridport division of DORSET, 2¼ miles (S. S. E.) from Beaminster.

MELSONBY (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Richmond; containing 530 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2669*a.* 3*r.* 7*p.*, of which 2000 acres are arable, 524 meadow and pasture, and 34 woodland and plantations. Its surface, which is elevated, is broken into hills and dales; the higher grounds command a view of the Hamilton hills on the one side, and of Stanemore on the other; and the lower lands are watered by a rivulet which flows through the parish. The scenery is in many points highly picturesque, and the soil, which rests on a substratum of limestone, is generally fertile; freestone is found, and on Gatherley moor, partly within the parish, are some quarries in full operation; limestone is also obtained, and there are lime-kilns in several parts. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 2. 11., and in the patronage of University College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £690, and the glebe comprises 94 acres. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the Norman style, and is probably the same as that noticed in the Domesday survey. A school is supported by an endowment of £26 per annum. In a field opposite the rectory-house are some slight remains of a religious house, thought to have been a Benedictine nunnery, founded in the latter part of the reign of Stephen, or in the earlier part of that of Henry II., by Roger D'Ark, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Gatherley moor is noticed by Camden as one of the most distinguished places in England, for the celebration of races and other sports. Over its surface was once a raised bank of earth of great antiquity, about 12 yards in breadth, with a trench of equal width on each side, generally called the Scotch Dyke, and supposed to have been a boundary line between the territories of the Britons and the Picts. There were also several barrows, now obliterated by the inclosure of the moor.

MELTHAM, a chapelry, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Huddersfield; containing 3263 inhabitants. The chapelry is situated at the base of the mountain called West Nab, and abounds with mineral wealth; several coal-mines are in full operation, and there are quarries of good building-stone; the manufacture of woollen and cotton goods is carried on extensively, and fairs for horses, sheep, and cattle are held. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £273; patron, Vicar of Almondbury; impropiators, Governors of Clitheroe School. The chapel, dedicated to St. Bar- tholomew, was enlarged in 1835, by the addition of a north aisle, and a square embattled tower was erected at an expense of £1500; it is a neat structure, and contains 1000 sittings, of which 300 are free. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. In a field between West Nab and the village is a Roman encampment.

MELTHAM-MILLS, a village, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Huddersfield. This place owes its rise to the establishment of extensive cotton and silk mills, by Messrs. Brook, to whom it principally belongs, and who have built handsome mansions for their residence. The manufacture affords employment to nearly 1000 persons, chiefly females. A handsome church, in the later English style, has been erected at the expense of James Brook, Esq., at a cost of £4000, to which is attached a spacious school-house; it contains 275 sittings, and the minister's stipend is paid by Messrs. Brook, who likewise provide a house for him.

MELTHWAITE, a township, in the parish of IRETON, union of BOOTLE, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Ravenglass; containing 112 inhabitants.

MELTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of WILFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2¼ miles (N. E.) from Woodbridge; containing 980 inhabitants. The parish is skirted on the south-east by the navigable river Deben, over which is Wilford bridge; there are some extensive iron-works carried on, and a large establishment for building. The gaol for the liberty of St. Ethelred was formerly in the parish, and also the house of industry for the hundred of Loes and Wilford, which latter has been converted into a lunatic asylum. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Ely: the tithes have been commuted for £392. 15., and the glebe comprises 8 acres.

MELTON, a chapelry, in the parish of WELTON, union of SCULCOATES, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, E. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (S. E.) from South Cave; containing 195 inhabitants. It comprises about 900 acres of land, situated on the north side of the Humber, and has a pleasant village about a mile east-south-east of Welton, on the road to Hull.

MELTON-CONSTABLE (St. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of HOLT, W. division of NORFOLK, 5½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Holt; containing 75 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and at the time of the Domesday survey was granted to the Bishop of Thetford, of whom it was held by Roger de Lyons, whose descendants assumed the name of Constable, from the office which they held under the bishop. The parish comprises 1741*a.* 2*r.* 7*p.*, whereof 822 acres are arable, 560 meadow and pasture, and about 370 woodland; the soil is generally a sandy loam. Melton Hall, the seat of Lord Hastings, erected by Sir Jacob Astley, is a spacious and handsome mansion of brick, with facings of stone, and contains many stately apartments, splendidly decorated; the grounds are tastefully laid out, and the park, which is four miles in circumference, and well stocked with deer, is richly wooded.

The river Thurne, which is navigable from Aylsham to Yarmouth, has its source within the limits of the parish. The living is a rectory, with that of Little Burgh consolidated, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the gift of Lord Hastings: the tithes have been commuted for £235, and the glebe comprises 33 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in the early and later English styles, with a low tower between the nave and chancel.

MELTON, GREAT (VIRGIN MARY), a parish, in the union of HENSTEAD, hundred of HUMBLEYARD, E. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Norwich; containing 429 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2487 acres, chiefly the property of Edward Lombe, Esq., whose seat, Melton Hall, is a handsome mansion, containing a fine ornithological collection, including 400 specimens, all prepared by the celebrated Leadbeater. The living comprises the united rectories of All Saints and St. Mary the Virgin, each valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the gift of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £748. 10., and the glebe comprises $22\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, the latter built in 1440. The old church of All Saints, which stood in the same churchyard, was partly taken down in the reign of Anne; the ruins are finely mantled with ivy.

MELTON, HIGH (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of DONCASTER, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. Riding of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Doncaster; containing 115 inhabitants. This parish, called in Domesday book Middel-tun, is situated on the northern acclivity of the vale of Dearne, and comprises 1500 acres, of which 1000 are arable and pasture, and the remainder wood and plantations. The lands are chiefly the property of Richard Fountayne Wilson, Esq., whose seat, Melton Hall, has extensive pleasure-grounds, tastefully laid out, and embellished with plantations. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100, arising from private benefactions and grants from the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; patron and impropiator, Mr. Wilson. The church, a handsome structure with a square embattled tower at the west end, is supposed to have been founded in the reign of Henry I., when so many new parishes were formed in Yorkshire, and is first noticed in the time of Stephen, when it was given to the nuns of Hampole. In the windows are numerous decorations in stained glass, inserted principally by the late Dean Fountayne, of York, and consisting chiefly of armorial bearings and devices collected from various ecclesiastical buildings in the county. There are also some ancient monuments.

MELTON, LITTLE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HENSTEAD, hundred of HUMBLEYARD, E. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Norwich; containing 330 inhabitants. It comprises 660 acres, chiefly arable. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £104, with a glebe of 13 acres, and a house; patrons and impropiators, Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a square embattled tower; the nave is separated from the chancel by an ancient carved screen, and the font is of Norman style. A school is supported by I. I. Gurney, Esq.

MELTON-MOWBRAY (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of FRAMLAND, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 15 miles (N. E.) from Leicester, and 105 (N. W.) from London; containing, with the chapelries of Freeby and Welby, 3937 inhabitants. The old name of this place was Medeltune, which has been gradually contracted to Melton, indicating the situation of the town in the middle of the five hamlets that compose the parish; the adjunct is the name of its ancient lords, which they assumed by command of Henry I. During the civil commotions in the time of Charles I., a severe action occurred in this neighbourhood, between the royalists and the parliamentary troops, in February 1644, when the forces of the latter, consisting of about 2000 men, were routed, and 170 killed. The town sustained considerable damage by fire in 1613, and in 1637 the plague raged here with great violence. It is situated on the road from London to Leeds, in a valley on the small river Eye, and is neatly built; the streets are paved, watched, and lighted, the expense being defrayed out of the rental of the Town Estate, which produces nearly £800 per annum; and there is a good supply of water. Here is a building, fourteen feet in diameter, called the Manor oven, in which, in the time of Sir Matthew Lambe, an attempt was unsuccessfully made, on the plea of feudal right, to compel the inhabitants to bake their bread. The principal attraction of Melton, and one great cause of its increasing improvement as a town, is the celebrated hunt to which it gives name: the season commences in November, and continues about five months, during which there is an influx of sportsmen from all parts of the kingdom; and there is stabling for nearly 700 horses. Here is a permanent subscription library and newsroom. The chief article of manufacture is bobbin-net lace, and there is a minor one of worsted-hosiery. The general traffic has been facilitated, especially in the supply of coal, by opening a navigable communication with Loughborough, called the Melton-Mowbray and Oakham canal, which was effected in 1790, and which, near the town, is intersected by the river Wreak. The market is on Tuesday, and on every alternate day there is a large show of cattle: fairs take place on the Monday and Tuesday after January 17th, March 13th, May 4th, Whit-Tuesday, August 21st, and September 7th, principally for horses, cattle, and sheep. A court leet and baron, for the recovery of debts under 40s., is held every three weeks.

The LIVING is a vicarage, with that of Sysonby annexed, valued in the king's books at £16. 8. 9.; net income, £580; patron, E. Godfrey, Esq.; impropiator, W. Blake, Esq.: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1760. The church is a spacious and lofty cruciform structure; the tower, which rises from the intersection, is partly in the early English style, and at the west end is a handsome entrance porch. In the reign of Elizabeth, the church was considerably heightened, and a series of elegant windows was put up over the aisles; and it has lately undergone a thorough repair, in perfect accordance with the original style of the building. There are chapels of ease at Burton-Lazars, Freeby, and Welby; and places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Some schools appear to have been established here at a very early period, and are noticed as existing previously to 1347, when they were taken under the patronage of Edward III., as possessor of the temporalities of the priory of Lewes. Schools are at present maintained from the Town Estates: there are two exhibitions from the upper department, conjointly with another at Leicester, to Lincoln College, Oxford; and Sir Richard Rayner, in 1732, bequeathed property now producing £55 per annum, for clothing 26 of the boys. There are endowed almshouses, founded at various periods, for 12 persons; and the poor have some smaller bequests. The union of Melton comprises 54 parishes or places, 53 of which are in the county of Leicester, and 1 in that of Nottingham; the whole containing a population of 19,297. John de Kirkeby, Bishop of Ely in 1286, and founder of Ely Palace, Holborn; Archbishop William de Melton, lord high chancellor of England in the reign of Edward III., and who was buried in the church; and the eloquent, but eccentric, John Henley, who was educated at the free school, were natives of this place.

MELTON-ROSS, a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, S. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing 175 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Glandford-Brigg to Grimsby, and comprises 1750 acres of good land, of which 100 are meadow and pasture, 100 wood, and the remainder arable; the surface is undulated, and the soil a fine loam, with a marl substratum. The scenery is pleasing and picturesque, embracing extensive views; and from Melton-Wood House, Lincoln minster can be seen, distant 30 miles. There is stone of good quality for building and the roads, and for burning into lime. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £62; patron, Prebendary of Melton-Ross with Scamblesby in the Cathedral of Lincoln; appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Lincoln: there are 24 acres of glebe. The church, erected in 1773, is a plain edifice with a neat interior. A Sunday school is held in the church. Melton gallows, ordered to be erected by King James to check the quarrels between the families of Ross and Tyrwhitt, still remains on the road side.

MELTONBY, a township, in the parish and union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 2½ miles (N. by W.) from Pocklington; containing 49 inhabitants. It is situated at the foot of the wolds, and comprises about 710 acres of land, belonging to various freeholders.

MELVERLEY (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, hundred of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Llandrinio. A tithe rent-charge of £176. 17. is paid to the Bishop of St. Asaph, who also has a glebe of 6 acres.

MEMBURY (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, 3½ miles (N. N. W.) from Axminster; containing 886 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 4210 acres. A cattle-fair is held on August 10. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Axminster: the appropriate tithes have been commuted for two rent-charges of £132. 8., payable respectively to the prebendaries of Grindall and Warthill, and the vicarial for £336. The church contains a monument to the memory of Sir S. Calmady, who was mortally wounded at the siege of Ford House, during the great civil war. A school is partly supported by the clergyman. In the neighbourhood is an ancient encampment, formed by a single vallum, inclosing two acres.

MENDHAM (All Saints), a parish, in the union of HOXNE, partly in the hundred of EARSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, but chiefly in the hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 1¼ mile (E. by S.) from Harleston; containing 823 inhabitants, of whom 566 are in Suffolk. A Cluniac priory, subordinate to that of Castle-Acre, was founded at Bruninghurst, in this parish, in the reign of Stephen, by William, son of Roger de Huntingfield, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; it subsisted till the Dissolution, when the site was granted to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk; there are some slight remains. The parish comprises 2998a. 33p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 5. 2½, and in the patronage of Mrs. Whitaker; net income, £122; impropiator, William Adair, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £440, and the vicarial for £50, and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, crowned by pinnacles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MENDLESHAM (St. Mary), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 15½ miles (N. N. W.) from Ipswich; containing 1340 inhabitants. This place formed part of the possessions of Hugh Fitz-Otho, who, in the reign of Edward I., obtained for the inhabitants the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair, the former of which has been long discontinued, and the latter become of very little importance. The town consists chiefly of two long streets, parallel with each other, containing well-built houses, and is approached in all directions by excellent roads; the environs are pleasant, and the air salubrious. The road from London to Norwich, via Ipswich, passes through the eastern part of the parish, which comprises by admeasurement 3944 acres. The living is a vicarage, endowed with one-third of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £14. 9. 2.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Henry Thomas Day, LL.D.; appropriators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, Dean and Chapter of Chichester. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £540, and the vicarial for £580; the glebe comprises 25 acres, with a house, considerably improved by the present incumbent. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, and a north and south porch, embellished with grotesque sculptures; the pulpit, reading-desk, and cover of the font, are enriched with elaborate carvings. Above the north porch is an apartment, in which are preserved some pieces of old armour. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. In 1473, Robert Cake bequeathed land, which, with other benefactions, produces about £380 per annum, partly applied to instruction, but chiefly distributed among the poor. About the close of the seventeenth century, an ancient silver crown, weighing 60 ounces, was found here; and in 1758, a gold ring, bearing an inscription in Runic characters, was turned up by the plough.

MENETHORPE, a township, in the parish of WESTOW, union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from New Malton; containing 129 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 420 acres, and has a secluded village in the narrow dale of a small rivulet, near its confluence with the Derwent.

MENHENIOT (St. NEOT), a parish, in the union of LISKEARD, Middle division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Liskeard; containing 1221 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 6047 acres, chiefly arable; the soil near the village is very rich, and in general produces good crops of grain; the surface is hilly, and the lower grounds are watered by two small rivers. Copper and tin are found, but not worked at present. Fairs for cattle and sheep are held on April 23rd, June 11th, and July 28th. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £21. 15. 5.; net income, £804; patrons, Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford, on the nomination of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. A school is conducted on the national system. Within the parish, and near the town of Liskeard, was anciently an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. William of Wykeham was vicar of the parish.

MENSTONE, a township, in the parish of OTLEY, Upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Otley; containing 329 inhabitants. This place, called in old documents Mensington, comprises about 1090 acres, chiefly the property of F. Hawksworth Fawkes, Esq.; the substratum contains stone of moderate quality. The population is partly employed in wool-combing. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is supported principally by Mr. Fawkes. Colonel Fairfax, brother to Sir Thomas Fairfax, the parliamentary general, resided in 1640 at Menstone Hall, whence many interesting relics, including a stone table at which Oliver Cromwell dined the day before the battle of Marston-Moor, have been removed to Farnley Hall.

MENTHORP, with BOWTHORP, a township, in the parish of HEMINGBROUGH, wapentake of OUSE and DERWENT, E. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Howden; containing 82 inhabitants, of whom 44 are in Menthorp. The township comprises by computation 1595 acres: the hamlet is situated on the west bank of the Derwent. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £151. 12. 6., and the vicarial for £19. 12. payable to the incumbent of Skipwith.

MENTMORE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Leighton-Buzzard; containing, with the hamlet of Ledburn and the township of Mentmore, 348 inhabitants, of whom 179 are in the township. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1525 acres, of which 500 are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil is principally clay, and the surface hilly. The London and Birmingham railway passes about a mile to the east of the church. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 1.; patron, C. Harcourt, Esq.

MENWITH, with DARLEY, a township, in the parish of HAMPSTHWAITE, union of PATELEY-BRIDGE, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Knaresborough; containing 725 inhabitants. It comprises about 2730 acres, forming a district of scattered houses southward of the river Nidd. In 1748, William Day gave land for education, now producing £36 per annum.

MEOLE, BRACE, SALOP.—See BRACE-MEOLE.

MEOLS, NORTH (St. CUTHBERT), a parish, in the union of ORMSKIRK, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Ormskirk; containing, with the township of Birkdale, 8331 inhabitants, of whom 7774 are in the township of North Meols. The parish comprises 8066 acres, of which 152 are common or waste; it is bounded on the north-west by the Irish Sea, and contains the rising village of Southport, a modern bathing-place. A fair is held annually. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the gift of Sir P. Hesketh Fleetwood, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £800, and the glebe comprises 16 acres. A gallery has been lately erected in the parochial church, and a church, dedicated to St. John, has been consecrated in the hamlet of Crossens, in the parish: the living is a perpetual curacy. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Primitive Methodists. An ancient grammar school, endowed with £370, is now consolidated with a national school, erected in 1827.

MEOLSE, GREAT, a township, in the parish of WEST KIRBY, union, and Lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $10\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Great Neston; containing 172 inhabitants.

MEOLSE, LITTLE, a township, in the parish of WEST KIRBY, union, and Lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 10 miles (N. W. by N.) from Great Neston; containing 134 inhabitants, many of whom are employed in the fishery along the coast. In the township is Hoylake hotel, much frequented during the bathing season; and a little further to the north is a smaller hotel, occupying a sequestered situation. In 1690, the duke of Schomberg encamped with his army at a place called the Mells, near Hoylake, previously to his embarkation for Ireland.

MEON, EAST (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of PETERSFIELD, partly in the hundred of MEON-STOKE, but chiefly in that of EAST MEON, Petersfield and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Petersfield; containing, with the tythings of Bordean, Coombe, Langrish, Oxenbourne, Peak, Ramsdean, Riplington, and Westbury, 1499 inhabitants, of whom 651 are in East Meon tything. The parish comprises 10,825a. 3r. 11p., of which 7306 acres are arable, 676 meadow and pasture, 1350 woodlands, 1277 downs, and the remainder common and waste; the surrounding scenery is beautifully diversified. An act for inclosing certain lands was passed in 1839. A pleasure-fair is held on the 19th of September. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, with Froxfield and Steep annexed, in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester (the appropriator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes), and valued in the king's books at £35. 1. 8.; net income, £903. The church is a handsome cruciform structure, with a Norman tower, surmounted by a spire, and a highly-enriched western doorway; and contains a very ancient font, similar to that in Winchester cathedral, sculptured with symbolical figures representing the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise, and their subsequent instruction in the arts of husbandry and spinning. There is a school with a small endowment.

MEON-STOKE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of DROXFORD, hundred of MEON-STOKE, Droxford and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bishop's-Waltham; containing 459 inhabitants. This place is supposed by Camden to derive its name from the ancient district of Meanwari, which, together with the Isle of Wight, was given to Ethelwald, King of the West Saxons, at his baptism, by Wulphere, King of the Mercians, who was his godfather. The parish comprises by measurement 2256 acres, of which 1329 are inclosed and cultivated, and the remainder open downs. The village, of which a considerable portion was destroyed by fire about the year 1740, is neatly built. The living is a rectory, with that of Soberton annexed, valued in the king's books at £46. 2. 11., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £280; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises 28 acres. The church is in the decorated English style, and contains many interesting details; the east window is enriched with delicate tracery, in which is the rose of William of Wykeham, by whom this part of the building is said to have been erected. On the north-eastern boundary of the parish is a Roman camp called Old Winchester, within which a beautiful Roman lamp was discovered in 1834; and at the western entrance are several barrows, which have been opened and found to contain calcined bones, fragments of Roman pottery, and other relics.

MEON, WEST, a parish, in the union of DROXFORD, hundred of FAWLEY, Droxford and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Bishop's-Waltham; containing, with the hamlet of Woodlands, 814 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Privett annexed, valued in the king's books at £30. 17. 11., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £729, and the glebe comprises 36 acres. The church is a curious specimen of Norman architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a national school.

MEOPHAM (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of NORTH AYLESFORD, hundred of TOLTINGTROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Gravesend; containing 937 inhabitants. It comprises 4694*a.* 2*r.* 22*p.*, of which 3026 acres are arable, 508 meadow and pasture, 877 woodland, and 147 hop plantations. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, valued in the king's books at £16. 3. 4.; net income, £435; appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. The church, in the decorated English style, was built in 1396, by Archbishop Courtenay, who founded four almshouses near it.

MEPAL (St. Mary), a parish, in the hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4 miles (S. E.) from Chatteris; containing 539 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1524 acres, principally in pasture; about 263 acres are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Sutton united, valued in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Ely, the appropriators of Sutton: the tithes of Mepal have been commuted for £270, and the glebe comprises 42 acres.

MEPPERSHALL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BIGGLESWADE, hundred of CLIFTON, county of BEDFORD, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Biggleswade; containing 487 inhabitants. This parish, of which a small part is in a detached portion of the county of Hertford, comprises by computation 1900 acres: the plating of straw is carried on to some extent. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22; net income, £500; patrons, Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge: the glebe comprises 90 acres, with a house. The church, a neat structure in the early English style, has some Norman details, of which the north entrance is a handsome specimen. A school is endowed with £15 per annum. Attached to the principal farm, and now used as a barn, are the remains of an ancient chapel with an enriched Norman doorway, and some good windows of later date.

MERCASTON, a township, in the parish of MUGGINTON, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Derby; containing 138 inhabitants. At the Norman survey here was a church. Many ancient coins have been found in the village.

MERE, a township, in the parish of ROSTERN; union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Nether Knutsford; containing 588 inhabitants. A school is partly supported by P. L. Brooke, Esq.

MERE (St. Michael), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of MERE, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS; containing, with the tythings of Chaddenwick, Mere Town, Woodlands, and Zeals, 3139 inhabitants, of whom 1719 are in the town of Mere, $21\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Salisbury, and 102 (W. S. W.) from London. The name of this place is derived from the Saxon word Mæra, signifying bounds or limits, and indicates its situation on the borders of the counties of Wilts, Somerset, and Dorset. In 1253, permission was given by Henry III. to Richard, Earl of Cornwall, to build and fortify a castle on his manor of Mere, which manor has ever since been attached to the duchy of Cornwall. In the 9th of Henry IV., a grant was made to Henry, Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall, of a market and two annual fairs. The town, situated on the road from Salisbury to Wincanton, is small, and the buildings are irregular; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The principal branch of manufacture is that of English dowlas and bed-ticking; and there is a silk-throwing mill. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held for corn and cattle on May 17th and October 10th. The town anciently sent two members to parliament, but was disfranchised on the plea of poverty. Courts leet and baron are held in October, for the duchy of Cornwall, and by the Dean of Salisbury, at which constables and tythingmen are chosen for the town and hundred. The parish is situated at the south-west extremity of the Downs, and comprises by computation 8000 acres; the soil is chalk, alternated with clay. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean of Salisbury, valued in the king's books at £28. 4. 2.; net income, £200. The church is a spacious and handsome structure, partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with an embattled tower crowned by lofty pinnacles; on each side of the chancel is a sepulchral chapel, and in the belfry is a beautifully carved oak ceiling. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a Roman Catholic chapel at Bonham House. A school is partly supported by a bequest of £10 per annum. The poor law union of Mere comprises 12 parishes or places, of which 7 are in Wilts, 3 in Somerset, and 2 in Dorset, with a population altogether of 8498. To the north-west of the town are vestiges of a Danish encampment, called "White-street camp" from a hill on which it is situated. Francis, Lord Cottington, a celebrated statesman in the reign of Charles I.; and the Rev. Francis Potter, an ingenious mechanist, born about 1594, were natives of the place.

MEREVALE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ATHERSTONE, partly in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, and partly in the Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by S.) from Atherstone; containing 208 inhabitants, of whom 106 are in Leicester. The parish is partly bounded by the river Anker, and comprises, in that portion of it which is in the county of Warwick, about 870 acres; the soil is a strong clay, the surface hilly, and the scenery richly diversified; the substratum abounds with coal, of which some mines are in operation. The Coventry canal passes by the north-east side of the parish. The living is a donative; net income, £64; patron, D. S. Dugdale, Esq. A school is supported by subscription. An abbey for Cistercian monks, founded by Robert, Earl of Ferrers and Nottingham, about 1148, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was valued at the Dissolution at £303. 10.: the remains consist only of foundations.

MEREWORTH (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of MALLING, hundred of LITTLEFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Maidstone; containing 862 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the Hurst woods, comprises by computation 2915 acres; the soil is generally a light hazel-coloured mould, resting on a substratum of Kentish ragstone; the surface is boldly undulated, and there are some fine tracts of grazing land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 2. 6., and is in the patronage of the Baroness le Despencer: the tithes have been commuted for £822. 10., and the glebe comprises 33 acres. The church, rebuilt by John, Earl of Westmorland, in 1744, is a very handsome edifice, constructed of stone, with a fine Corinthian portico, and surmounted by a lofty spire. A school is partly supported by the rector, for the instruction of the children of the poor.

MERIDEN, or MEREDEN (St. Lawrence), a parish, and the head of a union, in the Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of WARWICK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Coventry; containing 1071 inhabitants. This place, anciently Alspath, formed part of the possessions of the Countess Godiva, in 1043, and in the 12th of Edward II. was the property of John de Segrave, who obtained for the inhabitants the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair. The parish comprises about 2782 acres, of which three-fourths are arable, 377 woodland, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the surface is pleasingly diversified with rising grounds, and hills of various elevation, commanding extensive and richly-varied prospects. The view from the churchyard, and from two houses to the north of it, both the property of James Kittermaster, Esq., M. D., and of which one is called Ryleye House, embraces an amphitheatre of eight miles in circuit, sloping gradually towards the village, and embellished with woods and plantations interspersed with stately oaks and lofty elms, beech, pine, and poplar of luxuriant growth, and gradually expanding from the south-east to the north-west into a vast circuit of nearly 30 miles in extent. In the middle distance are seen more than twenty towers and spires of churches, beyond which appear, in bold relief, Bromsgrove Lickey, Birmingham, Barbeacon, and other places; and in the extreme distance the hills of Worcestershire, Staffordshire, and Shropshire, and numerous other interesting features, forming one of the grandest panoramic views in the kingdom. The soil of the lands is various, in some parts a rich deep sandy loam, in some a sandy gravel, and in others marl, clay, and gravel. On Meriden Hill is an extensive quarry of red sandstone, and near the village was once a quarry of fine hard white freestone, which is now filled up, though a large bed extending eastward is still unwrought. Meriden Hall, the seat of Charles Digby, Esq., is a spacious and handsome mansion, built of this white freestone, and beautifully situated in a richly-planted demesne, tastefully laid out in extensive pleasure-grounds, and embellished with a fine sheet of water. The ancient manorial hall of the Walshes, who were lords of the manor in 1400, and Alspath Hall, to the north-east of the church, are now occupied as farm-houses; and an ancient moated mansion, once a seat of the Earl of Derby, is also now a farm-house. The village is situated on the road from Birmingham to Coventry, and contains several well-built houses, of which one, formerly the Bull's-head inn, a celebrated posting-house and hotel, a spacious building of ancient date, originally the seat of Sir Clement Fisher, of Packington, is now the private residence of its proprietor, Charles Blakesley, Esq. On the green, at the western extremity of the village, is an old cross of red sandstone, of which the shaft and the steps forming the ascent to it are in good preservation; and near it is the Swan inn, an ancient house built in 1506, which is now the principal inn.

The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 12.; net income, £268; patron and proprietor, the Earl of Aylesford. The tithes were commuted for corn-rents in 1785. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Finch, rector of Great and Little Packington, is vicar of Meriden, and the duties of the benefice are performed by a curate, who resides in the vicarage-house, beautifully situated to the south of the church, and to which are attached 42 acres of glebe. The church, seated on an eminence to the south-east of the village, is an ancient structure, chiefly in the early and later English styles, with some Norman details, and an elegant square embattled tower in the later style. The outer walls were taken down and rebuilt in 1827, and two galleries erected; containing 225 additional sittings, of which 182 are free, at an expense of £1898, of which £242 were raised by a rate, £150 were a grant from the Church Building Society, and the remainder was subscribed; the burial-ground, also, was enlarged. In the aisles are two ancient monuments, one of alabaster, and the other of red sandstone; the one to John Wyard, who founded a chantry in the church, in the reign of Henry IV., and the other supposed by Dugdale to be erected to the memory of the Walshes, lords of the manor. A national school for boys, and another for girls, with a residence for the master and mistress in the centre, connecting them, was built at a cost of £522, raised by subscription, on a site given by the Earl of Aylesford, in 1843; they are supported by an endowment arising from canal shares bequeathed by the Digby family, and the interest of £500 by Henry Barnett, Esq., of Hollybury End. The poor law union comprises 18 parishes or places, containing a population of 11,602. In the clay lands to the east of the church, specimens of fossil wood are met with; and in the gravel-pits at Hollybury End, are found bivalved shells, corallines, and enchrinites. On Meriden common are traces of an encampment formed during the rebellion in Scotland, in 1745.

MERING, an extra-parochial liberty, in the N. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, though locally in the parish of GIRTON, union, and N. division of the wapentake, of NEWARK, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Newark; containing 5 inhabitants.

MERKSHALL, or MATTISHALL-HEATH (St. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of HENSTEAD, hundred of HUMBLEYARD, E. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Norwich; containing 24 inhabitants. It comprises 540 acres, of which 417 are arable, 87 meadow, and 12 woodland. The living is a sinecure rectory, united to that of Caistor St. Edmund's; the church is in ruins. In opening a barrow, in 1821, opposite the site of the Roman camp at Caistor, the remains of two skeletons, with the teeth perfect, and four Roman urns, containing calcined bones, were found.

MERRIDGE, a hamlet, in the parish of SPAXTON, union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of CANNINGTON, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 102 inhabitants.

MERRINGTON (St. JOHN THE EVANGELIST), a parish, in the unions of AUCKLAND, DURHAM, and SEDGEFIELD, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM; containing, with the chapelry of Ferry-Hill, and the townships of Chilton and Hett, 1704 inhabitants, of whom 431 are in the township of Merrington, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Bishop-Auckland. The soil is light and gravelly, resting upon limestone, and in some parts a clay on hard blue whinstone; the surface is hilly, and the scenery much diversified; there is a coal-mine. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 4. 9½., and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Durham: the tithes of the vicar have been commuted for £287, those of the Dean and Chapter for £646, and those of certain impropiators for £74. The church is principally in the Norman style, and stands on elevated ground. There is a district church at Ferry-Hill. On the usurpation of the see of Durham by Comyn, about 1143, this place was seized by his nephew, who partly encompassed the church with a ditch and valium, and occupied it with armed men.

MERRINGTON, a township, in the parish of PRESTON-GUBBALS, liberties of SHREWSBURY, union of ATCHAM, N. division of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 188 inhabitants.

MERRIOTT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CHARD, hundred of CREWKERNE, W. division of SOMERSET, 2 miles (N.) from Crewkerne; containing 1467 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 11. 5½.; net income, £312; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Bristol. A gallery has been erected in the church, and 200 free sittings have been provided.

MERROW (St. JOHN THE EVANGELIST), a parish, in the union of GUILDFORD, Second division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Guildford; containing 252 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Leatherhead to Guildford, and comprises 1608 acres, of which 783 are arable, 335 pasture, 92 woodland and plantations, and the remainder common and waste. The Guildford race-course is in the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 0. 2½., and in the gift of the Earl of Onslow: the tithes have been commuted for £250. The church is in the early English style.

MERRYIN, ST., a parish, in the union of St. COLUMB MAJOR, hundred of PYDER, E. division of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Padstow; containing 593 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west and north by the Bristol Channel, and comprises 3608 acres, of which 1159 are common or waste land; the surface is strikingly varied, and the coast is lined with cliffs of singularly wild and rugged aspect. A small quay was constructed under the Catacleuse Cliff in 1794, by Henry Peter, Esq., for the accommodation of coasting-vessels, and the seine boats belonging to the pilchard fishery. Lead-ore is found; there are also some quarries of inferior slate, which is used for roofing houses, and fine dark-coloured trap rock is obtained in the cliff Catacleuse, which is almost equal to marble. A fair is held on the Monday preceding the 22nd of June. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £15. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Bishop of Exeter: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £410, and the vicarial for £250, and the glebe comprises 36 acres. The church is an ancient structure, of which the pillars and the font are of trap stone; the font is curiously carved with figures of the Apostles, and formerly belonged to the ruined church of St. Constantine, an ancient village, of which some remains still exist, near Harlyn. There are places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists.

MERSEA, EAST (St. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Colchester; containing 331 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1844 acres, whereof 72 are common or waste; it occupies the eastern portion of the Isle of Mersea, and is bounded on the north by Pyefleet channel, and on the east and south by the Colne, near its confluence with the Blackwater. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £427, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church has a square stone tower, which formerly served as a landmark. A national school is partly supported by a bequest of £200.

MERSEA, WEST (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 9 miles (S.) from Colchester; containing 917 inhabitants. The parish comprises the greater portion of the Isle of Mersea, which is about five miles in length and two in average breadth, and is connected with the main land on the west by a causeway named the Strode, for the maintenance of which an estate of 46 acres, producing £70 per annum, is appropriated. The surface is diversified with hill and dale, and richly wooded. From various remains of antiquities, the place appears to have been occupied by the Romans, and to have been the residence of the Count of the Saxon Shore, or some other Roman officer of distinction. During the Danish invasions of Britain the isle was a frequent landing-place, and in their retreat here the invaders were besieged by Alfred the Great. The trade in oysters was formerly extensive, but it has greatly diminished, being limited at present to the supply of a few Dutch vessels. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £22; patron and impropiator, Thomas May, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £500, and the vicarial for £230. The church, situated at the south-eastern extremity of the isle, is a small ancient edifice. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a school is endowed with the interest of £200. In 1730, when some alterations were made at West Mersea Hall, a very fine tessellated pavement was discovered, 21½ feet long, and 18½ broad. Here was once a Benedictine convent, dedicated to St. Peter, which was a cell to the abbey of St. Audoen, at Rouen, in Normandy.

MERSHAM (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of EAST ASHFORD, hundred of CHART and LONGBRIDGE, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 3¾ miles (S. E.) from Ashford; containing 751 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2417 acres, of which 1276 are pasture, 908 arable, 190 woodland, and about 28 hop plantations: the South-Eastern railway passes through the western portion. A fair for pedlery and toys is held on the Friday in Whitsun-week. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 16. 10½., and in the gift of the Archbishop of Canterbury: the tithes have been commuted for £630. 10. 6.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. Over the west door of the tower, which stands on the south side of the nave of the church, is a very curious window, in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and parochial schools are supported by subscription.

MERSTHAM (St. Catherine), a parish, in the union, and Second division of the hundred, of REIGATE, E. division of SURREY, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Reigate; containing 1130 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2535a. 1r. 18p., of which 1585 acres are arable, 597 meadow and pasture, 235 woodland, and the remainder garden-ground and common. The Reigate stone, called also fire-stone, is found here, under beds of chalk and chalk marl; and a considerable quantity of it was used in the erection of old Windsor Castle and Henry the Seventh's chapel. The Brighton railway intersects the parish. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, valued in the king's books at £22. 1. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £574, and the glebe comprises 26 acres. The church, standing on a knoll, was erected about the time of Henry VI., and is principally in the later English style; the tower is in the early style, and surmounted by a wooden spire. A school is partly supported by subscription, for the instruction of the children of the poor.

MERSTON (St. Giles), with SHORNE, a parish, in the union of NORTH AYLESFORD, hundred of SHAMWELL, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 4¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Gravesend; containing 878 inhabitants. This place is parochial in its ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but in other respects part of Shorne. It is a sinecure rectory, in the patronage of the Crown, valued in the king's books at £2. 13. 4.; net income, £69. The church is in ruins, and its site is included in a plantation of about five acres, called Chapel-wood. There are some traces of ancient fortifications.

MERSTON, a parish, in the union of WEST-HAMNETT, hundred of BOX and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 3 miles (S. E.) from Chichester; containing 104 inhabitants. The Arundel and Portsmouth canal passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £260, and the glebe contains 7½ acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the decorated English style.

MERTHER (St. MERTHER), a parish, in the union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (W.) from Tregoney; containing 408 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of St. Clement's Creek, an inlet of the river Mopus, is distinguished for the treaty concluded at Tresilian Bridge, between Sir Ralph Hopton, on the part of the royalists, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, on that of the parliamentarians, in 1646, by which this county was surrendered to the latter. Abundance of excellent stone for building is quarried. The creek is navigable for coal and stone barges up to Tresilian Bridge; and the two great roads from London to Falmouth via Launceston and Plymouth, skirt the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, formerly annexed to the vicarage of Probus, from which it was separated in 1532; net income, £57; patrons, the Parishioners; appropriators, Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford, whose tithes have been commuted for £250. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. William Hals, author of the Parochial History of Cornwall, resided at Tresawson, in the parish.

MERTON (All Saints), a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Black Torrington and Shebbear, and N. divisions of DEVON, 5¾ miles (N. by W.) from Hatherleigh; containing 763 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3536 acres, of which 335 are common or waste: pipe and potters' clay are found on the moors. Potheridge House, the birthplace, and afterwards for some time the residence, of the celebrated General Monk, who rebuilt it, was a noble structure, with a chapel attached, and some magnificent stables, which yet remain; the mansion is now occupied as a farm-house. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 15. 7½., and in the gift of Lord Clinton: the tithes have been commuted for £365, and the glebe comprises 66 acres. A school is partly supported by Lady Clinton and the rector.

MERTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union and hundred of WAYLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Watton; containing 164 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1361a. 1r. 20p., of which 738 acres are arable, 491 pasture, and 86 woodland. The Hall, the seat of Lord Walsingham, is a handsome mansion in the Elizabethan style, containing many stately apartments, of which some are hung with ancient tapestry in good preservation; the park is richly wooded, and much of the timber of luxuriant growth. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. 5.; patron and incumbent, Lord Walsingham: the tithes have been commuted for £201. 14., and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church, situated in the park, is an ancient structure with a round tower; the chancel contains several monuments and brasses to the family of De Grey, and in the south window are effigies of St. Edmund, and of Robert Clifton, in stained glass. A school is supported by Lord Walsingham.

MERTON, or MARTIN (St. Swithun), a parish, in the union of BICESTER, hundred of BULLINGDON, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Bicester; containing 230 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £110; patrons and impropriators, Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land in 1763. The church is an ancient edifice, with a tower formerly surmounted by a lofty spire, which was taken down in 1796. Near it is the manor-house, erected in the reign of Elizabeth, and now occupied as a farmhouse. A national school is supported by the vicar and Exeter College. A branch of a Roman road runs through the parish.

MERTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CROYDON, W. division of the hundred of BRIXTON, E. division of SURREY, 9 miles (S. W. by S.) from London; containing 1914 inhabitants. The name of this place in Domesday book is Mereton and Meretune, a Saxon compound of mere, a lake or marsh, and tun, a town or vill, being exactly descriptive of its situation. According to some writers, the place was the scene of the murder of Cynewulf, King of Wessex, in 784, and of a battle between the Danes and the Saxons, in 871; but there exists some doubt as to its identity with the Merton referred to by ancient historians. In 1115, a convent built of wood, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, was founded here by Gilbert Norman, sheriff of Surrey; and Henry I., in 1121, granted to the community a charter of incorporation and the manor of Merton, towards the erection of a church in honour of the Virgin Mary: the last priory was built of stone in 1130, and was liberally endowed by subsequent benefactions; at the Dissolution its revenue was valued at £1039. 5. 3. In the reign of Henry III., Walter de Merton, lord high chancellor of England, and afterwards Bishop of Rochester, founded here a seminary of learning, which he subsequently removed to Oxford, on the foundation of Merton College. A parliament was held at the priory in 1236, when statutes were enacted which take their name from the place: on that occasion the prelates attempted to introduce the imperial and canon law, but were met by the memorable reply of the barons, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. Here was concluded the peace between Henry III. and the Dauphin of France, through the mediation of Gaulo, the pope's legate; and here, also, Hubert de Bourg, chief justice of England, found a temporary asylum from the displeasure of the same monarch. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., a considerable part of the conventual buildings was standing; and it appears that a garrison had been established here; for, in July, 1648, orders were issued by the government for putting the place in such condition that no use might be made of it to endanger the peace of the kingdom. In 1680, Merton priory was advertised to be let, when it was described as containing several large rooms and a very fine chapel. The only vestiges are the outer walls, constructed of flint and rubble, which are nearly entire, and inclose a space of about sixty acres.

The village, which is situated on the small river Wandle, consists chiefly of one street; the houses are modern, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from several springs and from the river, over which a bridge was built in 1633, uniting this parish with those of Wimbledon and Mitcham. The printing of cotton, silk, and chalis, is carried on to a considerable extent on the site of the priory; and at the north-east corner of the premises is a copper-mill. The London and South-Western railway passes between Merton and Wimbledon, at which latter is a station. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £93; the patronage and impropriation belong to Mrs. Mary Bond. The church, in the Norman style, with later insertions, was erected by the founder of the abbey, in the twelfth century; and the arms of England and those of the priory, painted on glass, decorate the chancel window. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a national school, supported by subscription. In 1687, William Rutlish bequeathed an estate, now producing £96 a year, directing the income to be applied in apprenticing children; and Rear-Admiral Sir Isaac Smith, in 1831, left £700 three per cent. reduced annuities to the poor. Thomas à Becket was educated here under the first prior; and Walter de Merton, a native of the place, also received instruction in the priory. Church House was the residence of Garrick and of Sheridan, the latter of whom was frequently visited here by George IV., when Prince of Wales. Earl Nelson enjoys the inferior title of Viscount Merton.

MESHAW, or MESHETT (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of SOUTH MOLTON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from South Molton; containing 305 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. W. Karslake: the tithes have been commuted for £110, and the glebe comprises 84 acres. The church contains several monuments to the Courtenays, by one of whom a handsome service of communion plate was presented.

MESSING (All Saints), a parish, in the union of WITHAM, Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, 3 miles (E.) from Kelvedon; containing 758 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2173 acres, of which 160 are woodland, and the remainder, with the exception of a few acres of pasture, all arable; the situation is elevated, and the soil generally light, and moderately fertile. The village has many handsome houses in its neighbourhood, and the beauty of the surrounding scenery renders it an agreeable place of residence. A fair is held on the first Tuesday in July. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; patron and impropriator, Earl of Verulam: the tithes have been commuted for £430, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is a handsome edifice, of which the east window is decorated with paintings of the six Christian graces: Sir William de Messing, the founder, was formerly represented in wood, in the north wall, recumbent, as a Knight Templar, but the figure was removed some years since. A school is supported by subscription.

MESSINGHAM (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, E. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDESEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing, with part of the township of East Butterwick, 1548 inhabitants, of whom 1368 are in the township of Messingham. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Trent, and comprises about 6000 acres, mostly arable, with a little wood; the surface is undulated, and the soil of various qualities, chiefly clay and sand; a portion of the land has been fertilized by warping from the Trent. The village is large, and pleasantly situated on a gentle declivity. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the vicarage of Bottesford united in 1727, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £598. It is in the alternate patronage of the Bishop, and the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln, who are the appropriators: the tithes were commuted for land in 1800. The church is a neat edifice, rebuilt, with the exception of the tower, in 1821. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by subscription, and a grant from the local Board of Education.

METFIELD (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Harleston; containing 702 inhabitants. It comprises 2140 acres, of which 40 are common or waste. The living is a donative, in the gift of the parishioners, and the income is partly derived from 45 acres of land, bequeathed by Mr. Chapman: the tithes have been commuted for £450. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and a handsome south porch. Here is a place of worship for Independents. There are lands producing £80 per annum, for repairing the church and for parochial uses.

METHAM, a township, in the parish and union of HOWDEN, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, E. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Howden; containing 42 inhabitants. The township comprises 920 acres, of which two-thirds are arable. Metham Hall, the property and residence of the Rev. Philip Simpson, was built by Sir George Metham, whose family were long seated here. A Roman pottery, including fragments of urns and other vessels, has been discovered, about a mile from which the ancient Roman military way passes.

METHERINGHAM (ST. WILFRID), a parish, in the Second division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTIVEN, union and county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Sleaford; containing 1205 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the east by the river Witham, comprises by computation 6000 acres, chiefly arable, with a moderate quantity of pasture, and a small portion of woodland. The soil in the western part is light, in the central of mixed quality, and in the eastern fenny; the surface is undulated, and the higher grounds command some pleasing prospects, and a fine view of Lincoln cathedral. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 0. 10.; net income, £300; patron, Marquess of Bristol; impropriators, Trustees of Sleaford Hospital. The church is a handsome structure, in the later English style; it was burnt down, or greatly damaged, in 1599, and was restored in 1701. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

METHLEY (ST. OSWALD), a parish, in the Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Leeds; containing 1702 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the Calder, that river here forming a confluence with the Aire, which is on the east. It comprises 3336a. 2r. 20p., whereof about three-fourths are arable; the soil is fertile, the lands are in a high state of cultivation, and the surface and scenery are richly diversified. Some coal-pits here have been lately worked out. Methley Park, the residence of the Earl of Mexborough, originally a castellated edifice, surrounded by a moat, has been much enlarged by the present earl, and is now a stately and elegant mansion. The village is irregularly built, and some of the houses are ancient; there is a small trade in malt. The North-Midland railway runs through the parish, and is joined in the vicinity by the York and North-Midland line, and also by the Leeds and Manchester line. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 8. 6½., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster; net income, £908, arising from land allotted at the inclosure, in lieu of tithes: the glebe comprises 374 acres. The church is partly in the decorated, but chiefly in the later, English style, with a square embattled tower, crowned by pinnacles and a well-proportioned spire; over the south entrance is a statue of the tutelary saint, and the interior contains some ancient and interesting monuments. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. The children of the parish are instructed at the expense of the Earl of Mexborough, and a handsome day school has been considerably enlarged by Lady Sarah Savile. There are almshouses for twelve widows, and some bequests for distribution among the poor.

METHOP, with ULPHA, a township, in the parish of BEETHAM, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Cartmel; containing 87 inhabitants.

METHWOLD (ST. GEORGE), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of GRIMSHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Brandon; containing 1441 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Lynn to Bury St. Edmund's, and comprises 13,192a. 3r. 9p., whereof about 4969 acres are pasture and meadow, 7921 arable, and 65 woodland; in the neighbourhood is a celebrated warren, that once contained a great number of rabbits, the fur of which was in considerable repute. Here was formerly a market; and a fair is still held on the 23rd of April, for horses, cattle, &c. The inhabitants are exempt from serving on juries out of their own parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Cranwick, and valued in the king's books at £9. 1. 3.; impropriators, H. S. Partridge and W. L. Jones, Esqrs. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £1102. 10., and the vicarial for £340, and a rent-charge of £32. 5. is payable to the rector of Feltwell; the impropriate glebe contains 133 acres. The church, a handsome structure, in the later English style, has an embattled tower, surmounted by a crocketed spire; the chancel contains neat memorials to the Partridge family. There is a place of worship for dissenters; and a school is supported out of the revenue of the duchy of Lancaster. The proceeds of about 26 acres, allotted at the inclosure, are distributed in money to the poor; and 72 tenements have a right of fuel on 365 acres of fen. Slight remains are visible of the ancient priory of Slewesholme, called Slusham, a cell to the monastery of Castle-Acre.

METTINGHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of WANGFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (E.) from Bungay; containing 409 inhabitants. In the 17th of Edward III., Sir John de Norwich had a license to make a castle of his house in this town, in which he founded a chantry, dedicated to God and the Virgin Mary. He also established a college at Ravenham, in Norfolk, in 1350, for a master and eight chaplains, which, in the 11th of Richard II., was removed to Norton-Subcourse, where the number of chaplains was augmented to thirteen, and which was again removed, in 1380, to the chapel of the Virgin in Mettingham Castle: at the Dissolution the revenue amounted to £202. 7. 5. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Waveney, and situated on the road from Bungay to Beccles; it comprises 1401a. 1r. 4p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 3½.; net income, £140; patron, Rev. J. C. Safford. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a circular tower; the font is curiously sculptured, and the entrance on the north is through a richly-decorated Norman doorway. About a mile southward of the church stand the stately remains of the castle, which appears to have been of great strength.

METTON (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of NORTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 3¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Cromer; containing 71 inhabitants. The parish comprises 662 acres, the property of W. H. Windham, Esq., of Felbrigg Hall, who is lord of the manor; 440 acres are arable, and 190 meadow and pasture. The living is a discharged rectory, united to those of Felbrigg, Aylmerton, and Runton, and valued in the king's books at £7: the tithes have been commuted for £115, and there are 79 acres of glebe. The church is partly in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower; the nave is separated from the chancel by a carved screen.

MEUX, a township, in the parish of WAGEN, or WAWN, union of BEVERLEY, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (E.) from Beverley; comprising by computation 1390 acres, and containing 95 inhabitants. A Cistercian abbey was founded here in 1150, by William le Gros, Earl of Albemarle, and dedicated to the Virgin; it stood in the vale of the Melsa, and was adorned with stately pinnacles and towers, and enriched with sculpture and tessellated pavements. The establishment consisted of fifty monks, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, amounted to £445. 10. 5.; the only remains are an outer wall and arched gateway, but many of its ornaments are in the collections of antiquaries, and a fine tessellated pavement, removed from the foundation of the abbey church in 1833, now fronts the mansion of Mr. Wise.

MEVAGISSEY (ST. MEVAN AND ST. ISSI), a parish, in the union of ST. AUSTELL, E. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Grampound; containing 2310 inhabitants. This parish, of which the name is derived from its patron saints, borders on a bay of the same name in the English Channel, and comprises, according to measurement, 1222 acres: the population is chiefly employed in the pilchard fishery, for which the place is celebrated. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 4. 2.; net income, £186; patron, Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe; impropriator, Duke of Buckingham. The vicarage is endowed with a portion of the great tithes, and the glebe comprises 18 acres. The church, a very ancient structure, had formerly a tower, which was pulled down. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Bryanites; and a school is supported by subscription.

MEWAN, ST., a parish, in the union of ST. AUSTELL, E. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 1 mile (W. by S.) from St. Austell; containing 1146 inhabitants. It comprises 2240 acres, whereof 640 are common or waste land. At Polgooth, which is partly in the parish, is a celebrated tin-mine. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of the Representatives of Sir C. Hawkins, Bart., and the Rev. R. Holbyn and J. H. Tremaine, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £275, and the glebe comprises 35 acres.

MEXBOROUGH, a parish, in the union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 6½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Rotherham; containing, with the township of Dennaby, 1425 inhabitants, of whom 1258 are in the township of Mexborough. This place, called by Matthew of Westminster Maisebel, was the scene of a memorable battle between the Saxons and the Britons, under Aurelius Ambrosius, in which the latter were victorious. The parish is situated on the north and south sides of the river Don, and comprises, according to a recent survey, 2190a. 1r. 35p., of which 1169a. 1r. 2p. are in the township of Mexborough; and of these, 630 are arable, 275 pasture, and 200 common. The soil is fertile, and there are two quarries of durable stone, of good quality for building, and also in some request for grindstones. The village is near the junction of the river Don and the Dearne and Dove canal; there are a glass-house, two potteries for the manufacture of glass and earthenware, and a yard for boat-building. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patron and appropriator, the Archdeacon of the West riding. The tithes have been commuted for £600, and the glebe comprises 39 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a tower surmounted by a spire, and contains some remnants of stained glass; two galleries and an organ have been lately erected, by private subscription, assisted by a grant of £15 from the Church Building Society, and the whole of the interior has been repaired and restored; but it is still inadequate for the increased number of the parishioners. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, and Kilhamites; and a national school for boys and girls, for which a handsome building, containing two schoolrooms for 200 children, has been erected on a site given by the lord of the manor, is supported by subscription. The late William Horne, Esq., built six cottages for widows, which have been enlarged and repaired at the expense of Richard Fountayne Wilson, Esq., lord of the manor; Mr. Horne also left £5 per annum for keeping the cottages in repair; and there are other benefactions for distribution among the poor. There are several aggers in the parish, supposed to have been raised by the Romans for strengthening their works at Templeborough.

MICHAEL, ST., or MIDSHALL, formerly a representative borough and market-town, partly in the parish of ST. ENODER, and partly in that of NEWLYN, union of ST. COLUMB MAJOR, hundred of PYDER, W. division of CORNWALL, 36 miles (S. W. by W.) from Launceston, and 249 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 107 inhabitants. The ancient name of this place was Modeshole, under which appellation John de Arundell, in 1301, certified his right to a market and fair here, which had been previously granted to Walter de Raleigh. The town is very inconsiderable, consisting only of a few houses: a fair is held on October 25th, chiefly for sheep, of which from 3000 to 4000 are generally offered for sale. The borough, which first sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward VI., was disfranchised by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45: among its representatives, have been Sir Walter Raleigh, and Carew, the historian.

MICHAEL, ST., a parish, partly in the borough of ST. ALBAN'S, but chiefly in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, union of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W. by N.) from St. Alban's; containing 1999 inhabitants, of whom 1140 are in the borough. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 1. 3.; net income, £300; patron and impropiator, Earl of Verulam. The church, which, though situated in the town of St. Alban's, and within the walls of the ancient city of Verulam, is without the limits of the borough, was erected by Ulsinus, the sixth abbot, and has a square embattled tower; the chancel is built principally of Roman tiles, from the ruins of Verulam, and attached to the south side of the nave is a chapel.

MICHAEL, ST., a parish, in the union of GARSTANG, hundred of AMOUDERNES, N. division of the county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Garstang; including the chapelry of Plumpton-Wood, and the townships of Great Eccleston, Elswick, Inskip with Sowerby, Out Rawcliffe, and Upper Rawcliffe with Tarnacre; and containing 4786 inhabitants. This place is situated upon the navigable river Wyre, the mouth of which forms a fine harbour, noted for its security. Here, in 1651, the Earl of Derby disembarked from the Isle of Man, with 300 other adherents of the house of Stuart. The parish comprises by computation 20,000 acres, in nearly equal portions of arable and pasture, with a small quantity of woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 17. 6.; net income, £783; patron and impropiator, H. Hornby, Esq. The old church, which was superseded by the present small structure, built in the time of Henry VIII., was one of three erected in this district soon after Christianity was introduced into the north of England. There are chapels of ease at Plumpton-Wood and Coppe, the former erected in 1640, in a mixed style, and the latter in 1700, in a more modern style; a church was built at Rawcliffe, in 1838, by subscription, and is a handsome structure, in the Norman style. There is a national school.

MICHAEL, ST., HANTS.—See WINCHESTER.

MICHAEL, ST., BEDWARDINE, a parish, in the Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, union of WORCESTER, W. division of the county of WORCESTER; locally forming part of the city of Worcester, and containing 476 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 1.; net income, £90; patrons, Dean and Chapter of Worcester. Here is an endowed school.

MICHAEL, ST., CAERHAYS (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of ST. AUSTELL, E. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Tregoney; containing 208 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the shore of the English Channel, by which it is bounded on the south, and includes a small port called Luny bay; the extent of the surface by computation is 815 acres, and the surrounding scenery is finely varied. The living is a rectory and vicarage, with those of St. Dennis' and St. Stephen's annexed, valued in the king's books at £27. 10. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Lord Grenville: the tithes of St. Michael's have been commuted for £150, those of St. Dennis' for £260, and those of St. Stephen's for £780; the glebe of St. Michael's comprises 23 acres. In the interior of the church are handsome monuments to the Trevanion family. A school is supported by J. H. P. B. Trevanion, Esq. There are some remains of an ancient chapel in the parish.

MICHAEL'S, ST., MOUNT, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of PENWITH, W. division of CORNWALL, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (S.) from Marazion; containing 163 inhabitants. This place obtained the name of Cara Cowz in Clouze, in the Cornish language signifying "the grey or hoary rock in the woods," from its supposed situation, in the remoter ages of antiquity, in the centre of a wood: and of this supposition the recent discovery of a submarine forest extending for some miles around the base of the mount is an evident confirmation. Its present appellation, which extends to the whole bay, is derived from its patron saint, who, according to tradition, appeared to some hermits living in devotional retirement in this sequestered spot, on which a monastery was subsequently erected and dedicated to St. Michael the Archangel. The mount is thought to have been the island Ictis, noticed by Diodorus Siculus as the place to which the tin, when refined and cast into ingots by the Britons, near the promontory of Belerium, was conveyed in carts over an isthmus dry only at low water. A priory of Benedictine monks, afterwards exchanged for Gilbertines, was founded here prior to the year 1044, when Edward the Confessor granted to that community the whole of the mount, with all its buildings and appendages, among which there appears to have been a castle. The priory, being a cell to the abbey of St. Michael, in Normandy, was, during the war with France, in the reign of Henry V., seized as an alien priory, and given first to King's College, Cambridge, and subsequently to the nunnery of Sion, in the county of Middlesex, with which it remained till the Dissolution, when its revenue was £110. 12. The place has at various times been the scene of martial operations; and during the civil war of the 17th century, it was fortified for the king, and the Duke of Hamilton, who had been taken prisoner by the royalists, was confined here; but in 1646 it was surrendered to the parliament, and after the Restoration it became the property of the ancestors of Sir John St. Aubyn, Bart., its present proprietor.

The mount, which has more the character of a work of art than of nature, is connected with the main land by an isthmus 40 yards in width, formed of fragments of rock and pebbles seemingly compacted by two currents of the sea sweeping round its base: at high water it has the appearance of an island. Its circumference is about one mile at the base, gradually diminishing to the summit, which is 250 feet above the level of the sea, and is crowned with an embattled and turreted building called the Chapel tower. The surface, which is about seven acres in extent, is exceedingly rugged, consisting of large masses of granite overhanging the base, and threatening to precipitate themselves into the sea; the views are extensive and highly interesting, and the aspect of the rock is romantically bold and striking. On its summit stands the castle, formerly a fortified monastery, but at present one of the residences of Sir John St. Aubyn. The ancient refectory of the monks is now the dining-room, and the chapel in the centre of the castle remains, and has recently been repaired and adorned. At the base of the rock is a wharf, near which is a small village, inhabited by fishermen: there is also a harbour, capable of affording shelter to about 40 vessels, with a pier, which was rebuilt by Sir John St. Aubyn, in 1727; and the rock is defended by three batteries mounting 18 guns. The trade consists principally in the importation of timber from Norway, and coal; and in the exportation of copper-ore, china-clay, and pilchards. Among the minerals found are, mica, apatite, antimony, lead, malachite, and the triple sulphuret of copper. Topazes have been discovered; and at low water, on the south side of the rock, wolfran also; and several lodes of copper and tin have been observed.

MICHAEL, ST., PENKEVIL, a parish, in the union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Tregoney; containing 175 inhabitants. The living is a rectory valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 2.; net income, £156; patron, Earl of Falmouth. The church, an ancient edifice adjoining the park, contains a handsome monument, by Rysbrach, to the memory of Admiral Boscawen, a distinguished naval commander, who died in 1761. A school is supported by the Earl and Countess of Falmouth.

MICHAEL-CHURCH, a parish, in the union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Ross; containing, with Tretire, 135 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Tretire: the tithes have been commuted for £22.

MICHAEL-CHURCH, ST., a parish, in the union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of NORTH-PETHERTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 5½ miles (S.) from Bridgwater; containing 29 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £80; patron, Sir Peregrine Acland, Bart.; impropiator and incumbent, Rev. J. A. Templer.

MICHAEL-CHURCH-ESKLEY (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 16 miles (W. S. W.) from Hereford; containing 404 inhabitants. The river Eskley runs through the parish; the surface is hilly, and ornamented with wood interspersed in various parts; the Black Mountains are seen at the distance of about three miles, forming a bold back-ground in the landscape. The number of acres is 3840; the land consists of arable and pasture, in general of inferior quality, and the soil is partly a red clayey earth, and partly a stony loam. Stone is quarried of a light green colour, supplying flag-stones of a superior kind, but is now nearly exhausted. A few of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of woollen goods. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of St. Margaret's; impropiators, the Cornwall family.

MICHAELSTONE-LE-VEDW (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union and division of NEWPORT, partly in the hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, and partly in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, 5¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Newport; containing 541 inhabitants, of whom 204 are in the English part. The parish comprises 3556 acres, of which 1014 are arable, 2124 pasture, and 400 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 3½; net income, £400; patron, C. Kemys Tynte, Esq. Here is a small school.

MICHAELSTOW (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CAMELFORD, hundred of LESNEWTH, E. division of CORNWALL, 3¼ miles (S. W. by S.) from Camelford; containing 225 inhabitants. It is intersected in the north-eastern part by the river Camel, and comprises by measurement 1613 acres, of which 793 are arable, 250 meadow and pasture, and 30 woodland and plantations; the soil is light but very fertile, and the surface is generally undulated. The road from Camelford to Bodmin passes through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall; net income, £270. At Helsbury are the mount and other earthworks of an ancient castle called the Beacon.

MICKFIELD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, E. division of SUFFOLK, 1 mile (E.) from Stoneham; containing 263 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1300 acres, of which about three-fourths are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil is a strong fertile loam on a substratum of blue and white clay; the surface is elevated, but level. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 11. 0½; patron and incumbent, Rev. Maltward Simpson: the tithes have been commuted for £390, and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church is a handsome structure, in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower on the south side.

MICKLEFIELD, a chapelry, in the parish of SHERBURN, Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, 6½ miles (N. N. W.) from Ferry-Bridge; containing 474 inhabitants. The township comprises 1755 acres, of which 25 are common or waste land; it abounds in limestone, under which are strata of sand and grit-stone. A pit was sunk in 1835, to a bed of coal, four feet in thickness. The village is on the great north road, about 2½ miles westward of Sherburn; and an intermediate station on the line of the Leeds and Selby railway is situated here, close to the road to Wetherby. The tithes have been commuted for £76, of which £6 are payable to the vicar, and £70 to the prebendary of Fenton in York Cathedral. The chapel was built in 1700. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MICKLEHAM, or LITTLEBOROUGH (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of DORKING, Second division of the hundred of COPTHORNE and EFFINGHAM, W. division of SURREY, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Leatherhead; containing 787 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2849 acres, of which 175 are common or waste land. The village is pleasantly situated in a valley, on the road from London to Dorking, and consists principally of one street of respectable and well-built houses, sheltered by surrounding eminences, among which, Box Hill, so called from the box-trees planted on its southern declivity by the Earl of Arundel, in the reign of Charles I., is conspicuous for the beauty of its scenery and fine views. The river Mole runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13, and in the gift of Sir G. Talbot, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £425, and the glebe comprises 35 acres. The church was partly rebuilt, and restored in an elegant manner, in 1823, to its original state, at a cost of £2254, the interior showing a faithful and curious specimen of early Norman architecture; the chancel was fitted up with stalls, at an expense of £500, by the Rev. A. Burmester. There is a small parochial school. The Roman Stane-street from Sussex passed over Mickleham Downs; and there are remains of an ancient chapel at a place called Chapel Farm.

MICKLEOVER (All Saints), a parish, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, 3½ miles (W. S. W.) from Derby; containing, with the chapelries of Findern and Littleover, 1673 inhabitants, of whom 760 are in the township. The parish comprises 2327*a.* 3*r.* 26*p.*: the making of lace, and weaving of silks and velvets, afford employment to a considerable portion of the population. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 11. 5½.; net income, £562; patron and impropriator, the Dowager Lady Scarsdale for two turns, and Lord Scarsdale for one. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment, under acts of inclosure, in 1768 and 1790. The church is an ancient structure. There are chapels of ease at Findern and Littleover, and places of worship for Wesleyans and Unitarians. John Alsop, in 1715, founded a free school, and endowed it with lands now let for about £60 per annum.

MICKLETHWAITE, with BINGLEY, a township, in the parish of BINGLEY, union of KEIGHLEY, Upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 3½ miles (E. by S.) from Keighley; containing 10,157 inhabitants.—See BINGLEY.

MICKLETON (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2½ miles (N. by E.) from Chipping-Campden; containing, with the hamlets of Clopton and Hidcote-Bartrim, 698 inhabitants. It comprises 2530*a.* 2*r.* 18*p.*; the soil is chiefly a deep clay, producing excellent crops of grain; the surface is irregular, comprising a portion of the Cotswold Hills, and stone is quarried, principally for the roads. The living is a vicarage, with that of Ebrington consolidated, valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 4½., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropriator, J. Roberts, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £144, and the vicarial for £105; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is a handsome structure, partly Norman, and partly of later date; attached is a schoolroom, founded and endowed in 1513, by Richard Porter, Esq. Several members of the family of Graves, eminent for their literary talents, were born or resided here; and Sir Anthony Keck, an eminent lawyer, and one of the commissioners of the great seal in 1688, was a native of the parish.

MICKLETON, a township, in the parish of ROMALD-KIRK, union of TEESDALE, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 8 miles (N. W.) from Barnard-Castle; containing 513 inhabitants. It comprises about 4890 acres, of which the greater portion is a high moorland tract, extending along the south side of Lunedale to the borders of Westmorland. The tithes were commuted for land in 1803. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is partly supported by subscription.

MICKLETHWAITE-GRANGE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, ½ a mile (S. by W.) from Wetherby; containing 43 inhabitants. It comprises 600*a.* 2*r.* 2*p.*: the hamlet is situated on the south side of the river Wharfe, opposite to the town of Wetherby.

MICKLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of OVINGHAM, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (E. by S.) from Hexham; containing 297 inhabitants. It is situated a little south of the road from Gateshead to Hexham: the village is distant about a mile eastward of Bywell St. Andrew's. A colliery here is entered by a level from the side of a hill. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £155; patron, J. B. Wrightson, Esq. A rent-charge of £197. 14. has been awarded as a commutation for the impropriate tithes. The chapel was erected in 1824, in that part of the chapelry called Hall-yards, near the village, by W. B. Wrightson, Esq., who had previously built a schoolroom.

MIDDLE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of ELLESMERE, partly in the liberties of SHREWSBURY, but chiefly in the hundred of PIMHILL, N. division of SALOP, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 1330 inhabitants, of whom 456 are in the township. The parish comprises 4500*a.* 2*r.* 18*p.*; the soil is chiefly red sand, but partly a rich loam, alternated with stiff clay, producing good wheat; the surface is undulated, and there is a lake of about 10 acres in extent, called Marton Pool. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 7. 3½., and in the patronage of the Countess of Bridgewater: the tithes have been commuted for £1100, and the glebe comprises 3 acres. Here are remains of a castle built by Lord L'Estrange.

MIDDLE QUARTER, a township, in the parish of KIRK-LINTON, union of LONGTOWN, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND; containing 536 inhabitants.

MIDDLE QUARTER, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-IRELETH, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Ulverstone; containing 834 inhabitants.

MIDDLEBERE, a hamlet, in the out-parish of HOLY TRINITY, WAREHAM, union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of WINFRITH, Wareham division of DORSET; containing 8 inhabitants.

MIDDLEHAM (St. Mary and St. Alkeld), a market-town and parish, in the union of LEYBURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 10 miles (W.) from Bedale, and 10 (S.) from Richmond; containing 930 inhabitants. The name of this town is said to be derived from its situation in the centre of a number of hamlets. About the year 1190, a splendid castle was built here by Robert Fitz-Ranulph, wherein, according to Stowe, Falconbridge, a partisan of Henry VI., was beheaded, in 1471; though Speed says he was executed at Southampton. Edward IV. was confined in the fortress by the Earl of Warwick, but having escaped, he levied an army, and obtained a decisive victory over his opponent, who lost his life at the battle of Barnet. King Edward, whose son Edward, afterwards Prince of Wales, was born here, subsequently gave the castle to his brother Richard, Duke of Gloucester. The remains of the fabric stand upon a rocky eminence near the town; the ancient Norman keep is surrounded by a quadrangular building, measuring 210 feet by 175, and flanked by a square tower at each angle. The town is situated in the beautiful valley of Wensleydale, on a gentle eminence rising from the river Ure; the houses are well built, and adequately supplied with water from springs. About half a mile from it is Middleham Moor, a noted place for training horses, either for the field or the race-course. The majority of the inhabitants find employment in the various training establishments, or are engaged in agriculture. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday and Whit-Monday, and Nov. 5th and 6th, for live stock, &c. The petty-sessions for the wapentake of Hang-West are held here. The parish comprises 2108*a.* 2*r.* 34*p.*, of which 1482 acres are meadow and pasture, 163 arable, 44 woodland, and 44 common. The living forms a deanery of itself, and is a royal peculiar, valued in the king's books at £15. 9. 4½., and in the patronage of the Crown; the revenues, which are not large, are divided between the dean and the canon in residence. The church, a venerable edifice, in the ancient English style, was made collegiate by Richard III., when Duke of Gloucester, for a dean, six chaplains, now styled canons, four clerks, and six choristers; the incumbent still retains the title of dean. By various charters and deeds from the crown, the Archbishop of York, Archdeacon of Richmond, and other ecclesiastics, all the members of the collegiate church are exempt from any spiritual jurisdiction except that of the dean, who holds his own visitations, issues marriage licenses, and grants probate of wills and letters of administration; the college is governed by statutes drawn up at the time of its foundation in 1478, and the crown, by the lord chancellor, is sole visitor. There are places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. An excellent school, erected in 1837, is chiefly supported by subscription; and there is also a school of industry for girls.

MIDDLEHAM, BISHOP'S (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of SEDGEFIELD, N. E. division of STOCKTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM; containing, with the townships of Cornforth, Garmondsway-Moor, Mainsforth, and Thrislington, 1434 inhabitants, of whom 511 are in the township of Bishop's-Middleham, 4 miles (N. E.) from Rushyford. This place is of considerable antiquity: its church was given in 1146 to the convent of Durham, by Osbert, nephew of Bishop Ralph Flambard; and soon afterwards, the manor appears to have been conveyed to the see of Durham, the bishops of which formerly resided here, up to the end of the 14th century, in a castle which was situated on a lofty brow of limestone, overlooking the marshy level of the Skerne, and the last remaining portion of which, a low oblong arched room, was removed some years since. The parish is in some parts marshy, and there is little timber except plantations around the principal houses. The produce of a colliery is shipped on the Tees; and limestone is abundant, and is quarried for building and for manure. The village is built on the sides of two hills ascending from a deep vale, through which the road runs. At Cornforth are paper-mills and tile-kilns. A halmote court for the manor is held once in six months, at Middleham, Cornforth, and Sedgefield, in rotation, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 19. 2., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £152; impropiators, W. Russell, R. Surtees, and H. Williamsons, Esqrs. The church, originally a handsome structure, in the early English style, and said to have been erected by Bishop Anthony Beck, has been much disfigured by injudicious alterations and repairs; it contains a fine old font of Stanhope marble. There is a national school.

MIDDLEHOPE, a township, in the parish of DIDDLEBURY, union of LUDLOW, hundred of MUNSLOW, N. division of SALOP; containing 100 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £64, of which £44 are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, and £20 to the vicar of the parish.

MIDDLEMARSH, a tything, in the parish of MINTERN-MAGNA, union of CERNE, hundred of CERNE, TOTCOMBE, and MODBURY, Cerne division of DORSET, 12 miles (N. by W.) from Dorchester. It was anciently the place of retirement of the abbots of Cerne, and afterwards the principal seat of the Napiers, who had a fine old mansion here.

MIDDLE-MEAD, a hamlet, in the parish of LITTLE BADDOW, union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, though locally in the hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Chelmsford; containing 175 inhabitants.

MIDDLENEY, a tything, in the parish of DRAYTON, union of LANGPORT, hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, W. division of SOMERSET, 2½ miles (S. by W.) from Langport; containing 31 inhabitants.

MIDDLESBROUGH, a town and parish, on the river Tees, in the union, and within the limits of the port, of STOCKTON-UPON-TEES, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Linthorpe, 5709 inhabitants, of whom 5463 are in the township of Middlesbrough, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Stockton. This place is of some antiquity, and had, at a very early period, a chapel dedicated to St. Hilda, which, in the reign of Henry I., was granted by Robert de Brus to the monks of Whitby Abbey, on condition of their founding here a cell to that monastery; this condition was fulfilled, and the institution established continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £21. 3. 8. The town was originally a small and inconsiderable hamlet, containing, prior to the year 1829, only one farm-house; but about that time it began to rise into notice from its selection for the construction of a commodious shipping-place, accessible to vessels of large burthen, and from the projected extension from Stockton of the Stockton and Darlington railway, for the purpose of conveying directly to this, as a principal place of shipment, the produce of the collieries in the Wear-dale district of the county of Durham, without the delay and expense of lighterage down the Tees from Stockton. Immediately on the completion of that undertaking in 1830, the exceedingly small population of the place increased to more than 150; and in the following year, on the formation of the Clarence railway, which is also a passage from the Auckland and other mineral districts in the county of Durham, to its terminus at Samphire Batts, on the bank of the Tees, directly opposite Middlesbrough, the importance of the town was permanently established, and since that time it has been most rapidly increasing.

In 1829, six gentlemen, now usually termed "the Middlesbrough owners," purchased about 600 acres of land, and laid out the plan of the present town, consisting of several regular streets diverging at right angles from a square in the centre, and now containing more than 600 well-built houses. The principal founders were, Thomas Richardson, Esq., of Stamford Hill, London, and of Ayton House, in Cleveland; Joseph Pease, jun., Esq., of Darlington; and Henry Birkbeck, Esq., of Norwich, to whose enterprise and public spirit may be attributed the projection and rise of the place. A dock, exceeding nine acres in extent, has been constructed, capacious warehouses have been erected, and also convenient staiths both in the dock and on the Tees, affording facility of dropping the coal from the railway-carriages into vessels. The terminus of the Stockton and Darlington railway is admirably adapted to its use, and consists of several lines of way to the docks and shipping-staiths, for numerous trains, each usually conveying about forty waggons laden with coal. Two yards for building and repairing ships have been constructed, and every arrangement has been made which can contribute to the improvement and increasing prosperity of the town. The streets are lighted with gas; and a handsome structure in the Grecian style of architecture, called the Exchange, has been erected at an expense of upwards of £5000, by a body of shareholders. There are numerous good shops for various articles of merchandise; four public breweries; three iron-foundries, of which one on a very extensive scale employs regularly about 400 men; a sail-cloth manufactory in which the cloth is woven by patent machinery to a very considerable extent; and an extensive manufactory of pottery and earthenware, and for bricks and tiles, for which clay of excellent quality is found in the neighbourhood, and in which more than 300 persons are employed. A branch bank has been opened in the town, and a market has been established under an act of parliament, obtained in 1841, for the general improvement of the place; a branch of the Stockton custom-house has also been established, and every facility has been effected for promoting the trade of the port. The number of vessels that cleared outwards in 1841, was 7579, and the aggregate quantity of coal shipped in that year was 1,014,918 tons.

The parish is in the district called Cleveland, and bounded on the north by the Tees, which separates it from the county of Durham; it comprises, with the township of Linthorp, about 2300 acres, of which 600 are meadow and pasture, and the remainder, with the exception of a few acres of plantations, arable land in good cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Thomas Hustler, Esq., of Acklam Hall. The church was erected in 1840, on the site of the ancient chapel of St. Hilda, at an expense of £2500, of which £500 was a grant from Her Majesty's Commissioners, £1200 the proceeds of a bazaar, and the remainder raised by subscription; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a lofty and well-proportioned spire, and contains 600 sittings, of which one-half are free. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. Of the ancient cell to the monastery of Whitby Abbey no remains exist, but the cemetery is still used as a burial-place.

MIDDLESCOUGH, a hamlet, in the parish of ST. MARY, CARLISLE, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Hesketh-Newmarket; containing, with the hamlet of Braithwaite, 181 inhabitants.

MIDDLESEX, an inland county, bounded on the south by Surrey and a very small part of Kent, from both which it is separated by the river Thames; on the east by Essex, from which it is divided by the river Lea; on the north by Hertfordshire; and on the west by Buckinghamshire, from which it is separated by the river Colne. It extends from $51^{\circ} 23'$ to $51^{\circ} 42'$ (N. Lat.), and from $2'$ (E. Lon.) to $32'$ (W. Lon.), and comprises 282 square miles, or 180,480 acres. There are 207,629 inhabited houses, 9779 uninhabited, and 3185 in course of erection; and the population, including that part of the metropolis which is locally within its limits, amounts to 1,576,636, of whom 738,904 are males, and 837,732 females. At the time of Cæsar's invasion, this part of the British territory, together with that now forming the county of Essex, was inhabited by the Trinobantes, the first British tribe that submitted to the Romans; and on the final reduction of Britain to the condition of a Roman province, it was included in the division called Flavia Cæsariensis. The name is a slight corruption of the Anglo-Saxon Middel-Seaxe, signifying "the country of the Middle Saxons," from the situation of this portion of the English territory in the centre of the early Saxon sovereignties in South Britain. It did not, however, form a distinct kingdom, but was included in that of the East Saxons, established in Essex about the year 530, and shortly after extended over this county. Middlesex is in the diocese of London, and province of Canterbury, and forms a deanery and archdeaconry, comprising, with the exception of those metropolitan parishes which are given in a tabular form under the head of London, 70 parishes. Its civil divisions are the hundreds of Edmonton, Elthorne, Gore, Isleworth, Ossulstone (including the divisions of Finsbury, Holborn, and the Tower), and Spelthorne; and the liberties of the cities of London and Westminster. It comprises the city of London (locally); the borough, commonly called the city, of Westminster; the newly-enfranchised boroughs of Mary-le-bone, Finsbury, and the Tower Hamlets; and the market-towns of Brentford, Staines, and Uxbridge. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, four citizens for London, and two burgesses for each of the above-named boroughs. The shrievalty of Middlesex is united to that of London, under the head of which place it is described. The county is within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, in the Old Bailey, London, where all cases usually tried at courts of assize are determined. The quarter-sessions are held four times originally, and four times by adjournment, at the sessions-house, on Clerkenwell Green.

The SURFACE of the greater part of this small county is gently undulated, and is diversified with plantations and winding streams, besides almost innumerable villas with ornamented grounds and lawns. The northern border, being high ground, adds, by the shelter which it affords, much to the fertility of the other parts. All the land to the south of the road passing from Brentford, through Hounslow, to Longford, is very nearly an entire flat, the greater part of which is less than ten feet above the level of the Thames, which runs along the whole southern side of it; whilst the summits of the principal elevations in the northern part rise to the height of about 400 feet above the level of high-water mark in that river. From Staines, by Ashford and Hanworth commons, to Twickenham, a distance of $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles, extends another flat, lying from ten to twenty feet above the surface of the Thames. In the western part of the county, stretching chiefly to the north of Hounslow heath, is a considerable corn tract, and there is another in the north-eastern part of it; but by far the greater portion of the land is meadow or pasture. On several of the hills, where the soil is naturally thin and unproductive, particularly those of Hampstead and Highgate, and at Hadley, the ground is nevertheless of great value, on account of the fine situations for building. With good cultivation, and the manure procured from London, the soil has every where been ameliorated, so that, in most places, it assumes the appearance of loam, though varying in quality. The total amount of arable land is about 14,000 acres, or one-thirteenth of the whole county; the corn is almost wholly wheat and barley, rye and oats being sown only in very small quantities. Beans, peas, turnips, and cabbages, are also commonly grown. About seven-eighths of the county, or 70,000 acres, consist of upland meadows and pastures, which, from previous cultivation, and the constant and abundant supply of manure obtained from London, have been rendered of the best quality. In different parts of this large tract of grass land, and more especially in the immediate vicinity of the metropolis, it is mown constantly every year, and sometimes twice, or even thrice, a year. Besides the above, there are, on the banks of the river Lea, some excellent grass lands, comprising altogether about 2000 acres, of which 1200, lying in the parishes of Enfield and Edmonton, are inclosed, the rest being divided by landmarks among a great number of proprietors. This tract is frequently flooded in winter, and sometimes in summer; the water, in consequence of the interruptions it meets with in the lower part of its course towards the Thames, remaining long on the ground, and doing much damage to the herbage. The Isle of Dogs, containing 500 acres, is situated at the south-eastern corner of the county, and would be overflowed by every tide, were it not for the security of its banks: this is reputed to be the richest grazing land in the county, and is divided and drained by ditches, which communicate with the Thames, at low water, by means of sluices. Bordering on the river Colne, also, are about 2500 acres of meadow and pasture, stretching from Staines to Harefield, and, being little elevated above the level of the river, much subject to floods.

The number of cows kept in the county for supplying the metropolis alone with milk is between 7000 and 8000, usually of the "Holderness breed." Many early house lambs are fed, the stock from which they are bred being sought with great diligence from all parts of Dorsetshire, and the fairs where such stock is usually sold; and grass lambs are also reared for the Smithfield market. A vast extent of land in the vicinities of Kensington, Hammersmith, Chiswick, Brentford, Isleworth, and Twickenham, is occupied by fruit gardens, for the supply of the metropolis; and there is a very great quantity of the richest ground in its vicinity applied to the raising of vegetables. At Chelsea, Brompton, Kensington, Hackney, Dalston, Bow, and Mile-End, much land is occupied by nurserymen, who spare no expense in collecting the choicest sorts and greatest variety of fruit trees, ornamental shrubs, and flowers, from every quarter of the globe, which they cultivate to a high degree of perfection. These grounds occupy about 1500 acres; and many plants are annually exported from them to Ireland, Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, and Russia. In the Thames are some islands, most of which are planted with osiers for the use of basket-makers, as are also different slips of wet land on the Middlesex border of the river. The common lands yet remaining uninclosed are but of small extent; the principal are Ashford, Littleton, and Laleham commons, Staines and Cowley moors, Hallingdon heath, Uxbridge and Harefield commons, Clapton marshes, and Hadley, an allotment from Enfield Chase. The manufactures are too numerous and extensive for detail, particularly as they will be found noticed under the head of London and other places; the two most important are, that of silk, in the parishes of Spitalfields, Shoreditch, and Bethnal-Green, and that of watches, in the parish of Clerkenwell. With regard to the consumption of agricultural produce, the distilleries are of vast importance, and yield a revenue equal to that of all the other distilleries in Great Britain; the breweries, too, are of great extent. Besides the prodigious amount of the imports and exports of the port of London, innumerable small cargoes of coal and merchandise of various descriptions, including grain, malt, and flour, are conveyed away or received by means of the inland barges on the Thames and the Lea. Tackling, apparel, provisions, and stores, are also supplied for about 14,000 vessels, which load and unload in the course of the year in the port of London, the commerce of which amounts to three-fifths of that carried on throughout the whole of England.

The principal Rivers are the Thames, the Lea, and the Colne, besides which are the smaller streams of the Brent and the Cran. The Thames, so celebrated throughout the world, as connected with the port of London, constitutes the southern boundary of the county for a distance of 43 miles: the largest ships in the service of the East India Company come up this river with safety to the corner of the county at Blackwall; and it is navigable for West India ships to London bridge, and for large barges in the whole of its course on the border of Middlesex, along which the tide flows up it, for the distance of about 25 miles, to Teddington. The Lea forms the entire eastern boundary of the county, and is divided in the greater part of its course, into several natural channels, uniting into one shortly before its influx into the Thames near Blackwall: the river has been made navigable, from its mouth upwards, to the distance of about eight miles, where a canal navigation branches from it on the western side, and runs nearly parallel with it through the meadows of Tottenham, Edmonton, and Enfield, whence it is continued to Hertford. The Grand Junction canal commences at the Thames at Brentford, and quits the county for Hertfordshire near Rickmansworth, in the latter county. From it, at Bull bridge, commences an important branch, called the Paddington canal, which passes on one level, through the central part of the county to Paddington; whence it has been continued by the Regent's canal, round the whole northern side of London, to the Thames at Limehouse. The Regent's canal is nearly nine miles long. Besides the artificial part of the Lea navigation already mentioned, there is an important side cut from that river at Bromley to a basin at Limehouse, communicating with the Thames. A creek from the Thames to Kensington has also been widened within the last few years, and made navigable. The New River, projected by Sir Hugh Myddelton, for supplying the metropolis with water, is described under the head of Clerkenwell. The London and Birmingham railway commences at Euston-square, and, after passing through a tunnel at Primrose hill, quits the county near Pinner hill; the Great Western railway, commencing at Paddington, and pursuing a westward course, quits it a little beyond West Drayton; and small angles of the county are intersected by the Eastern-Counties' and the Northern and Eastern railways, in the east. There are also the two short lines called the London and Blackwall, and the West London, the former about $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles long, and the latter, which runs from Kensington to the Great Western and Birmingham railways, near Holsden-Green, about 3 miles long. The principal turnpike roads bear conspicuous marks of their vicinity to a great city; and scattered villas and genteel houses, frequently in handsome rows and terraces, are erected on one or both sides of them to the distance of five or six miles out of London.

The only Roman station within the limits of the county, besides Londinium, the seat of the Roman government of Britain, appears to have been Sulloniaca, of which the supposed site was on Brockley hill, near Elstree, where various Roman remains have been discovered. The ancient Watling-street is thought to have run from Dowgate, on the north bank of the Thames, along the line of the modern Watling-street, in the city of London, to Aldersgate, and to have been continued north-westerly, and fallen into the line of the present road to St. Alban's by Paddington and Edgware. The Ermin-street led northwards, through Islington, by Stoke-Newington and Hornsey Wood, to Enfield, and, diverging near the latter place, passed Clay Hill, and entered Hertfordshire. A third Roman road led from the metropolis westward into Surrey and Berkshire, in the line of the present great western road, through Brentford, Hounslow, and Staines: a fourth is believed to have led eastward, along Old-street and over Bethnal-Green to Old Ford, where it crossed the Lea into Essex; and it is probable that another left the city at Aldgate, and pursued the course of the present high road, through Whitechapel and Stratford-le-Bow, into Essex. Roman antiquities have been found in different parts, of which the most important are described in the article on London. The number of religious houses in the county prior to the Reformation, exclusively of those in the metropolis and its suburbs, was few, and the principal remains are to be found in London and Westminster. Among the most perfect specimens of ancient domestic architecture are Holland House, Harefield Place, and Wyer Hall at Tottenham; and of the mansions most distinguished for grandeur or elegance may be enumerated, in addition to the two palaces and vast number of magnificent residences in the metropolis, the royal palaces of Hampton Court and Kensington; Sion House, the seat of the Duke of Northumberland; Chiswick House, of the Duke of Devonshire; Osterley Park, of the Earl of Jersey; Bentley Priory, of the Marquess of Abercorn; Caen Wood, of the Earl of Mansfield; Fulham Palace, of the Bishop of London; and Wrotham Park, that of George Byng, Esq. In various parts of the county are springs of mineral water, some of which have been in great repute for their medicinal properties, but none of them are now much frequented.

MIDDLES Moor, a chapelry, in the parish of Kirkby-Malzeard, union of PATELEY-BRIDGE, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 15 miles (W. by N.) from Ripon; containing 1237 inhabitants. The chapelry consists of the townships of Fountains-Earth, Upper Stonebeck, and Down Stonebeck, and extends over a district about twelve miles in length, and computed at 35,705 acres. Middlesmoor is situated upon an eminence; and from the chapelry is a delightful view of the rich valley of Nidderdale. In the different townships are quarries of stone and slate. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Kirkby-Malzeard, with a net income of £117: the chapel was consecrated in 1484. Samuel Horner, in 1809, gave a rent-charge of £20, for the education of 14 boys. There are numerous springs of excellent water on the hills.

MIDDLESTONE, a township, in the parish of MERRINGTON, union of AUCLAND, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 113 inhabitants. It comprises about 870 acres: the Dean and Chapter of Durham have several farms here, which are let out on their tenures. The township has lately been disunited from the parish of St. Andrew-Auckland, and united to Merrington, from the church of which it is distant about half a mile.

MIDDLETHORPE, a township, in the parish of ST. MARY, BISHOPHILL, SENIOR, E. division of AINSTY wapentake, union and W. riding of YORK, 2 miles (S. by W.) from York; containing 126 inhabitants. The township, which is bounded on the east by the navigable river Ouse, comprises about 600 acres of rich land, mostly pasture and meadow: excellent gravel is obtained from pits for the use of roads. Middlethorpe Hall, the seat of Abraham Bower, Esq., is a noble mansion; and Middlethorpe Lodge, the residence of James Meek, Esq., alderman, stands on elevated ground, from which is a fine view of the city of York and the line of the York and North-Midland railway. The village is pleasantly situated on the west bank of the Ouse. Lead bullets and a steel breast-plate were dug up in 1812. In the township is a fine spring of water.

MIDDLETON, with SMERRILL, a chapelry, in the parish of YOULGRAVE, union of BAKEWELL, hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Bakewell; containing 323 inhabitants. Extensive lead-mines are now in operation near the village, which is situated on a hill abounding with limestone. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans.

MIDDLETON (St. GEORGE), a parish, in the union of DARLINGTON, S. W. division of STOCKTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Darlington; containing 433 inhabitants. The parish, which is bounded on the south by the river Tees, comprises about 3100 acres, and includes the village of Middleton-One-Row and the hamlet of Oak-Tree; the surface is undulated, the soil clay, and the scenery pleasing, more especially by the river side, where the walks are beautiful; and there are fine views of the Cleveland hills. In Middleton-One-Row are a good hotel and lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors frequenting Dinsdale spa, in the adjoining parish of Low Dinsdale. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4; net income, £91; patron, H. A. W. Cox, Esq., who, and the incumbent, are the impropriators: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £73. 12. 7., and the rectorial for £78. 5. 11., and there are 15 acres of glebe. The church is a small structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, and stands on high ground to the south-east of the village of Middleton. A school is endowed with the interest of £85, and a house and garden for the master. The foundations of Pountey's bridge, thought to have been the first built across the Tees, are still visible: on or near it stood an ancient chapel; within a short distance was a hermitage; and on the brow of the hill, immediately above it, is an artificial mound, encompassed by a fosse.

MIDDLETON, a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Sudbury; containing 127 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the navigable river Stour, and comprises by measurement 896 acres; the surface is pleasingly diversified with level plains and gently sloping eminences, and the soil, which is of a very superior quality, is a mixture of light and strong wheat land. There are extensive chalk-pits. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £557; patron and incumbent, Rev. Oliver Raymond: there are about 40 acres of glebe in the parish. The church is a very ancient structure, with a belfry turret of wood, and has painted glass windows and two beautiful arches; a new spire was built in 1832, by the present rector, who also beautified the interior.

MIDDLETON, a township, in the parish and union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Lancaster; containing 200 inhabitants. It is situated upon the coast of Morecambe bay.

MIDDLETON (St. LEONARD), a market-town and parish, in the union of OLDHAM, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the chapelries of Ainsworth and Ashworth, and the townships of Birtle cum Bamford, Hopwood, Great Lever, Pilsworth, and Thornham, 15,488 inhabitants, of whom 7740 are in the town, 55 miles (S. E. by S.) from Lancaster, and $191\frac{1}{2}$ (N. N. W.) from London. The name of this place is supposed to have originated from its central situation with regard to some neighbouring towns, whence it was called Middle town. The manor was long held by the family of Assheton, to which belonged Sir Richard Assheton, who signalized himself against the Scots, in 1513, at the battle of Flodden, whither he was accompanied by a band of archers from Middleton. In modern times the town has chiefly been distinguished as one of the principal seats of the cotton manufacture, and the weaving of silk is carried on to some extent. It is pleasantly situated on the road from Manchester to Rochdale, and is a considerable thoroughfare; the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water from springs. Subscription concerts have been established, and are well supported. The cotton trade, in its various departments of spinning, weaving, bleaching, and printing, is extensively pursued, also the manufacture of nankeens, gingham, and check-handkerchiefs; there are also a silk-manufactory and extensive dye-works, together with coal-mines in the immediate vicinity. The Rochdale canal from Manchester passes about one mile and a half from the town; and the Manchester and Leeds railway a little to the east. A royal grant for holding a market on Friday was obtained in 1791, since which period a market-house, shambles, and a range of warehouses for general merchandise, have been erected at the expense of Lord Suffield, to whom the manor belongs. Manorial courts leet and baron are held in April and October; and a court of requests for the recovery of small debts, was established in 1839. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £36. 3. 11½; net income, £1070; patron, Lord Suffield. The church appears to be the work of different periods; the southern side, which is the more modern, was built in 1524, by Sir Richard Assheton and his wife Anne. The choir is separated from the nave by a screen divided into seven compartments, on which are carved the shields and armorial bearings of several families connected by marriage with the Asshetons; in both the north and south compartments are several ancient and curious monuments and inscriptions, and the windows are decorated with armorial bearings and stained glass. There are places of worship for the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, and Swedenborgians. The grammar school was established pursuant to royal charter, dated August 11th, 1572, by Alexander Nowell, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's, London, who founded and endowed thirteen scholarships in Brasenose College, Oxford, for the benefit of this and other schools in the county; it is also entitled to share in two scholarships founded in the same college, by Samuel Radcliffe, D.D., in 1648.

MIDDLETON, with HOUGHTON and ARBURY, a township, in the parish of WINWICK, union of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Newton-in-Mackerfield; containing 293 inhabitants. The hamlet is east of the road between Newton and Warrington.

MIDDLETON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Lynn; containing 867 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Lynn to Norwich, and comprises by measurement 3034 acres, of which 1860 are arable, 1070 pasture and meadow, and 70 woodland; the surface is hilly, and the soil chiefly clay and marl. There are quarries of fine carr stone, for building. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7; patron, incumbent, and impropiator, Rev. P. S. Wood, LL.D. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £432, and the vicarial for £313, and £99. 18. are paid to the rector of North Runcion; the glebe contains nearly 12 acres, to which there is a house. The church is in the decorated English style, with a lofty embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school is supported by Mrs. and Miss Wythe; and at the inclosure, 10 acres were allotted to the poor, for the supply of turf. In the village is a high mount, probably the site of an ancient castle. In the neighbourhood is Middleton Tower, a mansion of the Lords Scales, built in the reign of Henry VII.; and higher up are the remains of Blackborough Priory, in the ruins of which were found, in 1834, three stone and two wooden coffins, containing perfect skeletons, tessellated pavements, a gold sealing, &c.

MIDDLETON, a township, in the parish of COTTINGHAM, union of KETTERING, hundred of CORBY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Rockingham; containing 411 inhabitants. The road from Rockingham to Harborough intersects the township, which is situated on the right bank of the river Welland, and contains 1774a. 3r. 23p.

MIDDLETON, a township, in the parish and union of BELFORD, N. division of BAMBROUGH ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Belford; containing 70 inhabitants. It is on the road from Belford to Tweedmouth; and a stream here, passes at a distance of about two miles and a half into Waren bay.

MIDDLETON, a tything, in the parish of LONG-PARISH, union of ANDOVER, hundred of WHERWELL, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 251 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Yoxford; containing 599 inhabitants, and comprising 2015a. 2r. 26p. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Westleton, annexed to the rectory of Fordley, and valued in the king's books at £5. The tithes of Middleton, which were wholly appropriated to Leiston Abbey, and none of which are paid to the incumbent, have been commuted for £373. 17. 6., and the glebe comprises 13 acres. The church is a building of the Norman period. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

MIDDLETON, a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 3 miles (E.) from Bognor; containing 100 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the English Channel, and has suffered greatly by encroachment of the sea, which has swept away the church, with the greater portion of the village, which at the time of the Domesday survey was situated in the centre of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £130.

MIDDLETON (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of TAMWORTH, Tamworth division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Tamworth; containing 505 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by a portion of the county of Stafford, and comprises by measurement 3901 acres, the whole of which, with the exception of about 100 acres, belonging to the Moxhall estate, is the property of Lord Middleton. The surface is undulated, and the scenery pleasingly varied, and embellished with wood; the soil is light and gravelly, and the greater portion of the land is arable, and in good cultivation. Middleton Hall, a seat of Lord Middleton, is an ancient moated mansion, finely situated, and surrounded by an extensive park. The Birmingham and Fazeley canal passes in the vicinity. The living is a donative; net income, £100; patron and impropiator, Lord Middleton. The church is partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with a square tower, and contains monuments to Willoughby, the naturalist, and Ridgway, Earl of Londonderry, and also two ancient brasses. Schools are supported by a small endowment. The place gives the title of Baron to the Willoughbys, of Wollaton Hall, near Nottingham.
